PREFACE

This project proved more daunting and considerably more time-consuming than I ever imagined. In the process, I came to the realization that many standard reference works are astonishingly unreliable. Simple things, such as dates, where someone attended college, or what jobs he or she held and when, could be difficult to verify, even in our modern age. I have made every effort to be accurate and have not provided dates, job titles, etc., without corroborating them with two reliable sources. Given the limitations on time and resources, as well as the nature of human endeavor, I do not promise that this volume is without error, but I have made every reasonable effort to avoid it.

Most people find biography interesting. That is because people are endlessly fascinating and complex. Unsympathetic figures have admirable traits; appealing figures have flaws, sometimes ghastly ones. The biographies included in this volume certainly bear this out. Even some of the least promising figures turn out to have done interesting things. Surprisingly enough, one seemingly colorless Republican senator from the Midwest invented the jukebox. Moreover, for all the emphasis historians have recently placed on large historical forces, it is, in the end, people who make history.

As I progressed with this project, I found that I was writing a pointillist history of the 1950s. Each biography constitutes a dab; taken altogether, they tell the story of an era as limitlessly complicated and absorbing as those who populated it. A glance at the chronology included in this volume belies the image of the 1950s as an era of quiescence. It is impossible to consider an era dull when it encompasses great achievements in medicine, the social sciences, and literature; a series of crises in the cold war; the birth of the modern Civil Rights movement; the beginning of rock and roll; bitter political divisions; and the dawn of the space race.

It is a cliché to note that every work of scholarship is a cooperative effort, but in this undertaking, I accumulated an unusually large number of debts that require acknowledgment. First I should mention Owen Lancer, editor in chief at Facts On File, who recruited me to this project and who bore with me as I slogged through the alphabet. I owe a debt of gratitude to countless librarians and archivists all over the country who located seemingly irretrievable parcels of information. In some cases, I contacted family members to verify some aspect of a person's life or career. Simply to list all of them would take considerably more space than allotted to this preface. Inadequate though it seems, it will have to do to say that I appreciate the help given by everyone. Some of these people, however, provided assistance that cannot go unmentioned. I should begin by thanking the staff of the Mansfield Library at my home institution, the University of Montana. In particular, Donna McCrea, the university archivist, proved impressively knowledgeable and astonishingly resourceful in helping me track down obscure facts about largely forgotten people. The Russell Kirk Center proved unusually receptive and helpful; Annette Kirk was helpful and gracious beyond any normal expectation. Margaret Calhoon, the senior archivist and curator of Georgia Power (a Southern Company) and Elaine McConnell, the rare-book curator at the United States Military Academy at West Point, provided me with information I had just about despaired of ever finding. In addition to assistance from archivists and librarians, I received much-appreciated support from President George Dennison of the University of Montana and then-Provost Lois Muir of the same institution. Several research assistants helped track down obscure information; David Zierler, Melissa Cuzzart, and Shannon Michael did outstanding work.

Two people bore the greatest burden of this project. My wife, Susan Mayer, suffered my absence at times and places I should have been present while I struggled to complete the manuscript. Her company, Litigation Abstract, Inc., also provided technical assistance. Stewart Justman, a professor of liberal studies at the University of Montana and a literary critic of extraordinary ability, endured endless recountings of things I had discovered. He listened, read drafts of more than a few entries, discussed, argued, policed my propensity for wisecracks, and provided support in countless ways. To them go my boundless thanks.

For all of the valuable assistance I received, I must claim sole responsibility for any errors of fact or eccentricities of interpretation.

INTRODUCTION

Dwight D. Eisenhower assumed the presidency in January 1953 at a time of bitter partisan divisions and disillusionment. Problems at home and abroad had undermined the presidency of Harry S. Truman, who, by the time he left office, had lost the confidence of the American people. In the aftermath of victory over the Axis powers, the United States found itself engaged in a cold war with its wartime ally, the Soviet Union. The United States could do little more than watch as the Soviets consolidated their hold on Eastern Europe. Faced with these unexpected developments, some, particularly on the Republican right, blamed the diplomacy of President Franklin D. Roosevelt at the Yalta Conference. American interests suffered reverses in Asia, as well. Mao Zedong's (Mao Tse-tung's) Communists drove the Nationalist Chinese government from the mainland. The cold war turned hot when North Korea invaded South Korea and the United States intervened to prevent the fall of South Korea. The stakes ratcheted up when the Communist Chinese entered the conflict and the war settled into a bloody stalemate.

At home, revelations of real and imagined Soviet espionage whipped the American public into a state of fear. Alger Hiss was convicted of perjury, and Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were convicted of espionage. An FBI raid turned up classified documents from the State Department in the office of a small magazine devoted to American policy in Asia. Demagogues in both parties attempted to use the resulting anxieties for political purpose. None did so more spectacularly or more recklessly than Sen.

Joseph R. McCarthy (R-Wis.). Corruption plagued the Truman administration; several of Truman's top aides were implicated in scandals involving conflict of interest, and a number of high-ranking officials in the Bureau of Internal Revenue were dismissed or had to resign after it was revealed that they declined to prosecute tax evasion cases in exchange for money or political favors.

After 20 years of Democratic rule, dissatisfaction with the Truman administration seemed to open the door for the Republicans. Sen. Karl Mundt (R-S.C.) summed up the Republican strategy going into the presidential election of 1952 with the formula K_1C_2 (Korea, communism, and corruption). On the stump, Republican speakers hammered home their indictment of the Truman administration. The Republicans, however, needed to decide on a candidate. Conservatives in the party ardently supported Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio; the Eastern, or liberal, wing of the party backed Gen. Eisenhower. After a bitter struggle for the nomination, the Republicans nominated Eisenhower. The Democratic nominee, Adlai Stevenson, was not only saddled with the unpopularity of the Truman administration but had to run against a widely popular hero of World War II. In addition to being sick of Truman, the country did "like Ike," and Eisenhower won in a landslide. Republicans also gained control of both houses of Congress.

Eisenhower's presidency has undergone a radical reassessment by professional historians over the last 25 years. Once considered a detached, incompetent, genial former general utterly out of his depth as president, Eisenhower is now commonly regarded as an engaged, informed, and effective president. Moreover, the popular impression of the era over which he presided, that of a quiet, uneventful age of “Happy Days,” obscures the reality of a country undergoing profound social and economic change at home and engaged in a colossal global struggle with the Soviet Union abroad. To be sure, the United States had emerged from World War II as the most powerful and prosperous country in the world. During the Eisenhower era, the country experienced an economic boom and a baby boom; Americans were moving to prefabricated houses in the suburbs; veterans attending college on the G.I. Bill opened the door to the middle and professional classes for millions; college graduates flocked to take comfortable and secure jobs with large corporations. Yet, for all their wealth and power, Americans worried about the expansion of Soviet communism, about communist spies and sympathizers at home, and about the possibility of nuclear annihilation. Indeed, the 1950s was, as historian Carl Degler put it, an age of “affluence and anxiety.”

The image of Eisenhower as a disengaged, bumbling, grandfather-in-chief had a certain currency during Eisenhower's tenure in office, but grew more and more entrenched until the late 1960s and early 1970s, when the war in Vietnam and domestic unrest at home caused some historians to question the liberal consensus that had held sway since the end of World War II. In their search for alternatives, dissenting historians found one in Eisenhower, a president who ended one war and did not begin another, who presided over years of domestic tranquility, who cut defense budgets, and who warned of the influence of the military-industrial complex. At the same time, the opening of vast collections of papers at the Eisenhower Library in Abilene, Kan., in the late 1960s and early 1970s also influenced the direction of historical research. Changing political perspectives and access to new information combined to create an active interest in the Eisenhower presidency.

As the first products of this new scholarly interest appeared in the early 1970s, a fresh picture of Eisenhower began to emerge. Two themes dominated this revisionist scholarship. The first presented Eisenhower as far more engaged, intelligent, and articulate than had been commonly acknowledged; the second portrayed him as more politically conservative than generally believed. Not long after the publication of this first wave of revisionist scholarship, still more collections at the Eisenhower Library were opened to researchers. These included Eisenhower's personal papers as president and the papers of several of his top advisors. The availability of this new material generated another wave of historical writing that supported one of the early revisionist theses and called into question the other. Eisenhower's own papers strongly reinforced the idea that Eisenhower was a crafty politician, an informed and engaged leader, as well as a capable wordsmith. The opening of higher-level documentation called into question, however, the assertion that Eisenhower was a die-hard conservative. Indeed, explorations in the archives indicated that, although a fiscal conservative, Eisenhower fell well within the consensus on domestic politics established by Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal.

Since then, historians have crafted yet another image of the 34th president. Eisenhower appears to have been something of an American Disraeli. Just as the conservative British reformer stole the Liberals' thunder, Eisenhower preserved, strengthened, and expanded the basic structure of the New Deal. During Eisenhower's presidency, social security benefits were increased and coverage was expanded. The minimum wage and unemployment benefits were increased. The administration undertook huge new public works projects, including the Saint Lawrence Seaway and the National Highway System. Eisenhower also proposed new initiatives in public health and education, including plans for health reinsurance and federal aid for the construction of new schools, which Congress refused to pass. Finally, the administration made some real, if limited, progress in the area of civil rights for African Americans.

In evaluating Eisenhower's tenure in the White House, the first question to consider relates to Eisenhower's approach to the presidency. The once conventional view held that Eisenhower differed fundamentally from Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, who expanded the powers of the office. There was some truth to this. Eisenhower had a healthy respect for the constitutionally ordained separation of powers, and he did not seek to expand the powers of the presidency at the expense of other branches of government. However, even had he aspired to the kind of expansive role Roosevelt had played, it was not necessarily available to him. The Democrats controlled Congress for the last six of Eisenhower's eight years as president. Moreover, Eisenhower presided over a deeply divided party.

A second issue to consider is Eisenhower's management of the White House. As chief executive, Eisenhower was very much in command of his administration. Contrary to the once prevailing image, his chief of staff, Sherman Adams, neither kept information from Eisenhower nor made major policy decisions. Rather, he controlled the flow of paper and expedited the president's wishes. Eisenhower did indeed delegate authority, but he reserved the final say on policy to himself. He then left the articulation and implementation of policy to his subordinates. Fred Greenstein, a political scientist, has argued that Eisenhower practiced a "hidden hand" style of leadership. Eisenhower assembled a capable cabinet and let them do their jobs, within the broad lines of policies he established. His hand remained invisible to the public, and he was perfectly willing to let subordinates take credit for successful policies. This served Eisenhower's purposes, because the subordinates were also available to take the blame when things went wrong. When farmers were upset with the administration's agricultural policy, Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson absorbed the abuse. When conservative Republicans resented the administration's patronage practices, they went after Sherman Adams. After Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to Little Rock, Ark., to enforce a court order requiring the admission of black students to Central High School, Attorney General Herbert Brownell took most of the heat. Eisenhower remained largely untouched. A striking example of his approach came when Eisenhower suggested to his press secretary, Jim Hagerty, a possible answer to a question that would almost certainly come up in Hagerty's next press briefing. Hagerty objected, "But if I answer that way, I'll catch hell." Eisenhower walked around the desk, put his arm around Hagerty, and said, "Better you, my boy, than me."

Eisenhower's relations with Senator Joseph McCarthy, the red-baiting junior senator from Wisconsin, demonstrated Eisenhower's hidden-hand style of leadership. McCarthy had burst on the scene in 1950 with spectacular charges that Communists had infiltrated and subverted the federal government. The election of a Republican to the White House did not pacify McCarthy, and the senator from Wisconsin almost immediately made trouble for the new administration. McCarthy opposed the nomination of James B. Conant, the president of Harvard, whom Eisenhower selected to be high commissioner to Germany, largely because Conant had opposed a congressional investigation into subversive activities on his campus. McCarthy also opposed the nomination of Walter Bedell Smith, who had served as Eisenhower's chief of staff during World War II, to become undersecretary of state, because Smith had defended John Paton Davies, Jr., a diplomat whom McCarthy alleged was a communist. McCarthy took even greater exception to the nomination of Charles E. Bohlen as ambassador to the Soviet Union. In McCarthy's view, and that of others on the Republican right, Bohlen had been involved in what they regarded as President Franklin Roosevelt's "sell-out" of Eastern Europe at Yalta. A career foreign service officer, Bohlen had been at Yalta and during his confirmation hearings refused to repudiate the accords. Eisenhower despised McCarthy and his methods. He believed, however, that if a president attacked McCarthy directly, it would serve only to give McCarthy more publicity and would likely lead the Senate to rally around one of its own. Therefore, Eisenhower resisted pressure from some of his aides and his brother, Milton, to speak out publicly against McCarthy. Rather, he maneuvered behind the scenes first to oppose and then to help bring down the demagogue from Wisconsin. In an effort to gain confirmation for Conant, Eisenhower called McCarthy and sent Vice President Richard M. Nixon to talk to the senator. As a result of these overtures, McCarthy agreed not to make a floor fight, even though he remained "much opposed" to the nomination and voted against it. With respect to the nomination of Eisenhower's old friend Walter "Beetle" Smith, Eisenhower called Taft, the majority leader in the Senate, and told him to put an end to McCarthy's attack on the nominee. Taft did so, and Smith won confirmation. By working behind the scenes through Taft, Eisenhower denied McCarthy the headlines he so craved. In the case of Bohlen, Eisenhower persuaded Taft to put aside his natural inclination to oppose the nominee. Nevertheless, McCarthy obtained FBI raw files that contained vague and unsubstantiated rumors about Bohlen's personal life. McCarthy demanded that the Senate be given access not just to the FBI report but to the "entire file"; Eisenhower refused. The president once again delegated Nixon to talk to McCarthy. Nixon could not convince McCarthy to stop his active opposition to the nomination, but he did persuade the senator to moderate the attack somewhat. During the bitter debate in the Senate over Bohlen's nomination, Eisenhower publicly defended the nominee and worked behind the scenes to shore up support for Bohlen's confirmation. At Eisenhower's behest, Taft rallied a number of conservative Republicans who would otherwise almost certainly have opposed the nomination. As a result, Bohlen won confirmation easily. Yet another example of Eisenhower's approach came in April 1954 when he met with Joe Meek, a conservative

Senator Joseph McCarthy offers to give reporters a list of State Department employees he says are undergoing a security-loyalty check. (Library of Congress)

Republican and the party's nominee in the upcoming election for the Senate seat held by Paul Douglas (D-Ill.). The president agreed to support Meek on two conditions: that Meek support the administration's program if he won and that Meek not invite McCarthy to campaign for him.

In particular, Eisenhower cooperated with McCarthy's opponents in the Senate during the Army-McCarthy hearings. The hearings grew out of McCarthy's failed attempt to substantiate his charges that a "radar spy ring" existed at Fort Monmouth. The senator then turned his attention to the case of Dr. Irving Peress, a draftee dentist who had refused to sign a loyalty oath. After Peress refused to answer McCarthy's questions, he was promoted, according to the requirements of the doctors' draft law, and given an honorable discharge. Early in 1954, McCarthy called Gen. Ralph Zwicker, Peress's commanding officer, to testify before his committee. "Who," demanded McCarthy, "promoted Peress?" When Zwicker, a decorated war hero, professed not to know the answer, the senator browbeat and insulted him. Following this performance, Secretary of the Army Robert T. Stevens met with McCarthy and Karl Mundt (R-S. Dak.) at Sen. Everett Dirksen's (R-Ill.) office and agreed to release the names of those associated with Peress's promotion and to permit Zwicker to testify further in exchange for a promise that McCarthy would not abuse the general. McCarthy announced that Stevens had capitulated, and the press reported that the administration had surrendered to the senator. Stevens offered to resign, but Eisenhower would not hear of it. Instead, he told Stevens to admit that the army had made an administrative error. In the meantime, Eisenhower met with Dirksen and Mundt and got them to agree to keep McCarthy in line. The administration also responded by releasing a chronology that traced the efforts of McCarthy and his aide, Roy Cohn, to gain preferential treatment for Cohn's friend and associate, G. David Schine, who had recently been inducted into the army. McCarthy retaliated by charging that the army held Schine hostage in an effort to coerce the senator into dropping his investigation. During several weeks of nationally televised hearings, McCarthy's boorish behavior and his disregard for decency or procedure helped turn the American public against him. Before and during the hearings, Eisenhower repeatedly urged Republican leaders in the Senate to maintain order and proper procedures. When McCarthy attempted to expand the inquiry to include the actions of members of the White House staff, Eisenhower asserted "executive privilege" and refused to allow them to testify. During the hearings, Eisenhower and his administration worked closely with anti-McCarthy senators to help bring down the demagogue from Wisconsin. In December 1954, with the congressional elections behind them, the Senate voted 67-22 to censure McCarthy for behavior that brought the Senate into "dishonor and disrepute."

Some historians have questioned whether Eisenhower's tactics were the best or most expeditious way to put a halt to McCarthy's antics. Others, in particular Fred Greenstein, contend that "it is difficult to see how . . . another technique would have worked faster and more decisively in the context of the time." Robert Griffith, one of the most incisive historians to write about McCarthy, argues that Eisenhower's approach "arose in part from his realistic, if cynical, respect for McCarthy's support among Senate Republicans, in part from his personal dislike for the philippic mode. It also derived, however, from his sophisticated analysis of the relationships between McCarthy, the media, and the presidency." It seems clear that Eisenhower certainly was not the only, perhaps not even the most significant, factor in bringing about the ultimate downfall of the junior senator from Wisconsin, but it seems equally clear that he played a consequential role.

Earlier evaluations of Eisenhower criticized his lack of interest in party politics. More recent scholarship has made a persuasive case that Eisenhower actively led his party and attempted to strengthen its moderate wing. He found wielding patronage distasteful and left that largely to subordinates. He did, however, use his own immense popularity as an effective political tool by threatening to withhold his political support in an effort to keep congressional Republicans in line on key legislative items. When the House of Representatives rejected the administration's Health Reinsurance Plan, Eisenhower demanded the names of the Republicans who voted against it. "If any of those fellows who voted against that bill expect me to do anything for them in this campaign,” the president fumed, “they are going to be very much surprised.”

Yet one element of the indictment remains—Eisenhower failed to remake the Republican Party in his own, moderate, image. Part of that failure lay in the fact that Eisenhower always cared more about governing than building his own party. Perhaps the larger part of that failure, however, was that the party was deeply split along geographical and ideological lines, and the conservative wing of the party was particularly strong in Congress. Given those circumstances, one must ask whether anyone could have prevented the ultimate triumph of the right wing of the party.

The characterization of Eisenhower as an active, capable, and informed chief executive and a skilled politician has become an accepted paradigm. Toward what ends did he use that energy and political skill? Eisenhower frequently described his politics and policies as middle-of-the-road, and that was a reasonably accurate assessment. As mentioned above, the Democrats controlled Congress for three-quarters of his presidency. Had Eisenhower wanted to dismantle the New Deal, he never had the votes. Even when the Republicans controlled Congress from 1953 to 1955, there were more than enough Democratic and liberal Republican votes in Congress to block any attempt to repeal the New Deal. Beyond that, the American public did not want to see the New Deal undone. Roosevelt had established a broad consensus in favor of the notion that the federal government had responsibility both for the basic welfare of the American people and for the maintenance of prosperity. In a letter responding to criticism from his older brother, Edgar, a fervently right-wing Republican, Eisenhower lectured:

Should any party attempt to abolish social security and eliminate labor laws and farm programs, you would not hear of that party again in our political history. There is a tiny splinter group, of course, that believes you can do these things. Among them are H. L. Hunt. . . , and a few other Texas oil millionaires, and an occasional politician and businessman from other areas. Their number is negligible and they are stupid.

Simply noting, however, that neither Congress nor the American people wanted to eliminate the New Deal obscured an important point. Eisenhower never intended to dismantle the New Deal. He was part of that broad consensus.

The 34th president never came up with a catchy name for his domestic program. He tried “moderate progressivism,” “progressive moderation,” and “dynamic conservatism.” None of those had the ring of the New Deal, the Fair Deal, or the Great Society, but they did describe Eisenhower’s approach. As the first Republican president after the New Deal, Eisenhower consolidated, preserved, and expanded its basic structure. He established the New Deal consensus as truly bipartisan. Republican national candidates had stopped running against the New Deal after 1936, but they never held power until after the elections of 1952, in which they won the White House and slender majorities in both houses of Congress. People wondered what the Republicans would actually do with power. Eisenhower provided the answer.

While Eisenhower had no intention of turning back the clock to 1932, he believed that big government threatened free enterprise and individual initiative. Unlike some more recent conservatives, he did not limit these concerns to domestic programs. He worried that ever-expanding defense budgets would distort the economy, require high taxes, and stifle private enterprise. Accordingly, he strove mightily to balance the budget, but he was no doctrinaire economic conservative. Eisenhower managed to produce budget surpluses in 1956 and 1957 and to balance the budget in 1960 (there would be only one balanced budget between that time and the late 1990s—in 1969). Four of his five deficits came during recessions, including the highest peacetime deficit to that time, in 1959. In short, Eisenhower used Keynesian counter-cyclical spending to combat economic downturns. One student of fiscal policy, Iwan Morgan, has described Eisenhower with considerable accuracy as a “passive and half-hearted Keynesian.” Even passive and half-hearted Keynesianism has never been a characteristic of doctrinaire economic conservatives.

Aside from the question of the budget, Eisenhower forged an impressive overall economic record. Opponents at the time, and some historians since, have pointed out that, during the 1950s, economic growth in the United States lagged behind that of many other industrial countries. That, of course, missed the point that, unlike Great Britain, Europe, and Japan, the United States did not have to rebuild after World War II. Indeed, the American economy had expanded markedly during the war. The fact that the rate of growth in America was slower than in countries undergoing reconstruction during the 1950s was both inevitable and virtually meaningless. Family income rose sharply during Eisenhower's two terms, and median family income increased more than twice as much as the increase in the cost of living. Inflation averaged under 2 percent from 1953 to 1961. Especially in light of subsequent economic performance, Eisenhower's record has led a number of historians to give him high marks as a "manager of prosperity."

Eisenhower understood, as he made clear in the letter to his brother Edgar, that any attempt to abolish the New Deal would amount to political suicide. Beyond that, he personally believed that government had a role in people's lives. He believed in the maintenance of a basic welfare state; he believed that the government had a responsibility to maintain prosperity; and he believed in federal activity, as the Republican leader in the Senate, Robert Taft, put it, "where the objective is clearly beyond the power of that state or community to achieve." Eisenhower himself probably best summed up his approach when he stated that government should be liberal where people are concerned and conservative in dealing with their money.

In agriculture, Eisenhower attempted to cut back on the policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. When Eisenhower took office, the government had accumulated huge stores of surplus grain, cotton, tobacco, and other commodities. The surplus resulted from policies intended to maintain the purchasing power of farmers relative to other groups in the economy. If, at harvest time, prices for a supported crop had fallen below the designated price, a farmer who had planted no more than the number of acres fixed by the government could get a loan from the government for the supported price of the crop. The crop served as collateral. If the market price rose, the farmer paid back the government and took the crop. If the price fell, the farmer held on to the money and let the government keep the crop. As a result, the federal government found itself with huge stores of basic commodities.

Eisenhower's secretary of agriculture, Ezra Taft Benson, proposed a sliding scale of price supports (from 75 to 90 percent of parity) that was intended to move agriculture toward an open market and reduce the surplus. Farmers screamed bloody murder. In actuality, Eisenhower's predecessor had not supported full parity prices; during the Truman administration, agricultural price supports were pegged at 90 percent of parity. Reducing the subsidies left the already existing surplus stores of commodities in place. Attempts to sell off the surplus had not been especially successful, and storage costs had become expensive. Moreover, the very existence of mountains of stored commodities further depressed agricultural prices. To deal with the situation, the Eisenhower administration recommended that the surplus be given away through school lunch programs, disaster relief, stockpiles against a national emergency, and foreign aid. Eisenhower also favored reforestation of fallow acres, even if it required federal repurchase or regulation of private property.

Congress passed modest reductions in price supports in 1954. In 1956, the administration sent to Congress an agricultural bill that provided farmers with either cash or like compensation if they would leave land fallow. In that respect, it did not differ from New Deal policies, but Eisenhower also provided farmers with payment for putting land back into ungrazed grass, forest, or water storage. The Democrat-dominated Congress passed a bill including the administration program as well as a provision restoring subsidies to 90 percent of parity. Eisenhower vetoed the bill, and Congress could not muster the votes to override his veto. Eventually, Congress passed legislation establishing Eisenhower's Soil Bank. In spite of Eisenhower's reduction of agricultural subsidies, he left the basic structure of the farm program intact.

In other areas, Eisenhower oversaw the preservation and expansion of basic elements of the New Deal. In his first State of the Union message, he called for expanding "safeguards against the privations that too often come with unemployment, old age, illness, and accident." During his first year in the White House, the president proposed broadening social security to cover self-employed farmers, doctors, dentists, lawyers, and others. The proposal also included an increase in monthly benefits and a liberalized retirement earnings provision. Congress took no action, and Eisenhower renewed the recommendation in a special message to Congress the following year. Legislation in 1954 brought 10 million self-employed workers into the system, the largest expansion of Social Security since its inception. The new law also raised benefits.

In 1956, Congress amended the Social Security Act to include disability insurance, funded through the payroll tax and administered by the states. Disability insurance was expanded to include dependants of the disabled in 1958. As pressure built up to add medical care for the aged (Medicare), Sen. John F. Kennedy, running for the presidency, gave a speech at Hyde Park, by then a shrine to Franklin D. Roosevelt, on the 25th anniversary of the Social Security Act. Standing within sight of Roosevelt's grave, Kennedy ended a long-standing feud with Eleanor Roosevelt and endorsed Medicare. In response, the administration produced a plan, drawn up by Arthur Flemming, the secretary of health, education, and welfare. It provided for 180 days of hospitalization and covered most other medical expenses. The plan differed from Democratic proposals in that it would be paid for through the social security system, administered by private companies, and would include a means test. The plan encountered opposition from the left and the right. The American Medical Association branded it socialist; the AFL-CIO claimed that it was a boondoggle for insurance companies. Two conservative Democrats, Sen. Robert S. Kerr of Oklahoma and Wilbur Mills of Arkansas, chair of the House Ways and Means Committee, drew up a third alternative. Funded from general revenues, it provided federal grants to enable states to pay for medical care of elderly welfare recipients or elderly persons unable to pay their own medical bills. Ultimately, Eisenhower signed the Kerr-Mills bill, and it became law.

Under Eisenhower, the minimum wage was increased from 75 cents to $1 an hour, one of the largest percentage increases in history. After listening to various proposals from the cabinet, Eisenhower decided to propose an increase of 90 cents and compromise on $1. Congress passed the increase in 1955.

In some areas, Eisenhower expanded the legacy of the New Deal. His administration undertook several huge public works projects. Although these represented an expansion of New Deal style programs, they did not constitute a radical departure from past practice. Since the 1920s, Republican and Democratic presidents alike had advocated a project to convert the Saint Lawrence River into an inland waterway connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean. The Eisenhower administration proposed, and Congress passed, legislation establishing the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation to cooperate with Canada in building the Saint Lawrence Seaway. The project was completed in 1959.

If Eisenhower tended towards fiscal conservatism, he also proved to be a wise investor. The largest public works project of his administration was the interstate highway system. By the 1950s, overland transportation in America was little short of a disaster. Since World War II, the railroads had been in chronic financial trouble and had steadily cut passenger service. Highways, traditionally the preserve of state and local governments, had become increasingly inadequate. The continuing development of the automobile and inexpensive fuel made driving ever more attractive, and the resulting increase in traffic placed greater demands on roads. In addition, trucks offered the least expensive, quickest, and most convenient means of moving goods. Yet American highways had not kept pace with advances in, or America's reliance on, automobiles and trucks. Of American cities, only New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago had high-speed expressways. The country lacked four-lane highways to link its cities. The need was clear, and only the federal government could build a unified system of highways. In addition, the resources required for such an undertaking exceeded the capabilities of state and local governments. All of this fit Eisenhower's idea of an appropriate role for the federal government. Moreover, such a massive public works program would enable Eisenhower to respond to swings in the economy and in unemployment. Finally, the system could make evacuation of cities possible in the event of nuclear war and would facilitate the movement of military traffic.

President Eisenhower signs H.R. 8127, the 1954 Highway Legislation, May 6, 1954. (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Eisenhower appointed a commission headed by Gen. Lucius Clay to study the situation. The commission recommended the construction of an extensive national highway system with federal and state money. Conservatives opposed the undertaking. Roads had always been a function of the states, they argued, and the cost of the project was staggering. Eisenhower overcame conservative opposition by stressing the value of the highway system to civil defense. In Congress, his legislative leaders won votes by making concessions to representatives from major urban areas. In the end, Congress passed the Federal Highway Act of 1956, which provided for the construction of 42,000 miles of limited access, four- to eight-lane roads linking America's major cities. Federal taxes on fuels, tires, and commercial vehicles paid for the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways. By the end of Eisenhower's presidency, 7,500 miles of the system had been opened.

With reference to these public works projects, a prominent historian, William L. O'Neill, has called Eisenhower "a master builder." In subsequent decades, the United States, in effect, lived off of the investments made during the Eisenhower years. As O'Neill has pointed out, spending for infrastructure "has long been only a fraction of what it was in the 1950s." In the years since Eisenhower left office, the United States not only has failed substantially to expand the infrastructure Eisenhower bequeathed, but has maintained it poorly.

In another area, federally funded public housing, Eisenhower continued along a path similar to the one Truman had followed. In 1949, Congress passed a law providing for construction of 810,000 units of public housing over the next six years. When Truman left office, fewer than one-quarter of those units had been built; Truman had never requested construction of more than 75,000 units in a single year. The new Eisenhower administration submitted a request for 35,000 new housing starts in fiscal year 1954, which prompted the immediate and strenuous opposition of conservative Republicans in the Congress. The House stripped all public housing from the bill, but the Senate restored the administration's original request. The conference committee settled on the construction of 20,000 new units.

In 1954, the administration requested legislation to guarantee the construction of 1 million units of housing that year, largely through federal mortgage insurance, urban renewal, and lower requirements for down payments on federally insured loans for low-income housing. The measure also proposed continuing the federal public housing program for four years, with the construction of 35,000 units in each of the four years. When congressional Republican leaders objected, Eisenhower defended it as a basic need of the people. Once again, the House eliminated all public housing from the measure, and the Senate restored the president's original request. The conference committee produced a compromise that authorized 35,000 new housing starts in fiscal year 1955 but limited new public housing starts to the number of units of slum clearance. Eisenhower signed the bill; in doing so, however, he indicated that the job was "not all finished. . . . We shall need to continue our public housing program until the needs can be met by private industry."

Eisenhower's proposals for housing were more modest than Truman's, but the urgent housing shortage Truman faced had abated. If Eisenhower did not get everything he wanted from Congress, he got much of what he requested. If he asked for a bit less than Truman, the need was less acute. In many respects, Eisenhower's housing policy represented a continuation of the policy he inherited. His approach to housing issues was similar to his trimming of agricultural subsidies. In both cases, despite alterations and reductions, the basic structure of policy he inherited remained intact.

The Eisenhower administration proposed several new programs to improve public health. In 1953, Eisenhower sent a message to Congress that emphasized the need for expanded health insurance for the American people. While 92 million people had private health insurance, three-quarters of families with annual incomes below $2,000 had no insurance coverage. The following year, Eisenhower proposed a health reinsurance program. The plan set up a fund that would be used to assume 75 percent of any "abnormal losses" incurred by any approved private health insurance carriers that resulted from offering coverage to high-risk customers. The purpose of the plan was to reduce the cost of insurance and thereby make it available to more people. Ever concerned about what it regarded as socialized medicine, the American Medical Association lobbied hard against the program. So, too, did the major insurance companies, and the Chicago-based companies were especially effective in persuading midwestern Republicans. Liberal Democrats, who advocated a more extensive, centralized program, also joined in the opposition. Thus, opponents in Congress from the left and right combined to kill the plan.

The defeat of the reinsurance plan infuriated Eisenhower. "How in the hell," he demanded, "is the American Medical Association going to stop socialized medicine if they oppose bills such as this?" The president continued: "I don't believe the people of the United States are going to stand for being deprived of the opportunity to get medical insurance. If they don't get a bill like this, they will go for socialized medicine sooner or later and the Medical Association will have no one to blame but itself." This reaction revealed much about Eisenhower's approach to social issues. He supported basic social programs because he believed in them and because he believed that the American people demanded them. He also supported such programs because he feared that, in their absence, demands for change would take a direction he did not support or would go further than he deemed wise.

Along those lines, Eisenhower supported a limited federal role in the distribution of the Salk polio vaccine. Eisenhower was determined that “no child in the United States would be denied . . . [the vaccine] for want of ability to pay.” Congress acted favorably on Eisenhower’s request to appropriate $30 million in grants for distribution of the vaccine to children from the poorest families. Eisenhower also approved a plan for the orderly distribution of the vaccine. Under the management of Oveta Culp Hobby, the secretary of health, education, and welfare, distribution of the vaccine became something of a public relations nightmare. That did not, however, change the fundamental fact of Eisenhower’s support for an active, if limited, federal role.

Eisenhower also supported federal activity in other areas relating to public health. He obtained an increase in federal spending on hospitals and other medical facilities. Spending for public health, medical research, and hospital construction increased from $290 million in 1954 to almost $1 billion in 1960.

Education became a pressing issue during the 1950s. As the children of the baby boom reached school age, their sheer numbers created a crisis in education. School districts struggled vainly to find funding for enough teachers, classrooms, and textbooks to meet the demand. Recognizing that schools were a jealously guarded responsibility of local government, the Eisenhower administration sought the least controversial means for providing federal aid. A primary objection to federal aid to schools was that the federal government might dictate who would teach and what might be taught in schools. Therefore, in 1955, the Eisenhower administration proposed an ambitious federal initiative to provide aid in the least sensitive area, the construction of new classrooms. The proposal became hopelessly entangled with issues of school desegregation and whether federal funds should go to parochial schools. Conservatives regarded any federal involvement with schools as a threat to local control. Southerners worried that federal aid would act as the thin edge of the wedge of desegregation (the government might withhold federal funds to segregated schools). Adding weight to that concern, Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., an African-American member of Congress from Harlem, offered an amendment that would have prohibited federal aid to segregated schools. Catholics opposed federal assistance that excluded parochial schools. Confronted with determined opposition from these constituencies and their representatives, Congress rejected Eisenhower’s school construction bill.

In 1958, after the Soviet Union launched Sputnik and many Americans frantically worried that the United States had fallen behind the Soviets in technology, Eisenhower proposed and Congress passed the National Defense Education Act. The act provided low-interest loans for deserving college students and for grants to improve the teaching of math and science in the public schools. At least one historian has argued that the National Defense Education Act constituted the most significant federal contribution to education since the Morrill Land Grant Act. If so, its significance derived not from the nature or amount of the aid, but from the fact that it expanded the New Deal’s conception of federal responsibility for the national welfare to include education.

Historians have generally given Eisenhower low marks in the area of civil rights. Yet much of the criticism misses the mark. Eisenhower certainly was no drum major for civil rights, but he and his administration made important, if limited, contributions to the cause of civil rights. Eisenhower talked less about the issue than his predecessor or his successor, but his concrete accomplishments exceeded those of either Harry Truman or John Kennedy.

The Eisenhower administration appointed African Americans in unprecedented numbers and to unprecedented positions in the executive branch. Before Eisenhower became president, those few blacks in government service generally held either one of a few specific posts in domestic affairs that dealt with “Negro matters” or foreign-service assignments in black African countries. Eisenhower continued that type of appointment, but he also named African Americans to positions in no way connected to racial issues and appointed blacks to positions previously held only by whites. The appointment of E. Frederic Morrow as administrative officer for the Special Projects Group made Morrow the first African American to hold an executive position in the White House. Lois Lippman became the first black secretary to work in the White House.

African Americans took new positions throughout the executive branch. J. Ernest Wilkins received an appointment as assistant secretary of labor and, in that capacity, would become the first African American to represent a department of the executive branch in a cabinet meeting. African Americans held positions as chief of the Parole Board, chairman of the President's Employment Policy Committee, registrar of the Treasury, and associate general counsel in the Post Office Department. Eisenhower also appointed African Americans to less visible posts in the middle levels of government.

Not long after Eisenhower took office, the Pittsburgh Courier, one of the nation's leading black newspapers, rejoiced that "there are far more Negro faces around here now than at any time in the past twenty years." The Courier observed a marked contrast to the way things had been under Franklin Roosevelt and particularly Harry Truman.

Although Eisenhower opposed a compulsory federal Fair Employment Practices Commission, he set out to eliminate discrimination in employment by the federal government. Toward that end, he replaced an ineffective committee created by Truman with a new President's Committee on Government Employment Policy. In practice, Eisenhower's committee was only somewhat more effective than Truman's had been.

Eisenhower also attempted to deal with discrimination practiced by firms holding contracts with the federal government. As a first step, Eisenhower created a President's Committee on Government Contracts. Following the recommendation of that committee, Eisenhower issued an executive order requiring that all contracts with the federal government contain a clause prohibiting contractors from discriminating in hiring or promotion. The order further required that any subcontract contain a similar clause.

Eisenhower also made good on Truman's promise to desegregate the armed forces. There had been some limited progress in this area before Eisenhower became president, but most of that progress came about in response to the exigencies of combat in Korea, not executive action. Immediately upon taking office, Eisenhower moved to end segregation in the military. Even before the Supreme Court ruled segregated schools unconstitutional, the Eisenhower administration ordered the elimination of segregation in schools on military bases. The Eisenhower administration also undertook to desegregate Veterans Administration hospitals and civilian employees on military bases. Eisenhower's policies encountered opposition and did not always proceed quickly or without hitches. By the late 1950s, however, the official policy of nondiscrimination in the armed forces had gone a long way toward becoming a reality. The military had become one of the most integrated institutions in American life.

One of the most significant efforts the administration made to advance the cause of civil rights was its effort to desegregate Washington, D.C. When Eisenhower took office, Washington was a rigidly segregated city. During the campaign of 1952, Eisenhower had pledged to end segregation in the nation's capital. Upon taking office, the new president set about redeeming that pledge. Toward that end, he decided to make the District's Board of Commissioners a force for change. The commissioners began by taking steps to eliminate discriminatory hiring practices by the D.C. government itself. Next, in late 1953, the Board of Commissioners added a clause to all contracts with the District government forbidding discrimination in hiring or promotion by contractors and subcontractors.

The President's Committee on Government Contracts played an important role in the attempt to stamp out discrimination by quasi-public entities in the District. The committee entered long and arduous negotiations with the Capital Transit Company, which provided Washington's bus service, and the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company. Eventually, the committee gained concessions from both companies that opened jobs previously held only by whites to African Americans.

On another front, the Justice Department, under the leadership of Attorney General Herbert Brownell, entered a case against the Thompson restaurant chain. At issue were laws passed by Congress during Reconstruction that forbade discrimination in places of public accommodation in the District of Columbia. Although ignored for decades, these laws remained on the books. Attorneys for the Thompson restaurants argued that the laws had fallen into disuse and were therefore not enforceable. The attorney general himself appeared before the Supreme Court to argue for enforcement of the so-called lost laws. The Supreme Court ruled unanimously in favor of the government's position.

While the Thompson case was pending before the Supreme Court, Eisenhower invited owners of Washington's hotels and theaters to the White House and tried to persuade them to end segregation voluntarily in their establishments. The hotel owners were particularly recalcitrant. Even after the Thompson ruling, service for African Americans remained uncertain in Washington's hotels, and the fight for equal treatment in hotels passed to private organizations.

Eisenhower proved more persuasive in dealing with owners of movie theaters. In the 1950s, downtown movie theaters charged more than suburban theaters, basing their higher prices on the fact that first-run movies often took a year to make it to suburban theaters. Moreover, major studios owned some downtown movie palaces. Accordingly, Eisenhower asked leaders of the motion picture industry to desegregate the theaters they owned or controlled in Washington and to deny first-run films to other theaters in the District that continued to exclude African Americans or to segregate. Coupled with the efforts of local activists, the result was the rapid opening of major downtown theaters to black customers.

Eisenhower fell well short of his stated goal of ending "every vestige" of segregation in Washington. Yet his administration began the process and made significant progress towards that end. After the first year and a half of Eisenhower's presidency, African Americans faced a far less inhospitable environment in the nation's capital.

The initiatives to desegregate the armed forces, to eliminate discrimination among employees of the federal government, and to desegregate the nation's capital all came during the first 16 months of the Eisenhower administration. Its policy was one of active intervention in areas where the federal government had unquestioned authority and the executive branch had unilateral power. Eisenhower wanted neither to raise the issue of federalism nor to engage in a noisy battle with Congress. Where the executive did not exert unilateral authority, the administration relied primarily on attempts at conciliation and persuasion. This strategy produced substantial, if limited, gains.

Eisenhower seemed pleased with the results, but his approach became almost irrelevant on May 17, 1954. On that date, in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, the Supreme Court ruled that segregation in public schools violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. When Eisenhower entered the White House, the federal government had already entered the school segregation cases on the side of the black school children and filed a brief arguing against segregation. In response to a set of questions set forth by the Court, the Eisenhower administration filed a brief asserting that the Fourteenth Amendment "forbade all distinctions based on race or color." During oral arguments before the Supreme Court, Assistant Attorney General J. Lee Rankin argued that "segregation in public schools cannot be maintained under the Fourteenth Amendment." When the Supreme Court asked for further arguments on how to implement its decision outlawing segregation, Eisenhower took an active role in shaping the government's brief. In that instance, he toned down the brief prepared by two activist subordinates (Solicitor General Simon E. Sobeloff and Philip Elman, a lawyer in the Justice Department). Even with Eisenhower's modifications, however, the government brief argued for a somewhat more specific decree than the one the Court finally issued.

Without doubt, however, Eisenhower's most important contribution to the outcome of Brown was the appointment of Earl Warren to replace Chief Justice Fred Vinson. Warren proved instrumental in obtaining the unanimous decision in Brown. Some historians have contended that Warren's actions surprised and dismayed the president. In fact, Eisenhower was very involved in the nomination of Warren and, indeed, in all appellate judicial appointments. The often repeated story that Eisenhower came to regard the appointment of Warren as his greatest mistake simply has no basis in truth. Herbert Brownell, who worked more closely with Eisenhower on such matters than anyone, denied that Eisenhower ever said anything to that effect. The source for Eisenhower's supposed comment was an oral history interview with Ralph Cake, a right-wing Republican from the West Coast who detested Warren. Eisenhower did occasionally grumble about some of the Warren Court's decisions, particularly in the area of internal security, but he never lost confidence in Warren. To the contrary, Eisenhower told his press secretary, Jim Hagerty, in 1956 that Warren was becoming one of the great chief justices in history.

Historians have criticized Eisenhower for failing to endorse the Brown decision. Eisenhower always maintained that it was not his job to pass judgment on decisions of the Supreme Court; it was his job to enforce them. If he commented on the Court's decisions, he reasoned, inevitably he would be led to express his disagreement with a decision of the Court. This, in turn, would lead to questions about his willingness to enforce that decision. Eisenhower's position seems to have been based on principle; nonetheless, many southerners took it as an expression of displeasure with the Court's ruling.

Whatever the wisdom of refusing to comment on the Court's decision, Eisenhower did have reservations about Brown. He considered it an unwise exercise of federal power and an example of questionable judicial activism. He also thought that federal coercion would prove an ineffective means to end segregation and would therefore set back the cause of desegregation. Eisenhower favored a gradual end to segregation and hoped to avoid the use of coercive federal power. Whatever his disagreements with the Court's approach, however, he did not disagree with the basic principle established in Brown.

Moreover, when federal authority was challenged in Little Rock, Ark., Eisenhower acted forcefully. A federal district court ordered the admission of nine black students to Little Rock's Central High School in 1957. When first the governor of Arkansas and then a mob prevented the black students from entering Central High, Eisenhower nationalized the Arkansas National Guard and sent paratroopers from the elite 101st Airborne Division to enforce the federal court's order.

The Eisenhower administration did more to advance civil rights than enforce federal court orders. Brownell submitted civil rights legislation to Congress in 1956. The Democratic party controlled Congress, and the Democratic leadership wanted no part of an internecine battle over civil rights during an election year. The majority leader in the Senate, Lyndon Johnson, buried the bill in committee. The administration resubmitted its proposals in 1957. Without the immediate pressure of an election, Johnson concluded that some bill would have to pass for the good of both the Democratic party and his own presidential ambitions. Johnson guided the bill through Congress, but in the process, he removed the bill's most far-reaching provisions and effectively gutted it. As it passed, the bill created a Civil Rights Division in the Justice Department, established a Civil Rights Commission, and contained provisions to protect voting rights. The bill Johnson engineered was a shadow of the administration's proposal, but it was, nevertheless, the first civil rights legislation to pass Congress since Reconstruction. In 1960, Eisenhower went back to Congress and got stronger protection for black voting rights. Like the Civil Rights Act of 1957, the Civil Rights Act of 1960 proved insufficient to protect black voters in the South. However, Eisenhower's two civil rights laws paved the way for the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Eisenhower's appointments to the federal judiciary in the South constituted his greatest contribution to civil rights. The liberals and moderates he appointed to the areas most affected by the Brown decision insured an ongoing process of desegregation. When compared to appointments made by his predecessor and successor, Eisenhower's achievement stands out in dramatic relief. One of these nominees in particular, Simon E. Sobeloff, won confirmation over bitter and determined opposition by segregationists. The judges Eisenhower appointed to the Fourth and Fifth Circuit Courts of Appeal oversaw the dismantling of the system of segregation in the South. In appointing these judges, Eisenhower accomplished his purpose. They would enforce the Supreme Court's mandate, but, by the very nature of the American legal system, the process would be a gradual one.

In spite of the myriad domestic problems he faced, Eisenhower devoted the majority of his time as president to foreign policy. He took office at a time when the cold war burned hot in Korea, when relations with the Soviet Union seemed to threaten to explode into a mushroom cloud, and when new nations began to emerge from the wreckage of European colonialism. In a dangerous and unstable world, the Eisenhower administration charted a course for the United States that would influence much of the rest of the century.

Much as was the case in domestic policy, Eisenhower inherited a consensus in foreign policy from his predecessor. With the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan, Truman had established a consensus in favor of the policy of containment. Eisenhower functioned within that consensus in foreign policy; indeed, he had helped to create it. He passed on the consensus intact to his successor, John F. Kennedy. Nevertheless, as was the case with domestic policy, and perhaps to an even greater extent, Eisenhower differed in his methods and style from both his predecessor and successor. While Truman and Kennedy tended to provoke confrontation, Eisenhower sought to downplay international tensions. Despite that significant difference in style, Eisenhower pursued the same objectives and fought the cold war with the same commitment as presidents before and after him.

Eisenhower came to the White House with broad experience in foreign policy. He had commanded a multinational military coalition during World War II, and the concerns of international politics had been the very essence of his job as supreme allied commander. Dealing with Joseph Stalin, Winston Churchill, and Franklin D. Roosevelt provided him an advanced education in diplomacy at the summit. In addition, he handled with great skill the problems of an international military alliance, which included managing strains on that alliance created by nationalist egomaniacs like Field Marshal Bernard Law Montgomery of Great Britain and General George S. Patton of the United States. After the war, Eisenhower served as the army chief of staff and supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In short, he had been a major figure in American defense and foreign policy since World War II. He knew world leaders on a personal, often fairly intimate, basis, and his knowledge of and relationships with these leaders informed his foreign policy.

For secretary of state, Eisenhower chose John Foster Dulles, who was typical of Eisenhower's appointments to his cabinet. Capable and forceful, Dulles was ready to take the credit when things went well and, more important from Eisenhower's perspective, available to take the blame when things went wrong. While Eisenhower made the final decisions with respect to foreign policy, he allowed Dulles to articulate and implement those policies. In general, it should be said, the two men agreed on the basics of foreign policy. Dulles was inclined to take a somewhat harder line on some issues, but the president and his secretary of state were very much in accord with respect to their general approach.

Some of the earliest revisionist works on Eisenhower were written by New Left historians in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Disillusioned by the policies of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations that led to the war in Vietnam, New Left historians searched the past for an alternative and found one in Eisenhower, a president who ended one war and did not begin another. The idea of a military man as a man of peace held a strong attraction for these dissenting historians. While that image contained an element of truth, it was overdrawn. Eisenhower was a dedicated cold warrior. Although reluctant to commit American forces, he was willing to use covert operations to achieve his goals. Setting aside the overstatement, at least some part of the New Left analysis of Eisenhower remains persuasive. In his conduct of the cold war, Eisenhower differed from Truman before him and Kennedy after in that he sought to avoid confrontation and to defuse tensions. A good example came in July 1954, when Chinese Communists shot down a British commercial airliner. Two U.S. aircraft carriers from the Asian fleet (which were off the coast of Indochina in response to the crisis faced by the French army at Dien Bien Phu) were sent to aid any survivors. The ships came under attack by Communist Chinese fighter planes, and they shot down two of the Chinese planes. Rather than play up the incident, Eisenhower maneuvered to ease tensions. By any standard, it was a far more serious incident than when the Soviet Union shot down Korean Air Lines flight 007 in the 1980s. Unlike the situation facing President Ronald W. Reagan in the 1980s, the United States was directly involved; American carriers had been attacked while on a rescue mission, and they had shot down two Chinese planes. Yet, while most people have probably heard of the incident involving KAL 007, very few are aware of the earlier episode. Rather than ratcheting up the tension, Eisenhower sought to calm things down.

Despite differences in style, Eisenhower's approach to foreign policy had much more in common with Truman than it did with that of the right wing of his own party. The Republican party was deeply divided between the eastern (also known as the liberal or internationalist) wing of the party and the conservative, or midwestern, wing. Like the Democrats, liberal Republicans placed their faith in multilateral defense pacts and regarded the developed nations of Europe as the primary area of American interest. Eastern Republicans also supported Truman's basic approach to the cold war, including the Truman Doctrine and Marshall Plan, large defense budgets, universal military training, and conscription. In contrast, conservative Republicans rejected both the Europe-first orientation of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations and collective security arrangements. They preferred to see the United States chart its own course and look after its own interests; moreover, they believed that the future lay not in Europe but across the Pacific. Conservative Republicans opposed universal military training and conscription in peacetime as threats to individual liberty and to the republic. On all of these issues, both during the Truman years and his own administration, Eisenhower sided with the eastern Republicans and the Democrats.

At the same time, Eisenhower believed that the Truman administration had failed to balance its conduct of the cold war and America's international commitments with the country's limited resources. Especially in the earliest days of the cold war, Eisenhower thought that Truman and his advisors had overestimated the military aspect of the Soviet threat, which he regarded, at least in the short term, as primarily political and economic. Further, Eisenhower repeatedly expressed concern about the high level of defense spending by the Truman administration.

His critique of the Truman administration's conduct of the cold war formed the basis for Eisenhower's foreign policy. He came into office determined to reduce defense budgets and did so. Not only did Eisenhower think that Truman spent more on the military than was necessary to provide adequate defense, he worried about what such huge defense budgets would do to the economy and ultimately to democratic institutions. Eisenhower's "New Look" defense policy, which relied on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent, grew largely out of his desire to keep defense spending in check. The New Look provided for an expanded strategic air force and reductions in conventional forces. Secretary of Defense Charles E. Wilson summed up the policy with the unfortunate phrase "more bang for the buck." Expensive though weapons systems were, they offered a less expensive means of projecting force than the use of conventional forces. In addition to Eisenhower's determination to cut military costs, the New Look was a reaction to the Korean War, which cost American lives and treasure, was divisive at home, and strained relations with America's allies. Eisenhower regarded "our young men" as "our most valued, our most costly asset," and he proclaimed his intention not to "use them any more than we have to." Finally, preparing to fight a conventional war in Europe, where the Soviets had natural strategic and logistical advantages and where the Soviets enjoyed an enormous advantage in men and conventional weapons, struck Eisenhower as senseless. In contrast, the New Look focused on situations in which the United States had the natural advantage.

In typical fashion, Eisenhower delegated the articulation of the New Look to Dulles. In an address to the Council on Foreign Relations in January 1954, the secretary of state explained that the United States would deter further communist aggression by aiding local defenses and developing "massive retaliatory power." This, he explained, would enable the United States to "retaliate, instantly, by means and at places of our choosing." The New Look would provide "maximum deterrent at a bearable cost." This did not mean that the United States would resort to all-out nuclear war to meet every exigency. Local defenses, perhaps supplemented by tactical nuclear weapons if necessary, would often serve as an adequate deterrent in most circumstances. Behind all other defenses, however, lay the threat of an all-out nuclear response to deter communist aggression.

Truman's proposed defense budget for fiscal year 1954 was $45 billion, a level Eisenhower regarded as unsustainable. While Eisenhower regarded the Soviet Union as a threat, he doubted that Soviet leaders would risk a general war. Rather, he believed that the United States faced a prolonged period of international tension. In that long struggle, he thought, excessive defense spending threatened to weaken the American economy by contributing to budget deficits and inflation. Further, the taxes needed to support such high levels of defense spending would hamper the free enterprise system and foster the growth of statism. Eisenhower and his administration reduced Truman's defense budget for 1954 to $43.2 billion and projected spending $40 billion for defense in 1955 and $35 billion in 1956. By ending the war in Korea and implementing the New Look, the Eisenhower administration was able to reduce defense budgets substantially. Spending for defense fell to $37.5 billion in 1955 and roughly $33.5 billion in 1957. Eisenhower's last defense budget was $40 billion. In his farewell address, Eisenhower observed that the cold war had resulted in a larger military and enormous military spending. "The conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry," the president pointed out, "is new in the American experience," and its "total influence—economic, political, even spiritual—is felt in every city, every statehouse, every office of the federal government." While recognizing the necessity of a large and powerful military establishment, he warned that "we must not fail to comprehend its grave implications." "In the councils of government," he admonished, "we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex."

The most pressing matter facing Eisenhower when he became president was the ongoing war in Korea. Eisenhower worried that the war drained American resources and raised doubts about the credibility of the United States. Thus, he wanted to end the war. Toward that end, Dulles hinted to the Indian prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, that, if the negotiations in Korea collapsed, the United States might widen the war and resort to nuclear weapons. Two weeks later, the North Koreans and Chinese acceded to the western demand for the voluntary repatriation of prisoners, which removed the last substantial obstacle to an armistice. Eisenhower and Dulles were convinced that their nuclear diplomacy brought the Communists to an agreement. That analysis underestimated other factors, but, in all probability, the Eisenhower administration's threats to use nuclear weapons constituted one of several factors that pushed the Chinese and North Koreans to agree to a settlement. Some historians have suggested that the warnings the administration intended to pass on to the Chinese through India may not even have reached the Chinese, but, in any case, the Chinese certainly knew of Eisenhower's campaign rhetoric, which called for a more aggressive policy in Korea. On the other hand, any impact those threats might have had was most likely offset, at least partly, by the Chinese belief that the Soviet nuclear arsenal would deter the United States from using nuclear weapons. The continuing heavy toll of casualties suffered by the Chinese and North Koreans certainly provided an incentive for them to seek a truce. Moreover, Stalin died in March 1953, and the Soviet Union's new leaders pressed their allies to end the war at an early date. Finally, having prevented the forcible reunification of Korea under the auspices of the Western powers, China's leader, Mao Zedong, could claim a victory of sorts. Even if the administration's nuclear diplomacy did not account alone, or even primarily, for the end of hostilities, the armistice ended a bloody stalemate that was unpopular at home, caused problems with allies, and cost an enormous amount of money as well as tens of thousands of American lives.

Eisenhower inherited a cold war and a divided Europe from his predecessor. Stalin's death and hints about the possibility of "peaceful coexistence" from the collective leadership that succeeded him prompted Eisenhower to explore the possibility of reaching an accord with the Soviet Union. Some of his advisors, Dulles in particular, remained skeptical of Soviet intentions. Nonetheless, Eisenhower did not want to miss the opportunity if, indeed, it existed. In April 1953, Eisenhower delivered a major speech, titled "A Chance for Peace," to the American Society of Newspaper Editors, in which he eloquently discussed the cost of the arms race and outlined the conditions for a general reduction in tensions. Ultimately, however, Eisenhower and his administration became convinced that the Soviet "peace offensive" amounted to nothing more than a cynical attempt to divide the Western alliance, and little came of the "chance for peace." The use of Soviet tanks to put down rioting in East Germany in June 1953 served to confirm the Eisenhower administration's skepticism about Soviet intentions.

The British prime minister, Winston Churchill, pushed for an early summit meeting with the new leaders of the Soviet Union. Eisenhower turned aside Churchill's calls for an early summit and focused on building the Western alliance. Toward that end, he adopted a plan to rearm West Germany and integrate its forces into the European Defense Community. The plan encountered opposition from the French, who remained worried about the prospect of German rearmament. Never enthusiastic about a European Defense Community, the British took the opportunity to suggest that West Germany be admitted to NATO. The British suggestion prevailed, and the Paris Accords of October 1954 provided for West German sovereignty and the creation of a West German army integrated into the defense structure of NATO. The Federal Republic of Germany formally entered NATO in May 1955. The Soviet Union responded by forming its own military organization comprising Eastern European nations, known as the Warsaw Pact.

For all his doubts about the intentions of the Soviets, Eisenhower repeatedly expressed his concern about the escalating nuclear arms race. In December 1953, three months after the Soviet Union detonated a thermonuclear device, Eisenhower gave a speech at the United Nations General Assembly in which he called on all nuclear powers to donate a set amount of fissionable material to be used for peaceful purposes under the auspices of the United Nations. The Soviets rejected "Atoms for Peace," as the initiative became known, which put the United States in a favorable light, but, even had the Soviets accepted it, the proposal would have done nothing to halt the arms race.

The Soviet Union surprised the West in 1955, however, by agreeing to conclude a peace treaty with Austria. The treaty provided for the end of military occupation and established Austria as an independent, neutral nation. Seeing the possibility of an opening, European nations urged Eisenhower to hold a summit conference with the Soviet Union. Eisenhower remained skeptical, and Dulles warned about the possibility of a trap set by the communists. Nevertheless, Eisenhower somewhat reluctantly agreed to a summit meeting at Geneva in July 1955. At the summit, Eisenhower proposed that the United States and Soviet Union exchange blueprints of military installations and permit mutual aerial surveillance. Britain and France joined the so-called Open Skies initiative, but the Soviets rejected it. Geneva produced no agreements of substance, but it did establish a warmer diplomatic climate. The "Spirit of Geneva" represented the first thaw in the cold war.

By the middle of the decade, various successes gave the administration cause to be confident in their conduct of the cold war. The Soviets had failed to prevent the rearmament of West Germany and its incorporation into NATO; they had settled for the neutralization of Austria; and their "peace offensive" had been upstaged by Eisenhower's proposal for "Open Skies" at Geneva. Further, Khrushchev's secret speech at the Twentieth Party Congress in February 1956 acknowledged the failures of socialism, denounced Stalin's crimes, and repudiated the doctrine of inevitable conflict between socialism and capitalism, opting instead for "peaceful coexistence." The Eisenhower administration obtained a copy of the speech and released it to the New York Times. In an effort to keep up the pressure on the Soviet Union, the United States sent radio broadcasts encouraging the "captive peoples" of Eastern Europe to liberate themselves from the Soviet Union.

In late October 1956, strikes, demonstrations, and rioting broke out in Poland, which led to the return to power of Władysław Gomułka, whom the Soviets had ousted from the Polish government and imprisoned in 1949 because of his "Titoist" leanings. Back in government, Gomułka had the temerity to insist that the Soviet model was not the only road to socialism. A furious Khrushchev threatened to send Soviet troops into Poland but then backed off when the Poles reassured him that their nation would remain within the Soviet bloc.

Inspired by events in Poland, young Hungarians took to the streets on October 23 demanding the return to power of Imre Nagy, a reformer whom the Soviets had deposed a year earlier. Seizing an opportunity presented by the Western alliance's preoccupation with the Suez crisis, Khrushchev decided to send Soviet troops and tanks to crush the rebellion. Hungarian street fighters met the tanks with stones and firebombs in a heroic but futile effort to turn back the Soviet invaders. As the fighting escalated, the Central Committee named Nagy premier on October 24, but even that failed to satisfy the protesters. On October 30, Nagy's government promised to establish a multiparty system and hold free elections. The Soviet government responded with an announcement that "socialist nations can build their relations only on the principle of full equality, respect of territorial integrity, state independence and sovereignty, and noninterference." Attempting to allay Soviet anxieties and prevent an escalation of violence, Eisenhower issued a statement denying that the United States regarded new governments in Eastern Europe as "potential military allies." Events, however, moved the situation beyond the point where Eisenhower's assurances could satisfy the Soviets. On November 1, Nagy announced the withdrawal of Hungary from the Warsaw Pact, declared his nation's neutrality, and appealed to the United Nations to defend that neutrality. In the United Nations Security Council, the Soviet Union vetoed an American-backed resolution calling on the Soviet Union to withdraw its forces from Hungary. At this point, Khrushchev sent a massive Soviet force into Hungary and installed a puppet government. Approximately 20,000 Hungarians died in the ruthless repression of the Hungarian independence movement. Nagy was arrested and later executed. Hungarian appeals for help from the West went unanswered. Eisenhower concluded that any overt American intervention in the Hungarian crisis would lead to war with the Soviet Union. Further, in such an intervention, all tactical and logistical advantages would have rested with the Soviet Union. For all the compassion he felt for the Hungarian people, he was not willing to risk a general war.

Eisenhower's perpetual attempts to contain the U.S. defense budget encountered a particularly difficult test after the Soviet Union launched the first man-made satellite, Sputnik, in October 1957. The next month, the Soviets launched Sputnik II, which weighed over 1,000 pounds and carried a live dog. In addition, Khrushchev bragged about the development of an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM). Many in the United States, including many leading politicians, panicked. Democrats, in particular, criticized Eisenhower for allowing America's defense to deteriorate. Eisenhower responded calmly both to the Soviet launch of Sputnik and to the storm of criticism at home.

Well before the launch of Sputnik, in the spring of 1957, the National Security Council commissioned a panel, headed by H. Rowan Gaither of the Ford Foundation, to study Soviet offensive capabilities. Presented to the president in November, after the launch of Sputnik, the report presented a grim evaluation of the relative strength of the United States and the Soviet Union. It predicted that, by 1959, the USSR would be able to launch 100 ICBMs carrying nuclear warheads against the United States. In addition, it warned that the manned bombers of the Strategic Air Command would be vulnerable to such an attack. Extrapolating from existing trends, the report warned that the Soviets would achieve nuclear and technological superiority by 1960. It recommended that the United States embark on a program to develop missiles, develop an early warning system, and build a national system of fallout shelters to protect the civilian population. In addition, the report urged an expansion of America's conventional forces. Eisenhower thought the report unduly pessimistic and rejected many of the panel's findings. The president particularly objected to the $40 billion price tag for the committee's recommendations. Eisenhower's suspicions turned out to be correct; the report was erroneous. Nevertheless, the report was leaked to the press, which fueled the panic over Sputnik.

In the aftermath of Sputnik, Eisenhower appointed James R. Killian, Jr., president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, as special assistant for science and technology. At the same time, the president established the President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC) to advise him on scientific matters and named Killian to head it. In addition, and mostly to calm public fears, he asked for a supplemental appropriation of $1.2 billion to make the Strategic Air Command less vulnerable. None of this, however, did much to ease the anxiety of the American public. To the public's further alarm, in December 1957, the Navy's Vanguard rocket lifted a few feet off the launch pad and exploded. That was followed by a series of rockets exploding on the launching pad and rockets fired with faulty trajectories. On January 31, 1958, the United States launched Explorer, the first successful American satellite. It went higher than Sputnik but weighed only 18 pounds (the first Sputnik weighed 184 pounds).

In his response to Sputnik, Eisenhower refused to succumb to panic, assessed the military and technological situations accurately, rejected hysterical responses, and held the line on reckless increases in defense spending. The historian Stephen Ambrose called Eisenhower's response to Sputnik "one of his finest hours." Further, Ambrose doubted that "any other man could have done what Eisenhower did." Ambrose's assessment both of Eisenhower's evaluation of the situation and his policies in response to it, while perhaps a bit breathless, sensibly gave Eisenhower credit for saving "his country untold billions of dollars and no one knows how many war scares." Yet the fact remains that, however sure his judgment and grasp of policy, Eisenhower was less successful in reassuring the American public. This was, in part, because, as Robert Divine pointed out in his account of Sputnik, Eisenhower's assessment relied on classified information he could not make available to the public without compromising American intelligence capabilities. Thus, Eisenhower could not explain the reasons for his seeming lack of concern, and contemporaries, as Divine put it, "saw [Eisenhower's] calm reaction as proof of his complacency, if not senility, and condemned him for a lack of leadership." Divine concluded that, even while "the passage of time has confirmed the wisdom of the president's response," Eisenhower was unable to convince the public. As a result, he was forced to approve some increases in defense spending that he regarded as unnecessary.

Europe once again became a flash point in the cold war in November 1958, when Khrushchev announced that the Soviet Union intended, at an early date, to sign a separate peace treaty with the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) and extend formal recognition to that country. This would have terminated the occupation rights of the United States, Great Britain, and France in West Berlin and, as Khrushchev pointed out, would have left them to deal with East Germany for access to the city. Eisenhower refrained from making a public statement in response. Later that month, Khrushchev proposed that West Berlin be established as a "free city" under the United Nations and that the occupying powers withdraw all military forces from the city. He set a six-month deadline for the Western powers to negotiate a settlement along those lines. If no agreement were reached by May 27, 1959, declared the Soviet premier, the Soviet Union would unilaterally proceed to sign a treaty with East Germany.

Khrushchev was not acting on some whim. West Berlin was an irritant to him; it served as a constant reminder of the disparity in standards of living between East and West Germany. In addition, a steady flow of East Germans, including many intellectuals and skilled workers, fled to the West by entering the western sector of Berlin. During the decade before Khrushchev's ultimatum, nearly 3 million East Germans found refuge in West Berlin. On the other hand, the vulnerability of the small Western enclave, surrounded by hostile territory and hostile forces, provided Khrushchev with some leverage against the Western powers.

The Western allies disagreed on how to respond to Khrushchev's ultimatum. Eisenhower thought it important to "leave no doubt in the Soviets' minds of our intentions" not to yield on Berlin, yet he wanted to avoid any provocation. He fully intended to resolve the matter through diplomacy. Among America's allies, the British took the most conciliatory position. While drawing the line at formal diplomatic recognition of the German Democratic Republic, they leaned toward working out some sort of an arrangement with the East Germans short of formal recognition. The French, once again under the leadership of Charles de Gaulle, adopted a somewhat ambiguous position. De Gaulle did not much like the idea of a reunified Germany but thought it best for the West to take a firm stand on West Berlin. He was content to await developments before embarking on a specific course. The West German chancellor, Konrad Adenauer, took the hardest line. He strongly objected to any move toward recognizing the German Democratic Republic and therefore accepting a permanent division of Germany. The willingness of the British to engage the East Germans short of formal recognition caused him considerable alarm.

Eisenhower and Dulles managed to compose allied differences and obtained a statement from NATO supporting Western access to West Berlin. They also got France, Great Britain, and West Germany to join the United States in coordinated replies to the Soviet Union, which asserted that the agreements reached by the allies regarding Germany at the end of World War II could be terminated only by mutual consent. In January 1959, Eisenhower and Dulles proposed negotiations with the Soviets on the German question at the foreign-minister level to be held in mid-April. The carefully calculated offer of negotiations in advance of Khrushchev's deadline gave the Soviet leader room to back down without losing face, and, over the succeeding weeks, Khrushchev cautiously retreated from his confrontational position. A significant step came when the Soviet premier agreed to a conference of foreign ministers from the United States, Soviet Union, Great Britain, France, Poland, and Czechoslovakia.

In the meantime, pressures began to build for a summit meeting between Eisenhower and Khrushchev. The British prime minister, Harold Macmilllan, went to the Soviet Union in March 1959 and reported that Khrushchev was willing to push back the deadline of May 27 in exchange for a summit conference. Eisenhower, who had always maintained his willingness to meet Soviet leaders but insisted that there be a reasonable chance of progress toward agreements, resisted calls for a summit.

Nikita Khrushchev and President Eisenhower about to board a helicopter to Camp David, September 15, 1959 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Before the foreign ministers' conference convened on May 11, Dulles's failing health forced him to resign. Increasingly incapacitated by the stomach cancer that would soon kill him, the secretary of state informed Eisenhower in April that he was no longer able to meet the physical demands of his job. Eisenhower quickly made arrangements for Christian A. Herter, a former governor of Massachusetts then serving as undersecretary of state, to succeed Dulles, who submitted his formal letter of resignation on April 15. The administration announced Herter's appointment three days later.

Herter had served as acting secretary of state during Dulles's illness, but he had neither Dulles's stature nor his rapport with Eisenhower. At the foreign ministers' meeting in Geneva, negotiations quickly bogged down. The ministers quietly took a recess from their stalled talks to attend Dulles's funeral in Washington, D.C., on May 27, ironically the original deadline for Khrushchev's ultimatum.

Although Eisenhower continued to resist what he later described as "a summit without more than a blind hope to justify it," Macmillan continued to press for a summit meeting. All the while, Khrushchev alternated between belligerent bluster and occasional hints of accommodation. With the foreign ministers' talks deadlocked in late June, Eisenhower issued an invitation to Khrushchev to visit the United States. Khrushchev quickly accepted, and the trip was arranged for September. Eisenhower maintained that his meeting with Khrushchev would be an informal conversation between himself and the Soviet leader, a "prelude to a summit." The agreement for a meeting between the two leaders did nothing to further the foreign ministers' talks, which ground to an unsatisfactory and inconclusive end on August 5. Eisenhower had one more bit of business to take care of before Khrushchev came to the United States. The president visited western Europe to reassure leaders there that he would not make any deals with Khrushchev without consulting the Europeans.

After a whirlwind tour of the United States in mid-September, Khrushchev went to Camp David to meet with Eisenhower. The Soviet leader pushed hard for a summit, but Eisenhower refused to negotiate under the threat of Soviet recognition of East Germany. Finally, Eisenhower agreed to pull back from his demand for progress in lower level talks and to attend a summit in the spring of 1960. Khrushchev withdrew his demand for a fixed deadline and his plan for a separate peace treaty with East Germany. The face-to-face meeting settled little; essentially, the two leaders agreed to continue negotiations. That, however, proved enough to defuse the crisis. Thanks to Eisenhower's resolute but cautious diplomacy, the Berlin crisis ended not with a bang but a whimper.

Perhaps Eisenhower's handling of the Berlin crisis can best be appreciated by comparing his response to a virtually identical ultimatum Khrushchev issued to Kennedy three years later. Kennedy took a belligerent stand, sent a 1,500-man battle group over the autobahn to West Berlin to demonstrate American resolve to defend West Berlin, appointed Gen. Curtis LeMay (an outspoken advocate of big bombers) to head the air force, and made a terrifying speech to the nation. The United States and Soviet Union faced off like gunfighters in the old West, and rattled their nuclear weapons. Ultimately, Kennedy settled for negotiations, which, like those in 1958 and 1959, failed to resolve the German question.

Throughout the Berlin crisis, Eisenhower faced considerable pressure to increase conventional forces and military spending, yet he steadfastly refused to yield to such calls. Democrats in Congress used the incident to attack the reductions in conventional forces and defense spending Eisenhower proposed in 1958. In particular, Democrats opposed the administration's plans to cut 55,000 men from the military during what they described as a time of crisis. Some Democrats, most notably those with presidential ambitions in 1960, called for a $3 billion increase in the defense budget. In a meeting with Republican congressional leaders on March 10, 1959, Eisenhower rejected the idea that the dispute over Berlin was "a great crisis." With respect to Democratic demands to know why he was reducing American forces, Eisenhower cited other uses for the $250 million those men would cost. He mentioned schools, hospitals, and other needs. Then he asked the Republican leaders to look at the matter another way: "What would these 55,000 men do if we had them? Certainly they are not going to fight a land war in Europe. How could a land war be fought successfully against the great number of divisions that are available on the other side of the Curtain?" "It is perfectly clear," the president went on, "that you can't provide security with a checkbook. . . . If these people decide to put another $3 billion into the budget every time Russia tries to push, they might as well go all the way to a garrison state." If the Democrats wanted to add such huge sums to the budget, the president thought that "they at least ought to raise taxes to pay for it," but, he mused, "they don't have the courage." Eisenhower dismissed the Democratic posturing as “a hysteria that is largely political.”

The president did not restrict such comments to meetings with aides or congressional leaders. On March 11, the day after his meeting with Republican legislative leaders, Eisenhower held a press conference in which he faced hostile questioning about his intent to reduce the size of the army. A clearly irritated Eisenhower responded: “What would you do with more ground forces in Europe? Does anyone here have an idea? Would you start a ground war? We are certainly not going to fight a ground war in Europe. What good would it do to send a few more thousands or even a few divisions of troops to Europe?” In the end, Eisenhower skillfully navigated the Berlin crisis, both at home and abroad. He avoided a war without yielding anything to the Soviets, while at the same time managing to avoid unnecessary increases in military spending.

Part of the resolution of the Berlin crisis was a summit scheduled for spring 1960, the agenda for which included disarmament. Eisenhower had repeatedly expressed concern about the escalating nuclear arms race but had failed to reach an agreement, even within his administration, on a workable proposal for disarmament. In October 1957, Isidor Rabi, a physicist from Columbia University, told Eisenhower that, given the advantage the United States enjoyed over the Soviets in nuclear technology, a suspension of nuclear testing would serve the interest of the United States. Although other top scientists, including Edward Teller and Ernest Lawrence, strongly disagreed, the idea of a test ban appealed strongly to Eisenhower. It would save money and maintain America’s lead in technology. Further, the public, both in the United States and abroad, had become increasingly concerned about the radioactive fallout generated by atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons, a concern that Eisenhower shared. Until 1958, the Eisenhower administration made any suspension of nuclear weapons testing contingent on the willingness of the Soviets to agree to a verifiable limit on the production of nuclear weapons and a reduction of conventional forces. The Soviet Union consistently rejected those conditions.

Several factors, however, led Eisenhower to reexamine that position. Public worries about the dangers of fallout continued to exert pressure on the administration. Congressional hearings on the dangers radioactive fallout posed to public health heightened the public’s concern. Changes within the administration, too, opened the door to a reconsideration of the policy on testing. James Killian and the PSAC provided an alternative source of technical advice to the Atomic Energy Commission’s strong opposition to a test ban. Ironically, the resignation of Harold Stassen, Eisenhower’s special assistant for disarmament and one of the strongest voices in the administration in favor of a test ban, also helped pave the way for rethinking the policy on testing. Dulles, who jealously guarded his turf, resented what he regarded as Stassen’s encroachments into the State Department’s territory. The secretary of state, therefore, often opposed Stassen’s proposals. With Stassen’s departure, however, Dulles seemed more willing to consider a test ban; indeed, Dulles emerged as one of its strongest supporters in the administration. In February 1958, Eisenhower considered releasing a statement announcing a unilateral cessation of testing. Only the strenuous opposition of Lewis Strauss, the head of the Atomic Energy Commission, persuaded him not to do so.

After completing a series of nuclear tests in which they exploded 11 bombs in two weeks during March 1958, the Soviets announced a unilateral suspension of testing and called on the United States to do the same. Even before the Soviets made the announcement, the CIA had learned of their intention to do so. Knowledge of the upcoming Soviet announcement sparked an intense debate within the administration. While the Atomic Energy Commission and the Defense Department insisted on the necessity of continued testing to maintain the United States’ advantage in nuclear weaponry, Dulles warned that the Soviet proposal put the United States in an unfavorable light with respect to world opinion. While sympathetic to Dulles’s position, Eisenhower ultimately yielded to the AEC and Defense Department. For one thing, the president regarded the timing of the Soviet offer with suspicion. It came after the Soviet Union had completed an extensive series of tests and just as the United States was about to embark on one. Such considerations led Eisenhower to reject the Soviet offer as a “gimmick.”

Even as he decided to reject the Soviet proposal, Eisenhower fully understood the propaganda advantage the Soviets stood to gain. He was particularly frustrated that, as he put it, the "United States . . . seeking peace, is unable to achieve an advantageous impact on world opinion." Acting on the report of a panel headed by nuclear physicist Hans Bethe, which concluded that the technology existed to detect most nuclear testing without extensive on-site inspections, Eisenhower proposed technical talks with the Soviets on the means to verify a permanent ban on the testing of nuclear weapons. Eisenhower then invited the nuclear powers (Great Britain and the Soviet Union) to enter into negotiations for a test ban treaty and announced that the United States would suspend testing for a year if the Soviets would do the same. Khrushchev accepted Eisenhower's offer to negotiate. The timing allowed the United States to complete its scheduled round of testing. Eisenhower ordered a moratorium on testing to begin on October 31, 1958.

The Conference on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Weapons Tests got under way in Geneva on October 31, 1958, and stalled immediately. Going into the talks, Eisenhower's scientific advisers informed him that off-site technological monitoring systems had proved less effective than predicted, particularly for smaller underground tests. Consequently, at the talks, the United States insisted on an extensive regime of inspections. Khrushchev accused the United States of manipulating the data to justify more intrusive inspections. Despite these frustrations, Eisenhower was determined to achieve a ban on nuclear testing, and he hoped for some actual disarmament as well. On February 11, 1959, he announced his willingness to accept a treaty that would end all testing in the atmosphere, the oceans, and outer space and provide for monitoring of underground tests. In March, the Soviets indicated a willingness to accept Eisenhower's proposal if the United States also agreed to a moratorium on low-kiloton tests underground. The unverifiable cessation of small underground tests for an indeterminate period ran counter to a long-accepted American position, but Eisenhower decided to counter with an offer of an unsupervised moratorium of underground testing for one year, which he was willing to extend to two years. In April 1959, Eisenhower proposed a ban on atmospheric testing as a first step, pending an agreement on a verifiable comprehensive test ban.

Eisenhower resisted pressure from the Atomic Energy Commission and the Defense Department to resume testing after the moratorium expired on October 31, 1959. In discussions within the administration regarding a resumption of American testing, Eisenhower became particularly heated in his insistence that he would approve no atmospheric testing. When George Kistiakowsky, a chemist from Harvard University who replaced Killian on the PSAC in mid-1959, reported that there was no pressing need for testing in the immediate future, Eisenhower extended the moratorium on American testing to the end of 1959. The British and Soviets followed suit. When the technical talks broke up amid a flurry of mutual acrimony and accusations in late 1959, Eisenhower announced that the United States would not resume testing without advance notification. Khrushchev responded that the Soviets would not resume testing unless the West did. For the remainder of his presidency, Eisenhower refused to approve any nuclear testing. Early in 1960, Kistiakowsky suggested a ban on atmospheric and underwater testing accompanied by a suspension of underground tests registering above 4.75 on the Richter scale. The threshold was sufficiently high that it required at least some on-site inspections in the Soviet Union for verification. Eisenhower announced the new position in February 1960, accompanied by a proposal for a joint effort by American, British, and Soviet scientists to improve seismic detection techniques so that the threshold might be progressively lowered. In March, the Soviets agreed to the concept, with the condition that the Western powers agree to a four- or five-year moratorium on all tests below the 4.75 threshold pending completion of the joint research project. In a contentious meeting with his top security advisers, Eisenhower insisted that the international political advantages of an agreement banning atmospheric testing and large underground tests, even with problems monitoring the cessation of smaller underground tests, far outweighed any impediments it might pose to the American program of developing nuclear weapons. He preferred a moratorium of one year but was willing to extend it to two years, contingent on other powers' reciprocation. The president thought it best to do it through executive action, rather than a formal treaty, because he was nearing the end of his presidency and thought it best not to tie the hands of his successor. In addition, he wanted to avoid potential opposition in the Senate. Macmillan signed on to Eisenhower's position, and the two leaders thought that any remaining details could be ironed out at the upcoming summit in Paris. Eisenhower issued a statement on March 29 setting forth his position. At a press conference the following month, Eisenhower announced that he, Macmillan, and de Gaulle had agreed that disarmament should be the main topic at the summit meeting.

Indeed, many had high hopes for the Paris Summit, but those hopes were dashed. Beginning in 1956, Eisenhower had authorized overflights of the Soviet Union by high-altitude U-2 aircraft to gather intelligence. These flights were scheduled to be replaced by reconnaissance satellites, due to become operational in 1960. The U-2 had the ability to fly at an altitude of 70,000 feet, which placed it out of the range of Soviet interceptors or surface-to-air missiles. Although Soviet radar could detect the flights, Eisenhower and Dulles figured that the Soviets would not publicly complain, because to do so would be to admit the limitations of their air defenses. Still, Eisenhower recognized the provocative nature of such flights and therefore insisted that each operation be cleared with him. As he moved toward détente with the Soviets at the end of the 1950s, Eisenhower carefully weighed the diplomatic risks of each flight against the potential yield of intelligence, and he countermanded most of the missions proposed to him. In a meeting with aides in early 1960, he said that his "one tremendous asset" going into the upcoming summit was his "reputation for honesty." If the Soviets shot down one of those aircraft while he was engaged in "apparently sincere deliberations," it would destroy the president's effectiveness. However, the U-2 flights provided valuable hard intelligence. Moreover, they confirmed his suspicions about the limitations of the Soviets' long-range missile program, which, in turn, solidified his resolve to hold the line on defense spending, despite demands for increased spending from the military and congressional Democrats. In addition, the overflights provided evidence that refuted Democratic charges that Eisenhower had allowed the Soviets to gain a dangerous advantage in missiles. Thus, in April, he approved one final U-2 flight.

On May 1, 1960, the Soviets shot down a U-2 aircraft piloted by Francis Gary Powers. Eisenhower's military and intelligence advisers informed him that, in the event of a mishap, the pilot would most likely not survive and had a suicide pin in case he did. Any evidence of espionage would be eradicated by self-destruct systems in the aircraft. The CIA neglected to inform the president that the self-destruct mechanism required the pilot to activate it. Upon learning of the missing aircraft, Eisenhower decided to leave the next move to Khrushchev. The president figured that if the Soviet premier were sincere about the summit, he would downplay the incident, much as Eisenhower himself had done when the Chinese shot down the British airliner in 1954. When Khrushchev announced on May 5 that Soviet forces had shot down a spy plane, Eisenhower authorized release of a prearranged cover story that a high-altitude NASA weather plane had been missing since May 1. Khrushchev then went before the Supreme Soviet on May 7 and announced that he had both the pilot, who had survived, and the intact wreckage of the spy plane. Further, he announced that the pilot would be tried for espionage. Khrushchev said that he was prepared to grant that Eisenhower had no knowledge of the mission and blamed the flight on “militarists” in the American government. To accept the out that Khrushchev offered would have served to confirm charges by his political opponents that Eisenhower was out of touch. Eisenhower initially acquiesced in the efforts of his advisers to insulate him from responsibility, but these efforts only made the situation worse. The inept and confusing efforts to keep the president clear of the incident played into Khrushchev’s claims that militarists in the Pentagon were out of control and into Democratic campaign charges that Eisenhower was out of touch. In the end, Eisenhower decided to accept responsibility. On May 9, Eisenhower met with congressional leaders, explained the U-2 and its history, and told them that “we will now just have to endure the storm.” Herter announced on May 9 that Eisenhower had authorized U-2 overflights for several years. He justified them as an effort to prevent another Pearl Harbor. At a press conference two days later, Eisenhower defended the flights as an effort to protect the United States against a surprise attack and stressed that he saw no reason why this dispute over “an unarmed nonmilitary” plane should jeopardize progress on important issues at the upcoming summit.

Khrushchev’s motives remain a mystery. His actions seemed to indicate that he intended to torpedo the summit, but he had consistently pushed for it. The flight clearly infuriated Khrushchev, who was already facing opposition to his policy of “peaceful coexistence” from hard-liners at home and the Chinese abroad. Further, a recent trip to France had convinced him that he would not be able to divide the allies on the question of Berlin. In an effort to shore up his own position, he issued a series of angry public statements denouncing American aggression and warning that the Soviet Union would do whatever was necessary to defend its sovereignty. He also threatened to retaliate against any nation that provided bases for the U-2. There was, however, something disingenuous about his fury; after all, Soviet satellites flew over the United States daily, and some of the photographs taken from those satellites had appeared in Soviet newspapers. In his column for the New York Times, James Reston speculated that, having realized that Eisenhower had no intention of pulling out of Berlin, Khrushchev used the U-2 incident to blame the United States for the failure of the summit. De Gaulle thought that the Soviet leader had second thoughts about having Eisenhower address the Soviet people on television. Another possible explanation is that Soviet scientists arrived at the same conclusion Kistiakowsky had—that a test ban would benefit the Americans. Eisenhower himself suspected that Khrushchev intended to use the incident to drive a wedge between the NATO allies.

On the day before the opening session of the summit, Khrushchev circulated a set of demands that he must have known Eisenhower could not possibly accept, including a formal apology for the U-2 incident, punishment for those responsible, and a promise that there would be no more such flights over Soviet territory. In fact, Eisenhower had ordered an end to the U-2 overflights before he left for Paris. He intended to announce the cessation at the opening of the summit in a speech that stressed America’s desire to negotiate a settlement of the Berlin issue and a test ban treaty. Khrushchev’s demands, however, placed Eisenhower’s attempt at conciliation in a very different light. The president had no intention of appearing to give in to Khrushchev’s demands. Moreover, if Eisenhower’s assessment of Khrushchev’s motives was right, the Soviet leader had miscalculated. The crisis, if anything, drew the Allies closer together.

At the opening session of the summit on May 16, de Gaulle had hardly called the meeting to order when Khrushchev demanded to speak. The Soviet premier launched into a highly emotional tirade against the United States and insisted on receiving satisfaction concerning the U-2 incident before proceeding to other matters. At the end of his harangue, Khrushchev withdrew the invitation for Eisenhower's visit to the Soviet Union that summer. A furious Eisenhower refused to apologize for attempting to protect the security of his country. Yet he did assure the Soviet leader that he had unilaterally suspended further overflights for the rest of his administration. Khrushchev refused to be placated. Macmillan and de Gaulle tried unsuccessfully to move to other matters, but the Soviets walked out. The summit collapsed even before it began.

The U-2 incident and the failed summit thwarted Eisenhower's ambition to achieve a significant thaw in the cold war during the last months of his administration. Negotiations in Geneva over a test ban dragged on until August but failed to reach any agreement on the question of on-site inspections or the duration of the moratorium on small-yield underground tests. It was Eisenhower's greatest disappointment as president.

While many historians have praised Eisenhower's restraint in dealing with the Soviet Union and the cold war in Europe, some have argued that he exercised less restraint in his use of force in the Third World. While such an analysis contains an element of truth, it presents too stark a dichotomy and too simple a picture of the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy. In some respects, the restraint and caution with which Eisenhower managed relations with the Soviets, particularly in Europe, was less evident in his dealings with the Third World. On the other hand, Eisenhower's policies with respect to the Middle East, Asia, and Latin America demonstrated similar objectives—to limit risks for the United States and not to allow local problems to lead to a major confrontation between superpowers.

From early in his administration, Eisenhower faced a series of crises in Asia. On September 3, 1954, the Communist Chinese initiated a sustained bombardment of the Quemoy and Matsu islands, located just off the coast of mainland China but held by the Nationalist Chinese. These islands were considerably closer to the coast of China than to Taiwan (Formosa), to which the Nationalist Chinese fled in 1949. Quemoy and Matsu had little strategic value for the defense of Taiwan, but the Nationalist leader, Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi), placed large garrisons on the islands and used them to launch raids against the mainland and against Chinese Communist shipping.

The Eisenhower administration remained uncertain about what, exactly, the Communist Chinese intended with respect to the offshore islands. The Joint Chiefs of Staff informed Eisenhower that the islands were not necessary to the defense of Taiwan and that Chiang could not hold them without help from the United States. The Joint Chiefs recommended putting American forces on the islands and conducting bombing raids on the mainland. Eisenhower flatly rejected their recommendation. Nevertheless, Dulles had earlier warned that any attack on the offshore islands might provoke an American military response. Moreover, the China Lobby, which had support within the right wing of the Republican party, wanted an aggressive response. In late October, the mainland Chinese appeared to be preparing for an invasion. During the next month, the Chinese bombed other small islands held by the Nationalists and continued their buildup across from Quemoy and Matsu.

At this point, the Chinese upped the ante by announcing that 13 American pilots who had been shot down over China during the Korean war had been convicted of espionage. The action outraged many in the United States. Sen. William Knowland (R-Calif.), a leading voice for the China Lobby (critics derisively referred to him as the Senator from Taiwan), demanded a blockade of China. Eisenhower thought the idea foolish and, in a press conference, lectured that "the hard way is to have the courage to be patient." The administration explicitly stated its commitment to defend Taiwan and the Pescadore (Penghu [P'eng-hu]) Islands, which lay near Taiwan, but said nothing about other islands. The shelling of Quemoy and Matsu continued, and in December Dulles negotiated the Mutual Defense Treaty with Chiang, in which the two parties agreed that an armed attack on one would be regarded as an act of war against the other. At Eisenhower's insistence, however, the treaty limited the American commitment to defending Taiwan, the Pescadores, and "such other territories as may be determined by mutual agreement." In addition, Dulles extracted from Chiang a pledge not to launch an attack on the mainland without American approval.

The crisis intensified in January 1955. Chiang warned of the possibility of "war at any time," and, on the other side of the Straits of Formosa, the mainland Chinese announced that an invasion of Taiwan was "imminent." On January 10, the Communist Chinese bombed the Tachen Islands. The following week, they seized Ichang, an island just north of the Tachens. Faced with the prospect of a Chinese invasion of the Tachens, Eisenhower decided that the United States would not defend that island group. At the same time, he made a decision to ask Congress for a resolution authorizing him to use American forces to defend Taiwan and the Pescadores. Dulles wanted to include Quemoy and Matsu in the resolution, but Eisenhower refused. On January 24, Eisenhower sent a message to Congress asking for a resolution granting him authority to use armed force, "if in his judgment it became necessary," to defend Taiwan, the Pescadores, and "closely related localities." The resolution did not mention Quemoy or Matsu, and Eisenhower refused to commit himself publicly beyond a statement that he would not commit American troops to defend Quemoy and Matsu unless he became convinced that an attack on the islands was a precursor to an attack on Taiwan. Congress overwhelmingly passed the resolution.

Chiang wanted assurances of an American commitment to defend Quemoy and Matsu if he withdrew from the Tachens. Eisenhower, however, would give no such guarantee. On January 19, Eisenhower agreed to Dulles's proposal that the United States provide assistance if the Nationalists evacuated the Tachens. Chiang reluctantly agreed to abandon the islands, and the evacuation, which began on February 4, was completed in less than a week. Much to everyone's relief, the Chinese Communists did not attack.

The question of Quemoy and Matsu remained. Eisenhower's deliberately ambiguous diplomacy may have, as intended, left the Chinese uncertain about American intentions, but it had the same effect on America's allies. Western European countries thought it reckless to risk a war over those islands and were alarmed at the prospect that the United States might do so. The British prime minister, Winston Churchill, understood why the United States could not permit Chiang "and his adherents . . . to be liquidated and massacred by Communist China," but he thought that a very different matter from Chiang's ability to hold the offshore islands and use them as bridgeheads for Nationalist actions against the mainland.

Eisenhower explained his thinking on the offshore islands in a letter to General Alfred M. Gruenther, supreme commander of NATO forces, on February 1, 1955. "Now, if the solution we adopt should state flatly that we would defend the principal islands of the offshore group (Quemoy and the Matsus)," he wrote, "we would not please the Chinese Nationalists, but we would frighten Europe and of course even further infuriate the Chinese Communists. . . . By announcing this as a policy we would be compelled to maintain in the area, at great cost, forces that could assure the defense of islands that are almost within wading distance of the mainland." From a military perspective, the matter was simple, but there were other considerations. Eisenhower understood that the Europeans considered Americans "reckless," but he noted that a large majority of Americans did not want to allow Taiwan to fall to the Communists. Indeed, some wanted more aggressive action. Eisenhower saw himself as caught between "the truculent and the timid, the jingoists and the pacifists." A further consideration was the morale of the Nationalists on Taiwan. All of this accounted for the nature of the congressional resolution "passed by Congress at my request." "The wording as to areas outside Taiwan and the Pescadores" Eisenhower explained, "is vague. In view of what I have just said, you can understand why this is so."

Dulles raised the stakes on March 15, when he stated that the United States was prepared to use tactical atomic weapons in the event of an attack on Taiwan. At a news conference on March 16, Eisenhower said that he saw no reason why nuclear weapons "shouldn't be used exactly as you would use a bullet or anything else.” In his memoirs, Eisenhower wrote that “I hoped this answer would have some effect in persuading the Chinese Communists of the strength of our determination.” Whatever their effect on the Chinese, such statements certainly alarmed European leaders; but, in fact, Eisenhower did not want to go to war over barren rocks in the Straits of Formosa. In a meeting with some top advisers on April 1, Eisenhower stated that war with China over Quemoy and Matsu was “undesirable.” He explained that America’s allies would not support a war over the islands and that public opinion in the United States was divided. The president also worried about the effect such a war would have on the American economy. From Eisenhower’s perspective, a “desirable solution” would be for Chiang to pull voluntarily back from the islands, in exchange for which Eisenhower was willing to station American forces on Taiwan. At the very least, Eisenhower hoped to persuade Chiang to reduce the number of forces on Quemoy and Matsu.

Through mid-April, Eisenhower and Dulles tried to move Chiang towards this position. Chiang, however, intended to keep his forces on the islands and wanted an American commitment to defend Quemoy and Matsu. Finally, on April 23, Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai), the Chinese foreign minister, offered to negotiate, and Eisenhower took up the offer. The Chinese reduced their shelling of the islands and by mid-May stopped it entirely. In addition, the Chinese released the American prisoners, and talks between Chinese and American representatives began on August 1. The talks failed to resolve the issue of the offshore islands, but served to end the crisis.

Eisenhower and Dulles regarded the incident as an example of the effectiveness of atomic diplomacy. Subsequent decades have failed to produce agreement among historians. Many have criticized Eisenhower and Dulles for taking the country to the brink of war over the offshore islands. Richard V. Damms concedes that the threat to use atomic weapons may have contributed to the Chinese decision to seek a relaxation of tensions but concludes that “the threat of massive retaliation did not deter the PRC [People’s Republic of China] from seizing the offshore islands.” Further, the incident led Mao “to initiate China’s own atomic bomb programme” and “seriously strained relations between the United States and its European allies.” In contrast, Robert A. Divine lauds Eisenhower for introducing “a note of deliberate ambiguity into American policy.” Eisenhower, he maintains, “used a measured nuclear threat to warn the Chinese without insulting them or provoking them into an attack.” “The beauty of Eisenhower’s policy,” concludes Divine, “is that to this day no one can be sure whether or not he would have responded militarily to an invasion of the offshore islands.” Stephen E. Ambrose considers Eisenhower’s handling of the crisis a “tour de force.” “He never had to use the bomb; he did not plunge the world into war; he kept the peace without losing any territory or prestige.” According to Ambrose, in addition to keeping the world in the dark about his intentions, Eisenhower himself did not know whether he would have used nuclear weapons. The commander in chief kept his options open, and he never knew “just how he would respond to an invasion of Quemoy and Matsu, because he insisted on waiting to see the precise nature of the attack before deciding how to react.” From Eisenhower’s perspective, he achieved his objectives. At the end of the day, Chiang held Quemoy and Matsu; the United States had clearly committed to defend Taiwan; and a war had been avoided.

The diplomacy of Eisenhower and Dulles ended the crisis of the moment, but did not resolve the underlying issue of the offshore islands, which heated up again in 1958. Chiang had built up his forces on the islands, despite protests from the mainland Chinese, and on August 23, the Communist Chinese once again began shelling the islands. By that time, however, the Soviet Union had a formidable nuclear capacity, which changed the context of the crisis. Eisenhower strengthened American naval forces in the region but refused to give Chiang a commitment to defend the islands. The Communist Chinese escalated the crisis by using aircraft to bomb the islands and by initiating a blockade. Dulles wanted a clear statement of the administration’s intention to defend the islands, but Eisenhower worried that, given such an assurance, Chiang might deliberately provoke a confrontation and thus drag the United States into war with Communist China. Dulles also supported the use of tactical atomic weapons, but Eisenhower thought otherwise. If the United States used atomic weapons, he argued, the Soviets might retaliate with atomic weapons against Taiwan, and the use of atomic weapons would result in “a worldwide feeling of revulsion against the United States.”

As was the case with the first confrontation over the islands, Eisenhower had to balance a myriad of considerations. The Asia-Firsters in his own party demanded strong action. Many Americans, however, could not fathom going to war over small islands half a world away. Further complicating matters, the British held to the position they had taken during the first crisis in the Formosa Straights: the islands were not worth a world war.

Much as he did in the earlier confrontation over Quemoy and Matsu, Eisenhower pursued a diplomacy of ambiguity. The key to an American response was whether Eisenhower judged an attack on the islands to be a forerunner of an attack on Taiwan. In any event, if his hand were forced, Eisenhower was willing to consider military measures only to thwart the mainland Chinese invasion; he rejected the idea of attacks on the mainland to punish China, at least in the initial phase. In the meantime, he authorized the use of the United States Navy to escort Nationalist Chinese ships to resupply the garrisons on Quemoy and Matsu.

Eisenhower approved a statement, issued by Dulles on September 4, that warned of a possible American retaliation in the event of an outright invasion of the islands. The statement also invited Communist China to resume talks on the status of Taiwan. On September 6, Zhou Enlai indicated the willingness of the People's Republic of China to resume negotiations. On September 11, however, Eisenhower gave a nationally televised speech apparently intended to reassure the Asia-First wing of the Republican party as well as Chiang. The president said that the United States was bound by its treaties and that there would be no retreat. With respect to the upcoming talks, he promised that “there is not going to be any appeasement.” At the same time, he assured the country that “I believe there is not going to be any war.” The speech provoked some harsh criticism at home and abroad.

Amid continued shelling of the islands, talks resumed in mid-September. In early October, the Communist Chinese suspended their shelling of the islands. Eisenhower took the opportunity to send Dulles to Taiwan to persuade Chiang to reduce his garrisons on the islands. While the Chinese Nationalist leader refused to withdraw, he did agree to issue a statement renouncing the use of force to regain the mainland. The Chinese Communists responded favorably. They announced that they would fire on Nationalist resupply convoys only on odd days of the month, effectively permitting resupply on the even days. Ultimately, Chiang reduced his garrison, although not to the degree Eisenhower recommended, and the Communists ceased their bombardment.

As was the case with the first crisis, historians have drawn differing conclusions about the way Eisenhower handled the incident. Damms argued that the episode “raised questions about the credibility of Eisenhower's nuclear strategy.” In contrast, Ambrose concluded that “the crisis passed, without war, without retreat, without putting an intolerable strain on NATO, and without a loss of face by the ChiNats [Nationalist Chinese] or the United States. Eisenhower had used a combination of threats, firmness, and resolve, combined with a willingness to negotiate and be reasonable, to achieve an outcome satisfactory to him.”

One of the most complex and vexing set of issues confronting the Eisenhower administration related to the disintegration of the European colonial empires and the emergence of new, independent nations, 37 of which came into existence between 1946 and 1960. Eisenhower personally found colonialism repugnant, and neither he nor Dulles had any intention of supporting colonialism in Africa, Asia, or the Middle East. On the other hand, the administration needed to maintain the cooperation of the British and the French, particularly in Europe but elsewhere as well. Further complicating matters, American policy under Eisenhower sought to prevent the emerging nations from turning to communism, and, while he recognized the burden European colonialism placed on that effort, his administration often opposed communist-led nationalist movements. Eisenhower gave considerable thought to the appropriate tactics for meeting what he regarded as communist aggression in the developing nations. Nuclear war was unacceptable, and Korea had demonstrated the pitfalls of conventional war. Moreover, Eisenhower had been greatly impressed by the effectiveness of covert operations during World War II and turned to covert operations as a low-risk, low-cost means of meeting communist challenges in what came to be known as the Third World.

The administration's first encounter with Third World nationalism came in Iran, where in May 1951 the nationalist government of Prime Minister Mohammed Mossadeq nationalized the country's oil industry, including the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, of which the British government owned 52 percent. The British government shut down the refinery at Abadan (then the world's largest), withdrew its technicians, and organized an international boycott of Iranian oil. The boycott had a ruinous effect on Iran's economy. Oil accounted for roughly 30 percent of Iran's national income and as much as 60 percent of its foreign exchange. Iranian oil production fell to something over an eighth of what it had been. However devastating the consequences of the boycott and the withdrawal of technicians, they served to harden Mossadeq's resolve not to submit. "It is better," he said, "to be independent and produce only one ton of oil in a year than to produce 32 million tons and be a slave to Britain." Western diplomats found Mossadeq a strange, rather ridiculous, figure; he conducted business in his pajamas, broke into tears at the drop of a hat, and was given to fainting spells. That perception, however, clouded their view of a man who was the product of a wealthy landowning family and was, as the historian Robert Divine described him, "a shrewd politician who exploited the nationalist grievances that all Iranians felt towards the British." Fearing that any concessions would make him appear to be a British pawn, Mossadeq refused to compromise, and, in October 1952, broke off diplomatic relations with Great Britain. In the meantime, Mossadeq used the situation to gain more extensive powers from the Iranian parliament.

The British prime minister, Winston Churchill, hoped that the incoming Eisenhower administration might resolve the crisis. Mossadeq, on the other hand, urged Eisenhower to give economic aid to Iran and to break the British embargo by buying Iranian oil. Pointing out that Mossadeq had accepted the support of Tudeh, the Iranian communist party, and had come to rely more heavily on the communists, the British urged a covert operation to overthrow Mossadeq. The Iranian prime minister's rejection of American proposals designed to resolve the dispute moved Eisenhower in that direction. Ultimately, Mossadeq's intransigence in negotiations with the British, his strained relations with the pro-Western shah, his overtures to Iranian communists, and his gestures towards the Soviet Union convinced Eisenhower of the need to remove him. The president authorized a covert operation, planned by the CIA.

In March 1953, Mossadeq asked the parliament to make him commander in chief of the Iranian army. When the parliament refused, Mossadeq, on July 19, 1953, dissolved parliament, called for a plebiscite, and began to rule by decree. The Tudeh Party staged riots in the streets of Teheran. Adding to Eisenhower's concern, Mossadeq accepted $20 million in aid from the Soviet Union, and at the end of July, the Tudeh Party announced its support for Mossadeq, which Mossadeq accepted. In the plebiscite, held on August 5, Mossadeq won 99.4 percent of the vote. The shah removed Mossadeq and appointed a general to be the new prime minister. Mossadeq began arresting political opponents, and rioting in support of Mossadeq spread through the streets of Teheran. With events turning against him, the shah fled to Italy.

American agents cultivated the support of military officers loyal to the shah and organized street demonstrations against Mossadeq. Facing a crisis, Mossadeq, whose policies had alienated many intellectuals and a substantial portion of the middle class, found few willing to support him. The army arrested Mossadeq, and the shah returned in triumph on August 22. The Eisenhower administration quickly extended $45 million in economic aid to Iran. The new Iranian government quickly restored relations with Great Britain and in 1954 agreed to pay $25 million to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company for its assets that had been seized. The United States brokered an agreement that provided for a new international consortium to develop Iran's oil industry. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Company and American oil companies each enjoyed a 40 percent stake of the consortium, which divided profits equally with the Iranian government.

In the short term, at least from the perspective of Washington, the covert operation to overthrow Mossadeq was a remarkable success. The American-backed coup removed a leader who had strained relations with the West and seemed to be moving towards the Soviet Union. It also brought American companies a significant role in the development of Iranian oil, from which they had previously been excluded. Finally, it achieved all this with minimal risk or cost. On the other hand, the United States backed a coup against a democratically elected leader, and, over the long term, the operation served to tie the United States to a repressive regime.

Another example of Eisenhower's use of covert action in the Third World came the following year in Guatemala, where the United States supported the overthrow of the leftist government of President Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán. A wealthy landowner and former colonel in the Army, Arbenz embarked on a program to promote economic diversification, unionization, and land reform. In 1952, the Guatemalan National Assembly approved a plan of agrarian reform that provided for the expropriation and redistribution of uncultivated land on large estates. The measure provided for owners to be compensated with government bonds equivalent to the value of the land declared for tax purposes. The United Fruit Company, an American concern, objected to the $3 per acre price offered in compensation, and officials of the company lobbied the United States government to intervene. Some historians have made much of the ties between some members of the Eisenhower administration and United Fruit. Far more significant, however, was the concern among policy makers that Guatemala might slip into the communist orbit. Arbenz included communists in his coalition and accused the United States of using germ warfare in Korea. In an operation similar to the one that led to the ouster of Mossadeq in Iran, the CIA armed and trained a group of Guatemalan exiles led by Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas, who had been exiled after an unsuccessful coup in 1950. The Eisenhower administration worked to isolate Arbenz diplomatically and pressed European nations to withhold economic and military assistance to Guatemala. At a meeting of the Organization of American States in Caracas, Venezuela, in March 1954, Dulles obtained approval of a resolution declaring that communist control of any American state presented a threat to the hemisphere.

Worried about an invasion, Arbenz bought weapons from the Soviet bloc. The Eisenhower administration pointed to that arms purchase as proof that Arbenz planned to export communist revolution in the region. The administration also gave military assistance to Honduras and Nicaragua and blockaded Guatemalan ports. On June 18, 1954, Castillo Armas and his force of roughly 150 men invaded Guatemala while planes supplied by the CIA bombed the capital. Arbenz appealed to the United Nations Security Council, and France and Great Britain seemed willing to hear Guatemala's case. Dulles, however, warned them that such a position would lead the United States to pursue "an independent line concerning such matters as Egypt and North Africa." The Security Council ultimately voted 5-4, with Britain and France abstaining, not to place Guatemala on its agenda. After the Guatemalan army called on Arbenz to resign, he fled, and Castillo Armas became president. Castillo Armas outlawed the communist party and restored confiscated property to the owners from whom it had been taken.

Once more, a covert operation seemed to produce a great success. A nuisance had been removed and with little cost or risk. As was the case with Iran, however, there was a downside to the operation. Student and labor groups organized protests in various locations throughout Latin America. Some governments voiced their displeasure at the ouster of Arbenz. Perhaps most important, the military government in Guatemala committed extensive abuses of human rights throughout the following decades. In the short term, indeed even to the end of the Eisenhower administration, the action seemed a great success from the perspective of the White House.

The French struggle to hold on to its colonial possession in Indochina provided yet another test for the diplomacy of the Eisenhower administration. During World War II, the Japanese had occupied French Indochina, and after the war, Ho Chi Minh, a communist who had led a nationalist movement in Vietnam against the French before the war and the resistance to the Japanese during the war, demanded independence for his country. As the French attempted to reimpose their colonial rule after the war, they encountered fierce opposition from an insurgent movement led by Ho and his Viet Minh. Primarily in an effort to get the French to cooperate in building a Western alliance in Europe, the Truman administration began aiding the French. Mao's victory in the Chinese civil war and the outbreak of the Korean war convinced the Truman administration to increase substantially American aid to the French. By the time Eisenhower became president, the United States was paying for a significant majority of the cost of the French effort in Indochina.

Eisenhower had no sympathy for the French effort to maintain its colonial rule in Indochina. As distasteful as Eisenhower found British colonialism, he detested French colonialism even more. He regarded the French as both inept and particularly brutal colonizers. Dulles and Eisenhower repeatedly urged the French to grant freedom to Indochina. Both the president and the secretary of state, however, believed that the region could not be allowed to fall under communist control. Further, American policy remained limited by the need for French cooperation in Europe. Domestic politics also played a role in shaping the administration's policy. The Eisenhower administration had to deal with the Republican right, which considered Asia to be the primary area of American interest and had fiercely attacked Truman and his administration for the "loss" of China. Setting aside strategic questions, the further expansion of communism in Asia would have generated serious political problems for the administration at home.

The situation in Indochina came to a head in early 1954, when the French concentrated their forces in northwestern Vietnam and the Viet Minh surrounded a large French garrison at Dien Bien Phu. While the Viet Minh occupied the high ground around the garrison and pounded the French position, the beleaguered French government sought military assistance from the United States. Given the various pressures on him and his administration, Eisenhower did not reject the request but established several conditions for American aid. He insisted that any intervention be part of a multinational force (that included Asian countries) and that the French grant independence to the associated states of Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam upon the defeat of the Communists. Further, he would not commit the United States unless he received prior approval from Congress and the British agreed to participate. As Eisenhower figured, such conditions never materialized. The British opposed any intervention, and the French refused to continue fighting only to give up their colonies in the end.

As the Geneva Conference, called to discuss Asian issues, got under way on April 26, 1954, and the French garrison at Dien Bien Phu desperately attempted to stave off impending defeat, Eisenhower remained disinclined to send American ground troops to Indochina. He realized that even a French military defeat did not mean that Indochina had to fall to the Communists. Although resigned to part of Vietnam coming under the control of the Communists, he wanted to aid that part of Vietnam that remained noncommunist after the Geneva Conference had finished its work. At the same time, Eisenhower resisted the increasing pressure from the Republican right to intervene militarily.

The French garrison surrendered on May 7. The Geneva Accords provided for the independence of Laos and Cambodia, and the Viet Minh agreed to withdraw their forces from those countries. Vietnam was also granted independence and divided at the 17th parallel. The Viet Minh withdrew to north of the dividing line, and the French withdrew to the south. National reunification elections were scheduled to take place in 1956, under the auspices of an international commission. The United States began to aid the South Vietnamese government and sent military advisers to Laos and Cambodia. When Ngo Dinh Diem became prime minister of South Vietnam in 1954 and expanded his power, the Eisenhower administration supported him. Ultimately, Diem ousted the emperor and was elected president of the Republic of Vietnam.

Eisenhower and Dulles remained concerned about the possibility of expanding communist influence in Southeast Asia. In September 1954, Dulles negotiated the Manila Pact, which created the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. The members, which included the United States, France, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, and the Philippines, agreed to consult in the event of common danger or threat to peace and security in the region.

Throughout the crisis in French Indochina, Eisenhower faced pressure, particularly from the Republican right, to intervene. Both the president's politics and his military training argued against such a course. In a draft of his presidential memoirs, Eisenhower wrote that "the jungles of Indochina . . . would have swallowed up division after division of United States troops. . . . Furthermore, the presence of ever more numbers of white men in uniform probably would have aggravated rather than assuaged Asiatic resentments." Interestingly enough, he cut that passage when he published the volume in 1965, because the United States was by then escalating its military commitment to Vietnam and he did not want publicly to criticize the conduct of a successor, President Johnson. In another unpublished portion of his memoirs, Eisenhower wrote that it was important that the United States not support French colonialism, because "among all the powerful nations of the world the United States [was] the only one with a tradition of anti-colonialism." That standing, he maintained, was "an asset of incalculable value to the Free World." By his reckoning, "the moral position of the United States was more to be guarded than the Tonkin Delta, indeed than all of Indochina."

This opinion was not something Eisenhower conceived in retrospect. In a letter he wrote to Alfred Gruenther on April 26, 1954, as the situation became increasingly desperate for the French garrison at Dien Bien Phu, Eisenhower stated

As you know, you and I started more than three years ago trying to convince the French that they could not win the Indo-China war and particularly could not get real American support in that region unless they would unequivocally pledge independence to the Associated States upon the achievement of military victory. Along with this—indeed as a corollary to it—this administration has been arguing that no Western power can go into Asia militarily, except as one of a concert of powers, which concert must include local Asiatic peoples.

To contemplate anything else is to lay ourselves open to the charge of imperialism and colonialism or—at the very least—of objectionable paternalism. Even, therefore, if we could by some sudden stroke assure the saving of the Dien Bien Phu garrison, I think that under the conditions proposed by the French, the free world would lose more than it would gain.

On the same day he wrote to Gruenther, Eisenhower told Republican congressional leaders that if one United States combat soldier were put into Indochina “the entire prestige of the United States would be at stake, not only in that area but throughout the world.” The United States would be forced into a position of having to win, and the president was not sure if that would be possible without “hitting full force.” He then commented on what a “terrible” decision that would be. After examining the military options and finding them unsatisfactory, he made the decision not to go to war in Indochina.

The legacy of colonialism also provided the backdrop for the Suez Crisis in 1956, one of the most difficult tests the Eisenhower administration confronted in foreign policy. After a coup overthrew Egypt’s pro-Western monarchy in 1952, Gamal Abdel Nasser emerged as the leader of that country. Nasser espoused radical Arab nationalism and asserted his leadership of the Arab world. Eisenhower and Dulles recognized Arab nationalism as a force to be reckoned with, especially in light of their conclusion that the French and British would not be able to maintain their influence in the region, which supplied two-thirds of Western Europe’s oil. Therefore, the American administration urged its allies to accommodate change in the area and to make efforts to mitigate the legacy of colonialism. Underlying all other concerns, however, Eisenhower and Dulles worried about the potential for the expansion of Soviet influence in the region.

Accordingly, in 1954, the administration encouraged the British to accede to Nasser’s demand that they abandon British military bases around the Suez Canal. The following year, the United States sponsored the Baghdad Pact, signed by Great Britain, Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Pakistan, which was designed to deter the Soviet Union from expanding its influence in the region as the British departed. Eisenhower and Dulles held out some hope that Nasser might eventually join the pact, but instead he denounced it as Western imperialism. Moreover, American and British attempts to broker a comprehensive peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors ran aground on Nasser’s Pan-Arabism and his militant hostility to Israel. Following an Israeli reprisal raid in Gaza in February 1955, Nasser sought Western aid in building up his military. When he did not get what he wanted from the West, Nasser arranged to buy Soviet weapons through Czechoslovakia.

Eisenhower and Dulles came to regard the Egyptian leader as a threat to stability in the region. Nevertheless, they maintained the hope that the United States could influence Nasser through economic aid. Late in 1955, the United States and Great Britain proposed a package of over $400 million in grants and loans to build a high dam on the Nile River at Aswan that would provide hydroelectric power and irrigation. Fearing Western influence over Egypt’s economy, Nasser hesitated to accept the loan. The proposal also encountered resistance in the United States. Southern members of Congress opposed what amounted to a subsidy for Egyptian cotton, which competed with the cotton produced in their home states. Further opposition came from anticommunists, who questioned the wisdom of aiding a neutralist who bought arms from the Soviet Union. Finally, the pro-Israel lobby objected to aiding a leader who had declared his commitment to the destruction of Israel.

By March 1956, the administration decided to take a harder line with respect to Nasser. After the Egyptian leader further antagonized the American administration by recognizing Communist China in May, the United States withdrew the offer to finance the dam and increased aid to pro-Western Arab governments in the region. Nasser responded by nationalizing the Suez Canal Company, owned largely by the British and French, and declared that he would use the revenue from the operation of the Suez Canal to finance the Aswan Dam. Intent on recovering their property and convinced of the necessity of removing Nasser from power, Britain and France immediately contemplated military action. The French had an additional reason to favor Nasser's removal—they bitterly resented his support of the Algerian rebellion against French rule.

As much as Eisenhower and Dulles disapproved of Nasser's seizure of the Suez Canal, they hoped to resolve the situation by using economic and diplomatic pressure to force the Egyptian leader to compensate the British and French, and also by establishing an international authority to oversee operation of the canal. Military intervention, the American administration warned, would simply inflame Arab nationalism, threaten Western interests in the region, and provide an opportunity for the expansion of Soviet influence. Further, a military adventure might result in the closure of the canal and thereby disrupt the supply of oil from the Middle East, which would have devastating consequences for the economies of Western Europe. Thus, Eisenhower urged the British and French to exercise restraint. In an exchange of letters with the British prime minister, Anthony Eden, Eisenhower argued against the use of military force unless public opinion in Great Britain and the United States solidly supported it and until "every possible means of protecting our vital interests has been exhausted without result." More important was Eisenhower's contention that "I really do not see how a successful result could be achieved by forcible means." European economies, he pointed out, would suffer if a war disrupted the supply of oil from the Middle East, and opinion in the Middle East, North Africa, Asia, and Africa would "be consolidated against the West to a degree which, I fear, could not be overcome in a generation." Eisenhower suggested exerting economic pressure and exploiting "Arab rivalries" to lessen Nasser's influence outside Egypt, the latter of which was possible only "if we do not make Nasser an Arab hero."

In late October, however, the British and French, without informing the United States, entered an agreement with Israel (which had been plagued by cross-border raids by Egyptian commandos and alarmed by an alliance between Egypt, Syria, and Jordan) to take military action to restore the canal to British and French control and to remove Nasser from power. On October 29, Israeli forces launched an operation in the Sinai peninsula that expelled the Egyptian army from Gaza, from which the commando raids had been launched, and took Sharm el-Sheikh, which broke the Egyptian blockade in the Gulf of Aqaba. The next day, the British and French issued an ultimatum demanding that belligerents withdraw their forces to positions 10 miles from the Canal and allow the British and French to move into positions along the waterway. Otherwise, the British and French would take such positions by force. The Israelis immediately agreed. As expected, Nasser refused, and the British and French launched air strikes against Egyptian bases on October 31. They also sent an invasion fleet toward Port Said with the stated intent of keeping the canal open. Before the force could land, however, Nasser blocked the canal by scuttling ships in it, and, a few days later, Syrian forces cut the oil pipeline from Iraq to the Mediterranean.

Furious at the Anglo-French military adventure and at not being informed of it in advance, Eisenhower sought to impose a cease-fire through the United Nations. In the first place, Eisenhower thought the action of the British and French smacked of colonialism. Beyond that, he had concerns about the implications the invasion had for the cold war. He believed it necessary for the United States to disassociate itself from European colonialism in order not to push newly independent nations and the Arab world into the Soviet orbit. In addition, Eisenhower found it frustrating that the Suez Crisis diverted the world's attention from the Soviet Union's savage repression of the movement for reform in Hungary. The opportunity to trumpet the evils of the Soviet system was diminished by the competing din, with its echoes of European colonialism, generated by Suez.

The United States offered a resolution in the United Nations [UN] Security Council calling on Israel and Egypt to cease fire, on Israel to withdraw to its preexisting borders, and on all members of the UN to refrain from using force in the Middle East. The British and French vetoed it. A resolution by the Soviet Union calling on Israel to withdraw also encountered a British and French veto. Eisenhower thought it of paramount importance to prevent the Soviets from seizing the leadership of the opposition to the use of force in the Middle East. At the same time, he did not want the British and French to be, as he later put it, "branded as naked aggressors without provocation." In an effort to balance these concerns, the United States offered a resolution in the General Assembly that called for an immediate cease-fire, the withdrawal of all troops to the positions they held before the military action began, a ban on arms shipments to the area in which the hostilities were taking place, and action to open the Suez Canal. The UN adopted the American resolution.

In deference to the UN resolution, the Israelis halted their operations in the Sinai on November 4. They had achieved their objectives by taking control of the Gaza Strip and breaking the Egyptian blockade. Great Britain and France, however, were less successful. British and French paratroopers landed near the canal on November 5 but encountered resistance from Egyptian forces. Compounding matters, the Soviet premier, Nikolai Bulganin, threatened the use of force against invaders. Bulganin also wrote Eisenhower proposing that the United States and Soviet Union join forces to intervene to stop the fighting. The White House issued a statement calling the idea "unthinkable." With the British and French claiming control of the Canal area, the British government declared a cease-fire on November 6. Eisenhower phoned Eden and urged him to yield to a UN peacekeeping force.

After the cease-fire, Eisenhower kept pressure on Great Britain, France, and Israel to withdraw. He blocked financial aid to stabilize the pound and held up a plan to ease the impact of oil shortages in Western Europe by increasing production in the Western Hemisphere. The British and French forces withdrew from Egypt in December; the Israelis withdrew in March 1957. In the first few days after the cease-fire, the Soviet Union raised the possibility of its sending "volunteers" to Egypt. Eisenhower sternly warned Bulganin that "any such action would be directly contrary to the resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations" and that the United States would "oppose any such effort."

Eisenhower's management of the Suez Crisis produced mixed results. His primary objectives were to prevent both a larger war and the expansion of Soviet influence in the Middle East. While his policy did avert a general war and temporarily raised American standing in the Arab world, it ultimately failed in its two overarching objectives: to contain Nasserism and to prevent the expansion of Soviet influence in the region. Despite suffering a humiliating military defeat, Nasser not only remained in power but increased his reputation in the Arab world for having stood up to European imperialism. The Soviet Union gained a substantial foothold in the Arab world by issuing military threats against Britain and France and by financing the Aswan Dam. With respect to relations with America's allies, too, Eisenhower's actions yielded uneven outcomes. The experience made clear to Great Britain the extent to which it depended on American military and economic support, and Harold Macmillan, who replaced Anthony Eden as prime minister in January 1957, worked assiduously to restore the special relationship. On the other hand, France, already angered by American policy in Indochina, concluded that it could not depend on the United States to support vital French interests and that it must chart an independent course.

In the aftermath of Suez, Eisenhower and Dulles worried that the decline of French and British influence in the Mideast created a power vacuum that the Soviets might exploit. Further, the Arab-Israeli conflict threatened to explode into war at any time, and that would have provided another opportunity for the Soviets to expand their influence in the region. Should the Soviets gain control of the Middle East, Eisenhower reasoned, it "would be disastrous to Europe because of its oil requirements." In addition, Nasser's radical Arab nationalism posed a threat to Western interests and pro-Western Arab regimes in the area.

The administration's response was the Eisenhower Doctrine, announced in January 1957. Eisenhower requested $200 million from Congress in military and economic aid to be spent at the administration's discretion over the following two years. He also sought congressional approval to send American troops to any nation facing "overt armed aggression by any country controlled by International Communism” that requested assistance. Some congressional leaders questioned the wisdom of granting the president a blank check; others simply opposed additional foreign aid; supporters of Israel objected to providing aid to Arab nations. Ultimately, however, the Middle East Resolution passed both houses of Congress, and Eisenhower signed it into law on March 9.

While the Eisenhower Doctrine focused on the threat of external communist aggression, Eisenhower recognized that Nasserism posed the most significant and immediate threat to Western interests in the Middle East, although he linked Nasser’s “growing ambition” to “the sense of power he has gained out of his associations with the Soviets.” Those concerns quickly came to fruition, and Eisenhower had to consider the conditions under which he would apply the doctrine that bore his name. In 1957, elections in Jordan resulted in a victory for Arab nationalists. The new government recommended abrogating the Anglo-Jordanian mutual defense treaty of 1948 and establishing diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union and Communist China. King Hussein foiled an attempted coup by Nasserite and leftist elements on April 13, after which he dismissed the prime minister and imposed martial law. The ousted prime minister established a government-in-exile in Syria, and his supporters rioted in Amman. King Hussein appealed to the Eisenhower administration for assistance. Under the authority granted him by the Middle East Resolution, the president immediately gave $10 million in economic aid to Jordan and moved the Sixth Fleet into the Eastern Mediterranean.

Developments in Jordan and Syria, which struck an arms deal with the Soviet Union and moved closer to Nasser, worried the pro-Western government of Camille Chamoun in Lebanon. A member of his country’s Maronite Christian population, Chamoun’s six-year term was scheduled to end in September 1958. It would have required a constitutional amendment for him to succeed himself, and Muslims in Lebanon (as well as Syria and Egypt) strongly opposed such an amendment as well as a second term. Chamoun had aligned Lebanon with the United States in the cold war and supported the Eisenhower Doctrine; Lebanese Muslims sympathized with Nasser. A victory for Chamoun’s supporters in the parliamentary elections in 1957 amidst charges of fraud from Muslims at least opened the door to the possibility of amending the constitution. Complicating matters for the fragile peace in Lebanon, Syria and Egypt formed the United Arab Republic in January 1958, raising the specter of the expansion of Nasserism. When Chamoun floated the idea of amending the constitution in late April, Muslims rioted in the streets. By early May, bands of Christian and Muslim militia clashed in the streets. Lebanon complained to the United States that arms smuggled in from Syria, Egypt, and the Soviet Union threatened to spark a civil war. Moreover, Nasser tried to take advantage of the situation by broadcasting anti-Chamoun propaganda into Lebanon. Chamoun requested help under the Eisenhower Doctrine.

Dulles and Eisenhower understood the internal divisions in Lebanon and doubted either that it was actually under attack by the United Arab Republic or that the UAR was dominated by international communism. At least initially, Dulles was particularly skeptical that grounds existed to support an intervention. Further, the president and secretary of state were sensitive to the impact a military intervention might have in the Arab world. They understood that an American intervention risked dissipating the goodwill built up by the administration’s actions during the Suez Crisis. On the other hand, they were concerned that a failure to respond to Chamoun’s request would raise doubts about the reliability of the United States as an ally among pro-Western governments in the Middle East and elsewhere. Eisenhower informed the Lebanese leader that he would send American troops, but only if Chamoun first sought help from the United Nations in resolving the crisis and renounced his ambition for a second term. While Chamoun tried to meet these conditions, Eisenhower sent the Sixth Fleet to the Eastern Mediterranean. Eisenhower had, as he put it at the time, “little, if any, enthusiasm for our intervening.” While he placed little faith in the Lebanese leader, Eisenhower held out some hope that Chamoun would be able to stabilize the situation by himself. At the same time, Eisenhower decided that, should Chamoun formally request American military assistance, he would need to respond in order to maintain American credibility.

For a time, it seemed that American intervention was unlikely. On May 22, Lebanese officials requested an emergency session of the UN Security Council, which passed a resolution on June 10 providing for an observation team to prevent the infiltration of arms and men into Lebanon. While the UN worked to find a solution and even Nasser seemed to seek a reduction of tensions, events in Iraq further destabilized the region. On July 14, 1957, pro-Nasser forces overthrew Iraq's pro-Western monarchy and executed the king and crown prince. Hussein in Jordan and Saud in Saudi Arabia urged the United States to send troops to the region. In Lebanon, political violence between Chamoun's supporters and opponents escalated, and Chamoun, claiming that his nation faced a threat from communism and Nasserism, again appealed to the United States for help under the Eisenhower Doctrine. Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia also urged the Americans and British to intervene. On July 15, Eisenhower ordered 14,000 marines and army personnel to that country and announced that the United States was acting to prevent communist aggression in that country. That same day, the United States introduced a draft resolution in the United Nations asking that the international body assume responsibility for the defense of Lebanon. The Soviet Union vetoed the resolution.

As events in Lebanon unfolded, King Hussein of Jordan discovered and thwarted a plot to overthrow him on June 14. He requested aid from the British, who sent paratroopers to Jordan on July 17 to shore up Hussein's regime. The British prime minister, Harold Macmillan, wanted American participation, but Eisenhower refused beyond providing airlift capabilities to the British.

In the short term, at least, the bloodless operation achieved its objectives. The United States pressed Chamoun to hold elections, and the pro-Western Gen. Faud Chehab won election as president in August, at which point American forces began to withdraw. The last American forces left Lebanon on October 25. As Eisenhower wrote to Macmillan, "Without firing a shot in anger, and in close and friendly collaboration with the local authorities, our forces have achieved what they were sent to Lebanon and Jordan to do, at the request of the respective Governments. They have preserved the independence of these two small countries against aggressive subversive forces directed from outside. Our action has proved to the world, and especially to the smaller nations, that we stand by our pledges and that we have the courage to carry out our solemn undertakings, regardless of the threats made against us."

On the surface, Eisenhower's willingness to send American forces to Lebanon appeared to contrast starkly with his more cautious, restrained response to crises in the Far East and elsewhere. In fact, however, Eisenhower calculated that there was little possibility of a clash with the Soviets over Lebanon (Syria, he thought, might be a different matter). Moreover, in Lebanon, there was not as much indigenous resistance as in, say, Indochina. The intervention in Lebanon also served to demonstrate the sufficiency of American conventional capabilities, not so much to the Soviets but to domestic critics of the New Look, to pro-Western states in the region (most significantly King Saud), and, most importantly, to Nasser. Further, Eisenhower reckoned that the Middle East fell within the vital interests of the United States. Setting aside the strategic reasons for the intervention, Eisenhower handled the tactical aspects with the skill of a professional. The show of military force was calculated to gain maximum effect with minimum risk. Eisenhower made sure that the American military commitment was limited in scope; the orders under which the American forces operated restricted their activities to securing the airfield and the capital. The operation was also limited in duration. In an address to the American people that evening, Eisenhower expressed the hope that the United Nations would move quickly and "permit the early withdrawal of United States forces." The former general calculated the level of military force with the intent to discourage opposition, and, indeed, the marines landed without incident. Eisenhower's calculations with respect to the Soviets also proved accurate. They limited their response to diplomatic bluster. The crisis ended, and Eisenhower achieved his basic objectives without risking a general war. Nevertheless, even before withdrawing the American troops, Eisenhower ordered a reconsideration of the administration's policy in the Middle East. Opposition to Arab nationalism, the most powerful force in the region, Eisenhower conceded, was futile, and setting the United States against it only inflamed popular sentiment in the region. Therefore, he argued, the United States "must either work with it or change it, or do some of both." "The question," as the president put it, "is how to take a sympathetic position regarding the Arabs without agreeing to the destruction of Israel."

During the final two years of Eisenhower's presidency, preventing the expansion of communism in Latin America again emerged as a major focus of foreign policy. After the overthrow of the Arbenz government in Guatemala, Eisenhower and Dulles were occupied primarily with various crises in Europe, the Middle East, and Asia. Although Latin America did not claim the focused attention of the administration, it did not drop entirely off the administration's radar. Serving as his brother's special envoy, Milton Eisenhower went on a fact-finding trip of Latin America in 1954. The trip convinced him that traditional foreign aid served to strengthen the existing order but did not facilitate necessary social change. He recommended expanded trade and investment, increased technical aid, and cultural exchanges. Above all, Milton believed that the United States should encourage democratic governments. Congress, however, balked at providing the funds for the kind of aid and exchanges Milton recommended. In response to Milton's report, the Eisenhower administration increased by twofold the flow of private and public capital into the region, strengthened the role of the Organization of American States, promoted common markets, and established the Inter-American Development Bank (founded to make loans with conditions requiring social reform). Subsequent trips to Latin America in 1958 and 1960 confirmed Milton's views. All of this formed the basis for what John F. Kennedy would later call the Alliance for Progress. Nevertheless, discontent with the existing order seethed in the region, and politicians in the United States tended to ignore unrest in Latin America unless it threatened to topple a pro-American government.

In Cuba, Fidel Castro led a revolt against Fulgencio Batista, the country's brutal and corrupt dictator. Eisenhower's attempts to press Batista to institute reforms availed nothing. The young and charismatic Castro and his cause struck a sympathetic chord throughout Latin America. Even in the United States, many found Castro's promises of free elections, schools, housing, and economic reform far more appealing than the reactionary despotism of Batista. While Eisenhower had reservations about Castro, he withheld support from Batista. American policy denied arms to both sides in Cuba.

Despite concerns from the CIA about the involvement of communists in Castro's movement, Eisenhower rejected recommendations that the United States side with Batista as the lesser of two evils. Eisenhower figured that "our only hope, if any, lay with some kind of nondictatorial 'third force,'" but no such third force emerged. Throughout the closing months of 1958, Batista's armed forces lost ground to the rebels. Castro entered Havana on New Year's Day 1959, and Batista fled the country. The United States quickly recognized the new regime, but Castro immediately proceeded to alienate the United States by purging liberals from his government, by staging mass executions, and by signing a trade and aid agreement with the Soviet Union. Within two weeks after taking power, Castro legalized the Communist Party. On January 21, Castro's first prime minister resigned in protest over mass executions and the anti-Americanism of Castro's speeches. Castro made himself premier on February 13, and, at the end of the month announced that he was postponing the promised elections for two years. Allen Dulles, director of the CIA, reported to Eisenhower that Castro's government was not dominated by communists but that the communists had "worked their way into the labor unions, the armed forces, and other organizations."

In the past, the United States had sent marines to dispatch troublesome governments in Latin America, a step Eisenhower refused even to consider. As he wrote to his brother, Edgar Eisenhower, a successful lawyer and conservative Republican who had complained about the president's policy in Panama:

You are contemplating a trip to Costa Rica. Should we use the old method of sending Marines into any Latin American country as a means of asserting and enforcing our interpretation of any difficulty that might arise, any North American would have a most unpleasant time if he should undertake such a journey.

In addition, Castro was popular throughout Latin America and had many supporters in the United States. The costs of an American military intervention were too high.

The Eisenhower administration remained somewhat puzzled by Castro. Herter met Castro during the latter's trip to the United States in April 1959 and found him "very much like a child in many ways" and "quite immature regarding problems of government." At the same time, Herter noted that the Cuban leader spoke in English "with restraint and considerable personal appeal." The CIA found Castro's assurances that he would remain in the Western camp unconvincing and reported the "probability" that land reform in Cuba would likely "adversely affect certain American-owned properties." On the other hand, the agency warned that it "would be a serious mistake to underestimate this man" and thought that there was some possibility of "developing a constructive relationship with him." Eisenhower scrawled on the report, "File. We will check in a year!!"

By January 1960, the confiscation of American property, the Cuban invasion of Haiti, and Castro's continuing verbal attacks on the United States led Eisenhower and his administration to conclude that they had to do something about the Cuban leader. Castro, however, was not Arbenz. The masses of Latin America regarded him as an enormously appealing figure, and Castro dismissed attempts to link him with the communists as an example of the American propensity to regard any Latin American reformer as a communist. Further, the opposition to Castro, in Cuba and among exiles in Florida, was deeply divided; therefore, the prospect of uniting the opposition in exile behind an alternative to Castro seemed remote. Finally, the American administration could expect no help from other Latin American countries. In private, rulers of Latin American countries told Eisenhower that they hoped the United States would get rid of Castro, but they would not speak out in public against the widely popular Cuban leader.

Another matter complicated American policy towards Cuba. Several Latin American governments pressed for action against Rafael Trujillo, the dictator of the Dominican Republic, as a condition for supporting any move against Castro. Eisenhower, who found Trujillo's regime repulsive, explored ways of persuading the Dominican tyrant to step down. He even considered setting up a trust fund for Trujillo but drew the line at offering him asylum in the United States. In any case, Trujillo had no intention of resigning, and the American administration worried that forcing him out might lead to chaos and ultimately a communist takeover. Whatever their concerns about him, the administration did not worry about Trujillo entering a mutual security agreement with the Soviet Union.

In the Caracas Declaration of 1954, the Organization of American States had committed itself to oppose the intrusion of communism into the Western hemisphere. However, proving that Castro was a communist remained something of a problem, not the least because the Eisenhower administration itself was not entirely convinced. Events in Cuba, however, moved them in that direction.

Once again, Eisenhower turned to the CIA and covert operations to handle a troublesome situation. Eisenhower told Allen Dulles to develop a "program" to get rid of Castro. Eisenhower made it clear to the CIA that he did not want Castro removed until a government in exile had been formed. Simply killing Castro, Eisenhower thought, would do nothing more than elevate either Raúl Castro or Che Guevara to leadership, and he regarded either as a worse alternative. The CIA nevertheless undertook a series of attempts to assassinate Castro, apparently without Eisenhower's knowledge. In March 1960, Eisenhower approved a program that included the creation of a "responsible and unified" Cuban government in exile, a "propaganda offensive" against Castro's government, the development of a "covert intelligence and action organization in Cuba," and the training of a "paramilitary force outside of Cuba for future guerilla action."

In the meantime, Latin American governments used Castro as an argument for increased economic and military aid to their countries. In February 1960, Eisenhower made a personal goodwill trip of Latin America in an effort to persuade governments there that they did not need more weapons but that they did need to undertake social and economic reforms. He also hoped to counter Castro's appeal to the masses. Eisenhower's appeals for reform fell on deaf ears, and his attempt to rally support against Castro failed.

Eisenhower's greatest concern was that Castro would allow Khrushchev to use Cuba as a base for Soviet strategic weapons, but he thought that unlikely. After all, he figured that the Soviet leader had to know that the United States "could not tolerate" such a development. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union expanded its influence in Cuba. The two nations concluded a trade and credit agreement in February 1960. In July, Khrushchev threatened to use his rockets to protect Cuba from a military attack. At the same time, the Soviet premier denied any interest in placing Soviet missiles in Cuba; his ICBMs, he bragged, made that unnecessary.

Eisenhower began to move against Castro. By law, the United States bought approximately half of Cuba's sugar crop at premium prices. In July 1960, Eisenhower signed legislation that gave the president temporary authority to reduce the amount of sugar Cuba could export to the United States. Eisenhower cut the remaining sugar quota for that year by 95 percent. At a meeting of the American Foreign Ministers in August, the Eisenhower administration took advantage of Khrushchev's bluster and got the conference to condemn any "intervention or the threat of intervention . . . from an extra-continental power in the affairs of the American Republics." It specifically warned against any attempt by "the Sino-Soviet powers" to intervene in the Western hemisphere. The conference also issued a condemnation of the Dominican Republic and called on members of the OAS to break diplomatic relations. The United States quickly did so.

Eisenhower also recognized the need for reform in Latin America to prevent the spread of communism. In early September 1960, Congress approved the administration's request for $600 million in non-military aid to Latin America. On September 13, the Special Committee of the Organization of American States adopted the Act of Bogotá, which called for cooperative measures to improve land, to reform tax structures, and to build education systems, public health facilities, and community facilities.

While the administration attempted to use diplomatic measures and to improve conditions to prevent the spread of communism, it also prepared to take additional economic measures against Cuba and began the evacuation of American citizens. Yet, despite pressure from some Republican leaders in Congress and from Nixon, Eisenhower rejected the use of American military force to remove Castro. At a meeting of Republican congressional leaders, and in words reminiscent of his letter to Edgar about Panama, he said, "If we were to try to accomplish our aims by force, we would see all of [Latin America] tending to fall away and some would be Communist within two years. . . . If the United States does not conduct itself in precisely the right way vis-à-vis Cuba, we could lose all of South America."

Nonetheless, in August, after learning that Cuba was importing arms from Czechoslovakia, Eisenhower authorized an expansion of the program to train Cuban exiles. The president was disappointed that there had been no progress on developing a government-in-exile and remained firm that he would approve no action without a credible, popular alternative to Castro's government. By December, there were roughly 600 exiles training in Guatemala; once again, Eisenhower told the CIA that he would approve no plan to use the force unless he had evidence of a government-in-exile.

On January 2, 1961, Castro accused the United States embassy in Havana of harboring spies and ordered almost all of the personnel at the embassy to leave Cuba within 24 hours. An outraged Eisenhower broke off diplomatic relations. The exiles training in Guatemala would not be ready to go until March, and a legitimate government-in-exile was nowhere to be found. The CIA, however, worried that the brigade could not be held together much past that date if no action were taken. Andrew Goodpaster, Eisenhower's staff secretary, warned that the CIA was creating a relatively large military force that was not officially responsible to any government and that the operation would build a momentum of its own. Eisenhower replied that the CIA was creating an asset, not committing the United States to a course of policy. In his memoirs, Eisenhower recalled that, in the absence of a credible leader and alternative government, "it was impossible to make specific plans for a military invasion." Eisenhower bequeathed to his successor a band of Cuban exiles training to overthrow Castro's government.

In many respects, Eisenhower compiled an impressive record as president. He was the only president since the advent of polls whose popularity did not decline. He presided over a time of peace and prosperity for most Americans. At the same time, Eisenhower was by no means universally successful; nor were his policies always prescient. By the 1950s, the white middle class had begun to flee the cities for the suburbs. In the process, they left behind an increasingly black and poor population. The migration stripped the cities of their tax base at a time when the need for public services was growing. This process began under Truman, continued under Eisenhower, and did not receive serious federal attention until the Johnson administration. If Eisenhower was less than farsighted in the minimal attention he paid to the problems of cities, he failed utterly in his attempt to unite and to redefine the Republican party in his own moderate image. His cautious contributions to the advancement of civil rights for African Americans, however important, certainly did not make equality a reality and failed to satisfy the demands of the burgeoning Civil Rights movement. Historians continue to debate whether Eisenhower could have reined in McCarthy and McCarthyism earlier and thereby saved the nation a good deal of anguish. In foreign policy, Eisenhower ended one war and did not begin another. He resisted the temptation of sending American combat forces into Indochina. The Geneva summit represented the first thaw in the cold war. Historians such as Robert Divine have lauded his restraint in dealing with major crises and with the Soviet Union. Eisenhower was particularly cautious when it came to putting American troops in harm's way. In his memoirs, Eisenhower proudly pointed out that, under his stewardship, not a single member of the American armed forces had died in combat after the end of the Korean War and communism did not expand into new territories. This did not, he wrote, happen by accident. For all that, some historians have argued that Eisenhower demonstrated less restraint when dealing with the Third World. There, he sometimes resorted to more aggressive measures, although usually with covert operations rather than the use of American military force. Moreover, interventions in Iran and Guatemala that looked like successes in the short term had long-term negative consequences.

Whatever its limitations and failures, however, Eisenhower's presidency was not, as William V. Shannon described it, "the time of the great Postponement." It was not even only, in the words of Charles Alexander, "a good job of holding the line." Eisenhower presided over eight years of peace, prosperity, and progress. As the first Republican president after Franklin Roosevelt, he preserved, strengthened, and expanded the basic structure of the New Deal. He eliminated no major federal programs and embarked on several new initiatives. After Eisenhower, the broad consensus in favor of the basic structures of the New Deal became truly bipartisan.

In some areas, Eisenhower essentially maintained programs he inherited. The regulatory structures of the New Deal remained in place, and Eisenhower retained the Tennessee Valley Authority. In others areas, such as farm subsidies and public housing, Eisenhower cut back on New Deal and Fair Deal programs; but he did not eliminate the programs themselves. In still other areas, Eisenhower oversaw an expansion of New Deal policies. His administration expanded the coverage of Social Security and raised benefits. He oversaw passage of a substantial increase in the minimum wage and an increase in unemployment benefits. He undertook large public works projects, such as the Saint Lawrence Seaway and the national highway system. In the area of health, he supported a federal role in the distribution of the Salk vaccine and an expansion of federal spending for hospitals and research. In addition, Eisenhower could claim credit for some real progress in civil rights.

In some instances, Eisenhower proposed extensions of the policies of Roosevelt and Truman but failed to win legislative approval. The administration's proposals for federal aid for the construction of schools and for a federal health reinsurance program died in Congress.

William Bragg Ewald has asserted that Eisenhower's greatest achievement was that "many terrible things that could have happened didn't." As a result, according to Ewald, "Dwight Eisenhower's presidency gave America eight good years." Eight years of peace, prosperity, and relative domestic tranquility looks pretty good, particularly compared to the performance of subsequent presidents. Perhaps that is why Stephen Ambrose lent his assent to the judgment of "millions of Americans," who "felt that the country was damned lucky to have him."

(1926–1990) minister, civil rights leader

Born on his parents' 500-acre farm in Marengo Co., Ala., on March 11, 1926, Ralph Abernathy was the 10th of 12 children. He received a B.S. from Alabama State College in 1950 and an M.A. in sociology from Atlanta University in 1951. Ordained a Baptist minister in 1948, Abernathy became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Montgomery, Ala. in 1951.

Active in civic affairs and a member of the NAACP, Abernathy readily agreed to help organize a boycott of Montgomery's racially segregated bus system following the arrest of ROSA PARKS, a black seamstress, on December 1, 1955, for violation of the city's bus segregation ordinance. Abernathy helped contact other black ministers, set up planning meetings, and prepared for the boycott, which began on December 5. He urged the formation of a permanent organization to manage the protest and suggested the name Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA) for the body, which was established on the first day of the boycott. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., a young Baptist minister relatively new to Montgomery, was chosen to lead the MIA. Abernathy was named to the executive board and the program committee.

Abernathy and King had already become close friends by the time the Montgomery boycott started. "From the beginning of the protest," King later declared, "[Abernathy] was my closest associate and most trusted friend." Abernathy took charge of much MIA business when King was out of town, was a close adviser to King throughout the 381-day boycott, and organized regular mass meetings of Montgomery's blacks.

On November 13, 1956, the Supreme Court ruled that bus segregation in Montgomery was unconstitutional. Abernathy then helped organize a program of mass training in nonviolent techniques to prepare the black community for integration. On December 21, 1956, the day after the Supreme Court's desegregation order arrived in Montgomery, Abernathy and King rode on an integrated bus. A month of retaliatory violence by whites followed. In the early hours of January 10, 1957, while King and Abernathy were in Atlanta for a meeting, Abernathy's home and church, along with three other black churches and the home of another minister, were bombed.

The historic Montgomery boycott marked the beginning of an era of nonviolent direct action by southern blacks against racial segregation and discrimination. It also inaugurated a partnership between King and Abernathy. Early in 1957, the two helped found the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). Abernathy was appointed financial secretary-treasurer, while King was named president. Under the auspices of the SCLC, the two ministers preached a philosophy of nonviolent resistance to Jim Crow practices and began organizing nonviolent training institutes and voter registration drives among southern blacks. The burly Abernathy was regarded as less intellectual than

King and as having more of a common touch in his preaching and speaking, but the two became alter egos. Beginning with Montgomery, King consulted Abernathy before making any important decision. In 1961, at King's urging, Abernathy moved to Atlanta in order to be closer to King, who had moved there the year before, and to the SCLC's Atlanta headquarters.

During the next seven years, Abernathy remained King's chief aide and confidant, helping him direct desegregation and voter registration campaigns in Albany, Ga., in 1962, Birmingham, Ala., in 1963 and Selma, Ala., in 1965. Abernathy became vice-president of SCLC in 1965 and was with King when the latter was assassinated in Memphis, Tenn., on April 4, 1968. Abernathy succeeded King as president of the SCLC and led a Poor People's Campaign in Washington, D.C., in the spring and summer of 1968. Abernathy resigned the presidency of SCLC in 1977. He ran unsuccessfully for a congressional seat from Georgia in 1978, and in 1980 surprised many by endorsing Ronald Reagan for president. Abernathy went on to found the Foundation for Economic Enterprises Development, an organization dedicated to improving economic opportunities for African Americans, and served as pastor to the West Hunter Street Baptist Church in Atlanta until 1983, when he suffered the first of several strokes. The publication of his autobiography, And the Walls Came Tumbling Down, in 1989 generated controversy for its discussion of King's sexual infidelities. Abernathy died on April 17, 1990, in Atlanta.

Acheson, Dean G(ooderham)

(1893–1971) secretary of state, lawyer

Born on April 11, 1893, in Middletown, Conn., Acheson attended Groton and Yale (class of 1916). Following his graduation from Harvard Law School in 1918, Acheson became private secretary to Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis. He then entered law practice in Washington with the prestigious firm of Covington and Burling. In 1933, he was appointed undersecretary of the treasury but resigned after a few months in a disagreement with the administration over economic policy. Acheson returned to public service in 1941 as assistant secretary of state. From 1944 to 1947, he served as undersecretary of state, the department's second-ranking post, and from 1949 to 1952 he was secretary of state.

While at the State Department, Acheson helped formulate the early American response to the cold war. Believing that the Soviet Union was bent on world conquest, he thought that attempts to negotiate with the Russians from a position of equality were useless. Instead, Acheson recommended that the United States give immense amounts of economic, political, and military aid to countries on the rim of the communist bloc to prevent or "contain" future Soviet expansion. In his view, Germany played a key role in the redevelopment of Europe. Acheson's ideas were reflected in the Marshall Plan of 1947.

Acheson firmly believed that America should negotiate from a position of overwhelming military strength maintained by a strong nuclear strike force, a large conventional army, and a series of regional alliances designed to rim the communist bloc. Faced with such awesome power, the Soviet Union, he believed, would be willing to negotiate differences. As secretary of state, Acheson was instrumental in the creation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the rebuilding and rearming of Germany, and the development of atomic policy. Although he believed that the North Atlantic community represented the peak of cultural and political growth and therefore made it the focus of his diplomacy, Acheson spent a large portion of his time on Asian affairs. Following the fall of Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi), Acheson pursued a nonrecognition policy toward Communist China. During his last years in the State Department, he also worked to prevent the widening of the Korean War.

Despite his vigorous anticommunism, Acheson was attacked as being "soft on communism" for his defense of Alger Hiss, for what rightists termed his "appeasement" of the Soviet Union, and for his "loss" of China. Acheson left office at the end of the Truman administration to return to his private law practice.

cism by Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES and the right wing of the Republican Party while trying to articulate an alternative foreign policy for the Democratic Party. Acheson charged that the administration's New Look, a reliance on strategic nuclear weapons as America's prime deterrent, "was a fraud upon words and upon facts." It produced "doubts, fears and loss of confidence in our leadership." To him, "massive retaliation" implied unilateralism and a reversion to isolationism, for Dulles's threat that the United States would retaliate "by means and places of our own choosing" precluded any consultation with American allies. This policy, Acheson argued, showed that the United States would recklessly gamble its allies' future to win diplomatic victories.

Acheson maintained that massive retaliation was irrelevant to the past and future skirmishes of the cold war. Only unified ground action had checked Communist advances in Korea. During the 1956 presidential campaign, he charged that the Republican foreign policy of "bluff and bluster" did not save Dien Bien Phu or prevent Nasser from seizing the Suez Canal. He said that Eisenhower and Dulles could have continued Truman's foreign policy but instead had become "the prisoners of the primitive propaganda and slogans of the McCarthy-Taft-Knowland forces." Acheson recommended the return to a proper balance between conventional and nuclear weapons, the end of empty rhetorical threats, and a willingness to work with NATO to repair the alleged damage done to American prestige during Eisenhower's first term.

When the Communist Chinese resumed shelling the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu in 1958, Acheson denounced Eisenhower's foreign policy once again. He observed that the United States seemed to be "drifting, either dazed or indifferent, to war with China." Rejecting Dulles's position that Quemoy was crucial to the defense of Taiwan (Formosa), he maintained that the island traditionally belonged to the mainland. Its population was minimal and it had no strategic value. Acheson warned that Chiang Kai-shek was interested in the island only as a staging area to attack the Communist Chinese and would use the crisis to embroil the United States in a conflict with the Communist Chinese.

Maintaining his strong mistrust of the communists into the 1950s, the former secretary was skeptical of Eisenhower's attempts to relax tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union. He counseled the nation to be ever vigilant to meet any Soviet challenge and be cautious of being lured into making premature agreements that could be harmful in the future. He discounted the efficacy of summit conferences with the Soviets, writing in 1958 that the United States had nothing to negotiate with the Soviet Union. He opposed GEORGE KENNAN's call for negotiations on American and Soviet withdrawal from Eastern and Western Europe and the reunification and neutralization of Germany. Acheson thought neutralization would eventually push Germany into the Soviet camp, while withdrawal of American troops would leave NATO countries vulnerable to communist infiltration. As late as 1959 he opposed summit meetings, where he thought the Soviet Union would possess all the advantages. Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev, he believed, would endeavor to obtain concessions from the West on Berlin and try to obtain American endorsement of the status quo in Eastern Europe. To make such an agreement, Acheson wrote, would be tantamount to another "Munich."

During the late 1950s, Acheson served as chairman of the Democratic Advisory Council's foreign policy committee. He spoke for the hard-line faction, which saw little possibility for accommodation with the Soviets. In contrast, such notable Democrats as ELEANOR ROOSEVELT and CHESTER BOWLES advocated closer relations with the USSR.

In the 1960s, Dean Acheson advised President JOHN F. KENNEDY during the Cuban missile crisis and President LYNDON B. JOHNSON on policy in Vietnam. Following the Tet offensive of early 1968, Johnson asked Acheson to make an independent study of U.S. involvement in Vietnam. Acheson concluded that the United States could not win the war without another major troop buildup, which the American people would not support. He advised the president to get out of Vietnam as soon as possible. His recommendation was a leading factor in Johnson's decision to de-escalate the war in March 1968. Acheson died on October 12, 1971.

Adams, John G(ibbons)

(1912–2003) general counsel, Department of the Army

Born in Ashland, Ky., on March 23, 1912, Adams earned a law degree from the University of South Dakota in 1935. He then worked for the South Dakota Department of Justice and served as vice president of the Young Republican National Federation. At the same time he owned and operated an oil company in Sioux Falls, S.Dak. In 1947 Adams moved to Washington as a clerk for the Senate Committee on Armed Services, and two years later, he became assistant general counsel for the Department of Defense. In 1953 he was named general counsel of the Department of the Army. That year the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chaired by Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), intensified its investigations of alleged subversive activity in the army. Adams soon came into conflict with the panel over what he regarded as its interference in army affairs.

In March 1954, the Army released a report, which Adams had helped draft, accusing the Investigations Subcommittee's counsel, ROY COHN of trying to exert pressure on the army to give special privileges to Pvt. G. DAVID SCHINE, a former special investigator for the subcommittee and a close friend of Cohn. Schine had been drafted in November 1953 and assigned to Fort Dix, N.J. McCarthy then called a press conference at which he accused Adams of trying to use Schine as a hostage to force McCarthy to call off his probe of communists in the army. The senator added that Adams had encouraged him to investigate the navy and air force instead. On March 16 the subcommittee voted to hold hearings on the dispute. In April Adams was named, along with Army Secretary ROBERT T. STEVENS and Assistant Defense Secretary H. STRUVE HENSEL, in formal charges filed by McCarthy.

During the Army-McCarthy hearings in April, May, and June, the army appointed JOSEPH N. WELCH as special counsel in the case. In testimony offered in May on the "abuse and pressure" he had received from Cohn on Schine's behalf, Adams alleged that Cohn had persistently sought to have his friend assigned to New York and had threatened to "wreck the army" if Schine were given overseas duty. Cohn and McCarthy testified that Adams had tried to blackmail them into dropping their investigations at Fort Monmouth, N.J., by threatening to circulate an embarrassing report about Cohn. Other testimony indicated that Adams had gone to great lengths to satisfy Cohn's demands. In the subcommittee's report, released in August, the Republican majority concluded that the charge of "improper influence" by McCarthy on behalf of Schine "was not established" and that Adams and Stevens had tried "to terminate or influence" the Fort Monmouth probe. Subcommittee Democrats, however, sharply condemned the actions of Cohn and McCarthy. In addition, they accused Stevens and Adams of following a "policy of appeasement" and of "weakness and lack of propriety."

Once a suitable period had passed after the Army-McCarthy hearings, Adams, under pressure from his superiors, resigned his position as the army's general counsel as of March 31, 1955. Adams began an unsuccessful career in the private practice of law. In 1958, the Eisenhower administration proposed Adams as a commissioner of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but Sen. STYLES BRIDGES announced his intention to block the appointment. Nevertheless, that same year, Adams became a senior attorney for the Civil Aeronautics Board. In 1965, Adams became a board member of the CAB and served until 1970. He joined a Washington, D.C., law firm for five years and then established a two-partner firm, from which he retired to write his account of the Army-McCarthy hearings. He died in Dallas, Tex., on June 26, 2003.

Adams, Sherman

(1899–1986) assistant to the president

The son of a grocery store owner, Adams was born on January 8, 1899. He served in the U.S. Marine Corps during World War I and received a B.A. from Dartmouth College in 1920. He then began a career in the lumber industry, starting as a clerk and scaler in southern Vermont and ultimately becoming general manager of a lumber company in Lincoln, N.H. Following a 1938 hurricane that leveled many trees in New Hampshire, Adams was selected to tour the state urging an emergency salvage effort.

His success encouraged him to wage a campaign for the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1940. He won the race and was reelected two years later. During his second term he became Speaker of the House.

In 1944, Adams was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. There he compiled a moderately conservative domestic record. He did not establish a clear pattern of voting in foreign affairs. In 1946 Adams lost the New Hampshire Republican gubernatorial primary by 157 votes and returned to private life.

Two years later, Adams waged a successful gubernatorial campaign; he won reelection in 1950. As governor he consolidated government departments to promote efficiency and attempted to reduce the budget. To set an example of austerity, Adams arrived at his office at dawn and in the winter walked to and from work on snowshoes.

On September 30, 1951, Adams joined five other Republicans at the annual Governors Conference in endorsing DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for their party's presidential nomination. The first primary was held in New Hampshire, and under Adams's leadership the Eisenhower forces won all the state's delegates to the Republican National Convention. With his home state's primary over, Adams campaigned for Eisenhower throughout the country. At the July convention he was the candidate's floor leader. He impressed Eisenhower with his penchant for hard work, mastery of detail, and skill in behind-the-scenes political combat.

Eisenhower asked Adams to be his campaign chief of staff. The governor accepted, and accompanied Eisenhower during the entire race. Adams decided when and where the candidate would speak and helped make major strategy decisions. Adams's endorsement of the proposal that Eisenhower pledge to go to Korea was an important factor in the presidential nominee's acceptance of the idea.

Shortly after the election, Eisenhower asked Adams to come to Washington as the president's chief of staff. As a former military officer, Eisenhower was accustomed to operating through channels of delegated authority and had been aided by highly competent chiefs of staff. As a result, Adams became one of the most powerful appointed officials in modern American history.

Adams was often given the tasks Eisenhower preferred not to do. Although the president directed patronage policy, it was Adams who dispensed jobs, making many enemies both within and without the Republican Party among disappointed office seekers and their sponsors. In 1953, for example, he offended WALTER REUTHER by rejecting his candidate for assistant secretary of labor. He was also influential in the firing of government officials and was believed to have had a significant role in the departures of Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare OVETA CULP HOBBY in 1955 and of Secretary of the Interior DOUGLAS MCKAY in 1956. Even when he did not have a hand in a dismissal, he was often assigned to convey the news to the individual.

Eisenhower avoided partisan public attacks on Democrats and frequently turned the job over to Adams. In reply, Democrats often denounced him rather than the president. Adams also put pressure on members of Congress to advance administration bills. Since Adams performed the unpleasant tasks that Eisenhower did not want to do, the presidential assistant's public image was the opposite of Eisenhower's. The president was known as a fatherly, genial man above partisan politics. Adams, on the other hand, was regarded as a cold-blooded, ruthless partisan. He was often referred to as "Great Stone Face" or as the administration's "Abominable No-Man."

Stories of Adams's influence and his control over access to the president appeared regularly in newspaper columns during the 1950s and made their way into histories of the period. In fact, those stories greatly exaggerated the truth. Adams served as Eisenhower's gatekeeper; people whom Eisenhower decided not to see blamed Adams. Similarly, individuals whose requests were denied did the same. Adams did control the flow of paper, which made it possible for Eisenhower to focus on larger issues of policy, and this gave Adams an indirect but not insubstantial influence on policy.

Adams generally stood with the liberal wing of the Republican Party. Soon after Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.) began his attacks on the administration in 1953, Adams urged Eisenhower to prepare a counteroffensive. He reportedly was the first to suggest that the army compile a record of its disputes with McCarthy. The resulting dossier was used in the Army-McCarthy hearings. During Eisenhower's first term, Adams opposed the conservative bloc within the administration, led by Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY, that stressed budget-balancing. He defended the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in its battles with Humphrey for additional funds and supported expanded social security and housing programs, federal aid for school construction, and high levels of foreign aid. After the president's reelection in 1956, Adams played a key role in replacing Humphrey with the more liberal ROBERT B. ANDERSON. At the same time he also had a hand in replacing conservatives such as Secretary of Defense CHARLES E. WILSON and Undersecretary of State HERBERT HOOVER, JR., with moderates NEIL H. McELROY and CHRISTIAN HERTER, respectively. In 1957, Adams backed the president's civil rights legislation and played a significant role in the administration's reaction to the desegregation crisis in Little Rock, Ark.

Eisenhower had used corruption in the Truman administration as a major Republican issue during the 1952 campaign. He asserted that public officials must be untainted by unethical as well as illegal activities. Adams appeared to be a strict enforcer of the president's standards. An investigation by the House Judiciary Committee's Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee in 1955 revealed that PETER STROBEL, commissioner of the Public Buildings Service, had approved contracts awarded to companies that were clients of his private firm. Although subcommittee chairman Rep. EMANUEL CELLER (D-N.Y.) decided that Strobel had not acted illegally, Adams forced the commissioner to resign. In February 1958 the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee's Legislative Oversight Subcommittee discovered that Federal Communications Commission member RICHARD A. MACK had received financial assistance from a friend seeking a license to operate a Miami television station. Adams immediately demanded Mack's resignation, which was tendered on March 3.

During 1958, serious questions arose concerning Adams's own public ethics. A congressional probe of his activities created the biggest scandal of the administration and culminated in Adams's resignation. In February 1958, the Legislative Oversight Subcommittee discovered that five years earlier Adams had apparently intervened with the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) on behalf of MURRAY CHOTINER, former campaign manager for Vice President Nixon and, in 1953, counsel for North American Airlines. Adams asked CAB chairman Herman B. Denny how the airline could delay the implementation of a board ruling revoking North American's operating license.

This matter was overshadowed in June and July 1958 when the panel probed the relationship between Adams and his old friend BERNARD GOLDFINE, a Boston textile magnate. Subcommittee staff members and witnesses charged that Adams received gifts from Goldfine during the early and mid 1950s while at the same time intervening on his friend's behalf with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).

Goldfine, it was alleged, had paid over $3,000 in hotel bills for Adams between 1953 and 1958 and had given him a vicuña coat, two suits, and a $2,400 oriental rug. Meanwhile, Goldfine was facing FTC mislabeling charges against his textile firms. FTC officials testified that in 1954 Adams had asked the commission chairman about the charges and the following year arranged a meeting between Goldfine and agency officials. In February 1957, the FTC merely issued a cease-and-desist order against Goldfine, although agency lawyers had recommended a civil suit. In 1956, the SEC had considered action against Goldfine for not filing required financial reports on his real estate operations. After Adams had directed an inquiry on the matter to the SEC, proceedings against Goldfine were dropped.

The presidential assistant appeared before the legislative oversight panel on June 17. He acknowledged the payment of his hotel bills by Goldfine and the receipt of the coat, suits, and rug. (He stated that the rug was a loan, not a gift.) However, he contended that the gifts were merely tokens of a long-standing friendship. Adams said that his efforts on behalf of Goldfine had been routine responses to requests and that he had not used his influence on his friend's behalf. He conceded, however, that unfavorable implications could be drawn from his actions and that "if I had the decisions before me to make, I believe I would have acted a little more prudently.”

President Eisenhower steadfastly defended Adams, but the presidential assistant received little additional support. He got backing from some Republican senators who were not up for reelection. However, the great majority of Republican congressmen running for office in 1958 believed that their candidacies would be damaged by Adams's presence in the White House, particularly since the administration had prided itself on its ethical standards. Moreover, conservative Republican, who had resented Adams, led the attack. Adams's position was further damaged when, on July 2, Goldfine's attorney revealed that the textile magnate had charged off the hotel bills and the rug as business expenses.

In late August, GOP national chairman MEADE ALCORN told the president that almost all party leaders and major financial backers believed Adams had to go. With great reluctance, Eisenhower finally agreed. The president understood that Adams had been “less than alert” in his dealings with Goldfine, but Eisenhower maintained that Adams was “not only honest, effective, and dedicated, but in most cases, his attackers know this to be true.”

On September 22, Adams submitted his resignation. Later that day he made a national television and radio address. He charged that he had been the victim of a “campaign of vilification” and asserted that he had “never influenced nor attempted to influence” any agency on any matter. Adams remained on the White House payroll into October to help the president's staff through its transition period. In late October, he flew home to Lincoln, N.H.

Adams became a part owner of a New Hampshire ski resort. In 1961, he published First-Hand Report: The Story of the Eisenhower Administration, detailing his years at the White House. He died in Hanover, N.H., on October 27, 1956.

Aiken, George D(avid)

(1892–1984) U.S. senator

Born in Dummerston, Vt., on August 30, 1892, and raised on his father's farm near Brattleboro, Vt., Aiken had a strong interest in agriculture and joined the local branch of the National Grange while in high school. Subsequently he became a leading expert in the commercial cultivation of wildflowers. In 1930, Aiken was elected to the state House of Representatives and was chosen speaker of that body in 1933. He ran successfully for lieutenant governor in 1935 and for governor in 1937 and 1939. A moderate Republican, Aiken gained national attention in 1937, when he wrote an open letter to his party's national committee urging abandonment of a “hate-Roosevelt” policy for a more positive program.

Aiken won election to the U.S. Senate in 1940. He gained a reputation for integrity and independence and won each of his subsequent reelection bids with over 65 percent of the vote. During the 1940s Aiken opposed the use of subsidies to lower farm prices and sought to revive the food stamp program of the 1930s. He was an active proponent of the Saint Lawrence Seaway project and backed federal aid to education and minimum wage legislation. In June 1950, Aiken joined Sen. MARGARET CHASE SMITH (R-Maine) and five other senators in signing a “Declaration of Conscience,” denouncing Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) use of “fear, bigotry, ignorance and intolerance” in his investigations of domestic communists.

One of the leaders of the congressional farm bloc, Aiken served as chairman of the Agriculture and Forestry Committee from 1953 to 1955. In 1953, he backed President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's plan to reorganize the Agriculture Department, which strengthened the authority of Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON. When Sen. WAYNE MORSE (I-Oreg.) said that the measure might create a one-man “super legislature,” Aiken replied that the farmers had “no better friend on earth” than Benson. The following year Aiken endorsed the administration's omnibus farm program, which proposed to replace fixed price supports with lower, flexible supports to discourage overproduction.

Aiken introduced the Water Facilities Act of 1954. The measure provided federal aid to rural communities seeking to develop an adequate power supply. Aiken believed that this measure was essential for the prosperity of rural America, and he regarded its adoption as one of his most important achievements. During the same year, he sponsored the Small Watershed Act, which authorized the secretary of agriculture to cooperate with state and local authorities in implementing projects for improving methods of soil conservation.

In 1958, Aiken opposed an amendment to a farm surplus disposal bill, offered by senators WILLIAM E. JENNER (R-Ind.) and STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.), that would have barred the sale of farm surpluses to communist countries. He commented that the Jenner-Bridges amendment would give the USSR "an iron-clad guarantee that we'll never attempt to win any satellite away from her." Aiken supported the farm surplus law of 1959, which provided for the distribution of excess farm products through a food stamp program and other means.

Aiken broke with his more conservative Republican colleagues on a number of issues. In January 1954 he and Sen. Smith were the only Republicans who opposed Robert E. Lee's confirmation as a member of the Federal Communications Commission. Lee was a conservative allegedly indebted to Sen. McCarthy for his appointment. During the same year, he joined senators JOHN J. WILLIAMS (R-Del.) and HERBERT H. LEHMAN (D-N.Y.) in an unsuccessful effort to cut oil and gas depletion allowances from 27.5 percent to 15 percent.

In 1960, Aiken and seven other Republican senators offered a voluntary federal-state health insurance program for all Americans over 65. Under the plan, the state would have contracted with private firms for the coverage, and subscribers would have made payments based on income, with the federal and state governments sharing the remaining costs. Aiken's proposal was more liberal than the administration plan, which limited aid to single elderly persons with adjusted gross incomes of up to $2,500 a year and married couples with annual incomes up to $3,800. The plan finally adopted in August contained most of the basic features of Aiken's proposal but required a means test and permitted each state to determine the type and extent of medical assistance provided.

Aiken backed the Kennedy administration's minimum wage and school aid programs in 1961 but voted against Medicare in 1962. During the late 1960s, he received national attention for his opposition to the Johnson administration's Vietnam War policies. In 1970 he supported the Cooper-Church amendment barring the use of American troops in Cambodia. Aiken retired from the Senate in 1975. He died of a stroke in Montpelier, Vt., in 1984.

Albert, Carl (Bert)

(1908–2000) U.S. congressman, House majority whip
The son of a poor farmer and coal miner, Albert was born in McAlester, Okla., on May 10, 1908. Soon after his birth, his family moved to Bug Tusle, Okla., just north of McAlester. An extremely able student, he graduated Phi Beta Kappa from the University of Oklahoma in 1931 and won a Rhodes scholarship to study at Oxford, where he earned two law degrees. Upon his return to the United States in 1934, Albert worked as a law clerk, accountant, and lawyer until 1941, when he enlisted in the army. He served in the Pacific and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. In 1946, Albert, bucking a Republican tide, won a seat as a Democrat in the U.S. House of Representatives by a narrow 329-vote margin. He backed President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy and generally supported the administration's domestic programs. However, he opposed the anti-poll tax bill in 1947 and voted to override Truman's vetoes of the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947 and the communist-control bill in 1950.

Albert consistently backed the House's Democratic leadership. From the beginning of his congressional tenure, he carefully scrutinized the operations of the lower chamber to acquaint himself with its procedures and with the voting patterns of its members. Because of his loyalty and diligence, his Democratic colleagues tapped him for leadership positions. In August 1954, he became cochairman of the party's speakers committee for the forthcoming congressional campaign. The Democrats captured control of the House in the November elections, and in January 1955 Reps. SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and JOHN W. MCCORMACK (D-Mass.), the new speaker and majority leader, respectively, chose him to serve as majority whip.

As whip, Albert's functions were to familiarize himself with the sentiments of the Democratic members of the House, persuade wavering representatives to vote as the leadership wished, and make certain that Democratic members were on the floor for major votes. An undemonstrative, modest man, Albert worked behind the scenes using persuasion and compromise rather than threats to win support for the Democratic leadership's proposals.

Although some journalists described Albert as an effective bridge between northern liberals and southern conservatives, some congressional liberals viewed his desire to compromise as an indication of ineffective leadership. Moreover, Albert opposed civil rights bills in 1956 and 1957. Reacting to liberal complaints, not only about Albert but also about McCormack and Rayburn, the Democratic National Committee announced in 1956 its intention to appoint an advisory committee of non-congressional liberals to help shape the party's legislative program. However, when the Democratic congressional leadership refused to cooperate with the plan, it was abandoned.

As a representative of a predominantly rural state, one of Albert's major concerns was farm policy. Using his power as majority whip, member of the Agriculture Committee, and, beginning in 1955, chairman of its Wheat Subcommittee, he opposed the Eisenhower administration's program of reduced and flexible price supports. Soon after becoming majority whip, Albert predicted that the new Democratic House majority would vote to reestablish high, rigid supports. In May 1955 the lower chamber passed a bill supporting major crops at 90 percent of parity, but the measure did not reach the Senate floor that year. Eisenhower vetoed a similar bill, passed by both houses in 1956. In 1959 Albert backed a bill offering wheat growers the alternative of reducing their acreage by 25 percent and receiving 90 percent of parity price support or receiving 50 percent of parity with no production controls. Eisenhower also vetoed this measure.

Following Rayburn's death in 1961, McCormack became Speaker, and Albert replaced McCormack as majority leader. As leader, Albert played a significant role in advancing the Democratic legislative agenda in the 1960s. In particular, he was a central figure in obtaining passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and Medicare. Albert gained national notoriety when he presided over the unruly Democratic National Convention in 1968. When McCormack retired in 1971, Albert succeeded him as Speaker. Although he hoped to serve as a unifier of his party, Albert was less than successful in that regard. He sided against autocratic committee chairmen and, during his tenure, Congress did make some small adjustments in the seniority system. Although this won him plaudits among reformers, he often appeared weak, and he vacillated on important issues. Albert did not seek reelection in 1976 and returned to McAlester. For a short time, he was "of counsel" to the Washington law firm of Cohn and Marks. He died in McAlester on February 4, 2000.

Alcorn, (Hugh) Meade (Jr.)

(1907–1992) chairman, Republican National Committee

The son of a distinguished Republican jurist from Connecticut, Meade Alcorn was born in Suffield, Conn., on October 20, 1907. He attended Dartmouth College and Yale University School of Law, where he received his LL.B. degree in 1933. That year Alcorn was admitted to the Connecticut bar and joined his father's law firm. He immediately became active in Republican politics, joining the Suffield Republican Committee. Alcorn served as a Republican representative in the Connecticut General Assembly from 1936 to 1942. He served as majority leader in 1939 and speaker in 1941. In 1942, he was appointed state attorney for Hartford Co., a post he held for six years. Alcorn ran unsuccessfully for lieutenant governor on the Republican ticket in 1948. He served as state chairman of the Connecticut "Eisenhower for President" committee in 1952 and was a delegate to the Republican National Convention, where he assisted Eisenhower's floor leader, SHERMAN ADAMS, in rounding up votes.

In 1953, Alcorn and other liberal Eisenhower supporters won election to the Republican National Committee. Two years later, the national chairman, LEONARD HALL, chose him to assist in making arrangements for the Republican National Convention in 1956. Together with Hall, Alcorn backed retention of RICHARD NIXON as vice president, despite criticism of his right-wing stands. Alcorn denounced Democratic attacks on the vice president and quieted Republican fears about his popularity by pointing to a Gallup poll showing that an Eisenhower-Nixon ticket would win in November. That fall Alcorn worked hard for the Republican national ticket in Connecticut.

At a news conference in January 1957, President Eisenhower spoke of Alcorn as one of the party leaders responsible for "modern Republicanism." Alcorn described this as "enlightened conservatism" that favored government services without government restriction of individual liberty. When Leonard Hall resigned in January 1957, Eisenhower enthusiastically supported Alcorn for national chairman. Alcorn took office immediately.

The new chairman announced that his first priority was to elect a Republican Congress in 1958. Signs were unfavorable for the Republicans, however. Inflation, Little Rock, Sputnik, and contention over the budget eroded Eisenhower's popularity in 1957. Within the Republican party, conservatives became increasingly reactive. Sensing a rightward drift, Alcorn attempted to focus attention on charges that the Democrats had been the party of corruption and treason during the late 1940s and early 1950s. His charges backfired. In March 1958, Federal Communications Commission head RICHARD MACK, accused of taking bribes, was forced to resign under pressure from the White House. Alcorn's assertion that Mack was a Democrat did not change the fact that he had been a Republican appointee. Three months later, Sherman Adams, the president's chief of staff, was accused of accepting gifts while in office. The scandal grew throughout the summer, and financial contributions to the National Committee dropped off sharply. In August Alcorn conducted a secret survey of the Republican National Committee that indicated all members favored Adams's dismissal. Alcorn carried this information to the president, who asked Alcorn to convey the news to Adams. Adams resigned in September.

That month an election in normally Republican Maine saw Democratic Gov. Edmund Muskie swamp his Republican opponent. Alcorn's worst fears were realized in the congressional elections eight weeks later. Republicans lost 47 seats in the House and 13 in the Senate, a rout unmatched since the 1930s. In April 1959, Meade Alcorn resigned. He returned to private law practice and continued representing Connecticut on the Republican National Committee until 1961. Alcorn remained active with the law firm of Tyner, Cooper and Alcorn until his 80th birthday. He died in Suffield, Conn., on January 13, 1992.

Aldrich, Winthrop W(illiams)

(1885–1974) ambassador to Great Britain

The son of a powerful conservative senator, Nelson W. Aldrich (R-R.I.), Aldrich was born on November 2, 1885, in Providence, R.I. He was descended from the Pilgrims and the noted theologian Roger Williams. After receiving a B.A. degree from Harvard in 1907 and an LL.B. from that institution three years later, he joined a prominent New York law firm. Aldrich served in the Naval Reserve during World War I. In 1919 he joined the law firm of Murray, Prentice, and Howland and became a specialist in finance and banking. In perhaps his most significant case, he successfully represented the Rockefeller family interests in their fight for control of Standard Oil of Indiana. In 1930, he became president of the Chase National Bank; four years later he rose to chairman of the board.

During World War II, Aldrich directed Allied relief efforts. As president of the International Chamber of Commerce during the Truman administration, he helped win conservative support for the Marshall Plan and the president's foreign aid proposals. Aldrich was an early supporter of Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for president. In 1951 he helped survey potential Eisenhower support in Texas and reportedly raised large sums of money for the general during the 1952 election campaign.

Shortly after the election, Eisenhower named Aldrich ambassador to Great Britain. The Senate confirmed the appointment in February 1953. As ambassador, Aldrich took little part in the formulation of policy and served primarily as a spokesman for the administration. During the mid-1950s, he was particularly involved in discussions on the Middle East. After Egypt seized the Suez Canal and closed it to international shipping in July 1956, Aldrich attempted to forestall war between Great Britain and France (the major investors in the canal) and Egypt. He warned that the United States would not back military efforts to reopen the waterway. His efforts failed; during late October the British, French, and Israelis attacked Egypt.

British public opinion deplored the American failure to join in the invasion. Aldrich vigorously sought to reestablish good will between the United States and Great Britain, but strained relations between the two nations compelled him to announce his retirement in December 1956. At a farewell dinner for Aldrich in February 1957, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan praised him for playing "a remarkable and indeed historic role during those weeks of anxious strain." Because of Aldrich's efforts, the prime minister asserted, the British government looked forward to reestablishing relations with the United States "on the old level."

Upon returning to the United States, Aldrich resumed his business activities. He died in New York City on February 25, 1974, at the age of 88.

Allen, George V(enable)

(1903–1970) ambassador to India and Nepal; assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs; U.S. Information Agency director

Born in Durham, N.C., on November 3, 1903, Allen graduated from Duke University in 1924. He taught high school in Buncombe Co., N.C., for four years and simultaneously worked as a reporter for the Asheville (N.C.) Times. In 1930, he joined the Foreign Service. Prior to World War II, he held posts in Kingston, Shanghai, Athens, and Cairo. Recalled to Washington in 1938, Allen became assistant chief of the State Department's new Eastern division in 1942; two years later, he advanced to chief of the Middle Eastern division. Allen was a member of the first U.S. delegation to the United Nations in 1945. The following year, he was appointed ambassador to Iran. He served as assistant secretary of state for public affairs from 1948 to 1950 and was ambassador to Yugoslavia from 1950 to 1953. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER nominated him to succeed CHESTER BOWLES as ambassador to India and Nepal in February 1953.

During his two years in India, Allen attempted to allay fears that the Eisenhower administration was pursuing a pro-Pakistan policy at the expense of India. He was also called upon to explain the 1954 India-Communist Chinese mutual nonaggression agreement to the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Allen observed that India regarded Communist China with an uneasy mixture of fear and admiration. The United States, Allen urged the committee, should respond by increasing its aid to India to help make it "a source of strength to the free world."

In January 1955, President Eisenhower nominated Allen to be assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs. He was confirmed that month. In September Allen undertook his most important mission for the Eisenhower administration. During the spring of 1955, after several Egyptian raids across the armistice line along the Gaza Strip had provoked a large-scale Israeli reprisal, Egyptian premier Gamal Abdel Nasser had sent the United States several requests for military aid. Negotiations led to an impasse. The United States never officially turned down the request, but it continued to stall. Finally, in June 1955, Nasser threatened to ask the USSR for weapons. The State Department did not consider the threat seriously. By late September, the deal appeared all but consummated, and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES hurriedly sent the Central Intelligence Agency's Middle Eastern expert, KERMIT ROOSEVELT, to urge Nasser to reconsider the Soviet arms deal. However, Roosevelt was unable to head off the arms accord, which the Soviets and the Egyptians formally signed on September 27, 1955.

The next day, Dulles sent Allen to Cairo in a final effort to turn Nasser around and discuss the ramifications of the pact. Allen believed his mission ill-conceived. As far as he was concerned, it could only appear to the Arab world as an American ultimatum to Nasser.

Allen's visit to Cairo was, according to historian Townsend Hoopes, "a reasonably cordial exercise in futility." At first Allen was something less than candid, explaining to Nasser that, while the United States could understand Egypt's policy of neutrality, it surely was not neutral to accept weapons from a single source. At this point, Nasser recounted his frustrations in getting a clear reply to his frequent pleas for U.S. arms. The Egyptian ruler further emphasized his country's need to maintain a military balance vis-à-vis Israel. Allen warned Nasser that Soviet arms would mean the introduction of Soviet technicians and advisers and argued that their presence might endanger Egyptian sovereignty. Nasser dismissed the threat. Leaving Cairo, Allen told reporters that, while the United States regretted the Egyptian-Soviet arms deal, it firmly believed that Nasser's sole purpose was to defend his country. Nevertheless, relations between the two nations remained severely strained.

Allen remained assistant secretary until October 1957, when the White House announced his appointment as director of the U.S. Information Agency (USIA). Taking over the agency at a time when its prestige and budget were at an all-time low, Allen attempted to change its often-criticized image. To counter charges that the USIA was naïve and propaganda-oriented, he attempted to adapt the agency's information to the needs and viewpoints of the recipient nations. This policy brought him into frequent conflict with his superiors in the State Department.

In 1961, Allen left the State Department and became president of the Tobacco Institute. During the next few years, he defended the tobacco industry against the early reports linking cigarette smoking to lung cancer. In 1966 President LYNDON JOHNSON named Allen a career ambassador and appointed him head of the Foreign Service Institute. He retired in 1969 and died in Durham, N.C., on July 11, 1970.

Allen, Leo E(Iwood)

Allen was born on October 5, 1898, in Elizabeth, Ill. He received a B.A. degree from the University of Michigan in 1923 and the following year became a clerk in the Jo Daviess Co., Ill., Circuit Court. Admitted to the Illinois bar in 1929, he began practicing law in Galena the next year. Allen won election as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1932, where he established a record as an isolationist and opponent of New Deal domestic programs. After the Republicans gained control of the House in the 1946 elections, he served as chairman of the Rules Committee. In that post, he attempted to block universal military training legislation but failed to defeat the Selective Service Act of 1948. During the Truman administration, Allen compiled a consistently conservative record, backing the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, the Internal Security Act of 1950, and the McCarran Act of 1952.

Allen again became chairman of the Rules Committee in 1953, following the Republican electoral sweep of the preceding year. As head of the committee, he defended Eisenhower's tax proposals against the attacks of Ways and Means Committee chairman Rep. DANIEL REED (R-N.Y.). Early in 1953, Reed's panel blocked an administration bill to extend an excess profits tax on corporations. In June the Rules Committee, under Allen's leadership, took the unusual step of reporting the bill to the floor without a favorable vote from the Ways and Means Committee. At about the same time, Allen blocked Reed's bill to cut income taxes, which the administration opposed.

Allen opposed a $1 minimum wage in 1955. He claimed that it would harm "2.5 million subnormals and elderly people" whom employers would not be willing to pay eight dollars a day. During the same year, he favored the deregulation of natural gas prices.

As a member of the Rules Committee, Allen formed part of the southern Democratic-Republican coalition that prevented many social welfare measures from reaching the House floor. In 1959, his vote helped produce a tie in the committee that blocked the progress of a $1 billion housing bill. The following year, he and the panel's other conservatives succeeded in stalling another housing bill. During the same year, they were also able to stop an aid-to-education measure. However, Allen and most of the other Republicans on the committee broke with the southern Democrats in 1957 and 1960 to enable the administration's civil rights bills to go to the House floor.

Allen declined to run for reelection in 1960. He died in Galena, Ill., on January 19, 1973.

Allison, John M(oore)

(1905–1978) assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern Affairs, ambassador to Japan, ambassador to Indonesia, ambassador to Czechoslovakia

Allison was born on April 7, 1905, in Molton, Kans. After graduating from the University of Nebraska in 1927, Allison went to Japan to teach English. In 1930, he began his diplomatic career as a clerk in the American consulate in Shanghai. Between 1932 and 1941, Allison was alternately stationed in China and Japan. He was interned by the Japanese for six months following the attack on Pearl Harbor. Allison spent the remainder of World War II in London, where he participated in negotiations for shipping and transportation agreements. He returned to Washington in 1947 to become assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs. In 1950 he served as special assistant to JOHN FOSTER DULLES in preliminary negotiations for the Japanese peace treaty. The treaty was signed in 1951.

Eisenhower nominated Allison ambassador to Japan in March 1954, and the Senate confirmed the nomination the following month. Allison's chief problem in the post was the issue of Japanese rearmament. Dulles exerted strong pressure on Allison to convince Japan to rearm itself as a primary bulwark against communist expansion in the Pacific. However, the Japanese were solidly opposed to the plan. They had not only accepted Gen. Douglas MacArthur's postwar idea that Japan should become the "Switzerland of Asia," but had also written it into a strongly antiwar constitution. Japanese constitutional experts argued that any military establishment would violate the postwar constitution. In addition, the Japanese faced severe economic problems well into the 1950s and thus maintained that the nation could not afford a strong defense force. Allison took a stand against the secretary of state on the rearmament issue. He strongly believed that Japan, as an autonomous nation, should not be reduced to a forward bastion of American strategic strength.

Allison's sympathy for the Japanese position considerably aided negotiations. On March 8, 1954, the two nations signed a mutual defense agreement. The United States agreed to give at least $100 million in finished weapons, industrial subsidies to munitions makers, and other types of economic aid. In return, Japan promised to rebuild its armed forces under U.S. guidance and make a "full contribution to the strength of the anti-Communist world." Allison disliked the provision permitting the United States to intervene in the Japanese budgetary process to guarantee $155 million annually for the support of American troops there. In April 1955, he reached an agreement with Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida that the United States would assume one-third of the Japanese burden for American troops, in return for which Japan would spend more on its airfields and armed forces. However, Dulles disavowed the agreement in August.

Allison faced a more emotional problem in March 1954, when a Japanese fishing boat was contaminated with radioactive ash from an American nuclear bomb test in the South Pacific. One crew member died as a result. Allison was widely praised for the way he handled the delicate situation, which resulted in an American settlement of $2 million in January 1955.

Allison was appointed ambassador to Indonesia in April 1957. During the early years of the decade, he had been a strong anticommunist. However, by the time of this appointment, he had come to believe that foreign relations should not be defined simply in terms of anticommunist ideology. He maintained that nations generally acted on self-interest rather than political doctrine, and so he was not overly concerned with President Achmed Sukarno's left-wing tendencies. Because Washington feared Sukarno's overtures to the Soviet Union, Allison was unable to acquire the U.S. support he believed necessary to prevent a further drift to the left. When he recommended that the United States back Sukarno's bid for a UN resolution calling for Indonesian control over Western New Guinea, Washington recommended that the ambassador encourage regional uprisings against Sukarno.

Finding his advice disregarded by the State Department, Allison offered his resignation in September 1957. In a final attempt to influence policy, he sent a telegram in November recommending that the United States support the transfer of Western New Guinea to Indonesia after five years in exchange for economic concessions to the Dutch, who still owned the territory. The concessions included Indonesian adherence to the ANZUS Pact; a pledge from Sukarno to “control strictly” communist activity and “accept American assistance and guidance in anti-subversive activities”; and increased U.S. aid to Indonesia. The State Department rejected the proposal when Australia and the Netherlands opposed it.

Allison was appointed ambassador to Czechoslovakia in March 1958. He served there until 1960, when he resigned from the Foreign Service because of his wife’s ill health. Allison retired to Honolulu, where he taught at the University of Hawaii. He died on October 28, 1978.

Allott, Gordon (Llewellyn)

(1907–1989) U.S. senator

The son of a federal meat inspector, Allott was born on January 2, 1907, in Pueblo, Colo. After graduating from the University of Colorado, he earned a law degree from the same institution in 1929 and was admitted to the bar later that year. He then set up a legal practice in Lamar, Colo., a wheat-belt trading center. During the 1930s and 1940s, Allott was active on state and national Republican committees. After serving as county attorney of Prowers County, city attorney of Lamar, and district attorney of the 15th judicial district, Allott won election as lieutenant governor in 1950.

A close friend of former Minnesota Gov. HAROLD STASSEN, Allott backed Stassen’s unsuccessful bid for the presidential nomination in 1952. In 1954, Allott ran for the U.S. Senate on a platform supporting the Eisenhower administration’s farm policy. With strong support from the state’s farm sections, he won an upset victory against the popular Democrat, John Carroll.

Allott voted as a conservative Republican on most issues during the Eisenhower administration. However, he supported the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. As a member of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, Allott helped win Senate approval of the Upper Colorado River Project in 1955. The project was one of the largest and most important federal reclamation efforts up to that time. Conservationists, however, objected to the Allott-backed proposal to flood much of the Dinosaur National Monument in Colorado and Utah. This provision was deleted from the final version of the bill as passed by the House in 1956.

During the 1960s, Allott opposed most of the Democratic administrations’ domestic legislative programs. In 1969 he won the chairmanship of the powerful Senate Republican Conference Committee. Allott lost his bid for reelection in 1972. He died in Englewood, Colo., on January 17, 1989.

Born in Charlottesville, Va., on June 15, 1898, Almond earned his LL.B. at the University of Virginia in 1923. He practiced law in Roanoke for the next nine years. In 1932, he was elected judge of Roanoke’s Hustings Court and served until 1945. He then successfully ran as a Democrat to fill a House seat vacated by the resignation of Clifton A. Woodrum (D-Va.). Reelected to a full term in 1946, Almond compiled a generally conservative record, voting to extend the draft and override President HARRY S. TRUMAN’s veto of the Taft-Hartley bill. He resigned from Congress in April 1948 to complete a term as state attorney general after the occupant died in office.

Almond campaigned for a four-year term as attorney general in 1949 on a platform supporting an amendment that would have repealed the poll tax and placed increased restrictions on the right to vote. Although the amendment was defeated, Almond won handily. As attorney general, he expected to be the Byrd organization candidate for governor, but in January 1953 he withdrew his name at Sen. HARRY F. BYRD’s (D-Va.) request. He won election to a second term as attorney general in November.

During 1952, Almond pleaded the state’s case in Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County. The suit had been brought by African Americans demanding that the state law requiring segregated schools be struck down. Although privately conceding that African Americans had received an inferior education in the state, Almond opposed demands for school integration and rejected the NAACP’s contention that separate but equal facilities were inherently discriminatory. Instead, he recommended the use of funds to equalize black facilities. A three-member federal court upheld the constitutionality of the Virginia statute but ordered the unequal facilities remedied. The case was later taken to the Supreme Court, where it became one of several argued as Brown v. Board of Education. Almond helped present Virginia's case before the high tribunal. In May 1954, the Supreme Court unanimously declared segregated schools unconstitutional.

In the wake of the decision, Virginia Gov. THOMAS B. STANLEY appointed a commission, headed by Garland Gray, to seek means to preserve the status quo in Virginia's schools. Issued in November 1955, the Gray Commission's report recommended that local authorities be permitted to close public schools threatened with integration. The state would then pay tuition for private schooling. These recommendations won approval in a referendum held in March 1956. Interpreting approval of the local option as total support for segregation, Sen. Byrd called for "massive resistance" to the Supreme Court's decision. The state would close schools threatened with integration regardless of local feeling. Segregationists relied on the theory of interposition to justify Virginia's resistance. According to this theory, a state had the right to interpose its authority between its people and the improper exercise of power by the federal government.

During the dispute over the Brown decision, Almond maintained a moderate position and in April 1956 stated that interposition had no legal validity. While such prominent Southerners as Texas Gov. ALLAN SHIVERS advocated a regional candidate for president in 1956 and the Byrd machine remained neutral, Almond worked for the 1956 Democratic national ticket.

When Almond announced his candidacy for governor in late 1956, Byrd concluded he could not stop the attorney general and so endorsed him. Running as the organization candidate, and recognizing a rightward drift in public sentiment, Almond campaigned on a platform of massive resistance. Yet, he remained skeptical of that position and surprised segregationists in October 1957 by saying there would be a degree of forced integration under federal mandate. Despite the statement, Almond went on to win the governorship two-to-one over Republican Ted Dalton the following month.

In his inaugural address, Almond gave unqualified support for opposition to the Brown decision. "Against massive attacks," he stated, "we must marshal massive resistance." He warned that "integration anywhere means destruction everywhere." Almond sensed rising segregationist sentiment and in April sponsored legislation consolidating state control of pupil assignments and strengthening the governor's school closing authority. In September Almond closed nine schools that were under court order to integrate.

During the fall of 1958, moderate forces began demanding a change of position on school integration. In October the Virginia Parent-Teacher Association urged abandonment of interposition and adoption of the local option. Shortly thereafter, city newspapers began to withdraw support for massive resistance. By December 29 leading industrialists had become sufficiently alarmed by declining out-of-state investment to call on Almond and urge him to drop interposition. Attempting to stall until the direction of public opinion was clear, Almond refused to invoke laws that permitted him to reopen closed schools as segregated institutions. He also directed his attorney general to prepare a test case for the Virginia courts. According to historian Numan Bartley, Almond presumed that federal courts would strike down massive resistance and thought that it would be better received if the decision came from a state court. On January 19, 1959, both a federal district court and the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals ruled that closing schools and withholding state funds from integrated institutions was unconstitutional.

While denouncing the decision, the governor maneuvered Virginia toward compliance with the order. He called a special session of the legislature in January and cautiously sounded a retreat from massive resistance. Closed schools were reopened, and three city systems began at least token desegregation. In the legislature, Almond prevented a resurgence of extremist forces led by the Byrd organization. A report by the Perrow Commission, packed with Almond-appointed moderates, recommended a 15-bill program to develop a policy of local option that held integration to token levels.

The legislature enacted the measures in April despite bitter opposition.

During the remaining years of his term, the breach between Almond and Byrd hardened, and the governor purged Byrd supporters at every opportunity. Forbidden by law to succeed himself, Almond ran his own antiorganization candidate for governor in the July 1961 Democratic primary. His effort failed, and Byrd maintained control of the statehouse. In 1962 Almond was appointed a judge of the Federal Patents Court, where he served until his retirement in 1973. He died in Richmond, Va., on April 15, 1986.

Born on October 11, 1910, in Avelon, Conn., Joseph Alsop was the eldest son of one of the most socially prominent families in Connecticut. His father was an insurance executive, and both his parents served several terms in the state legislature. Alsop attended the prestigious Groton School and graduated from Harvard magna cum laude in 1932. Family influence gained him a job as a reporter for the New York Herald Tribune. Alsop quickly proved to be one of the paper's top feature writers and in 1936 was sent to Washington, D.C., to cover the capital news. Alsop soon established a secure position for himself in the Washington political and social scene. From 1937 to 1940, he coauthored with Robert E. Kintner a syndicated column entitled "The Capitol Parade," which was distributed to almost 100 newspapers throughout the country. During the same period, he collaborated on several books dealing with various aspects of both domestic and foreign affairs.

Although an isolationist during the 1930s, Alsop adopted a strong interventionist stance well before America's entry into World War II. In 1940 he initiated lobbying efforts that proved decisive in convincing Roosevelt to honor Great Britain's urgent request for American warships. Alsop served briefly in the navy during World War II but soon resigned his commission in order to become an adviser and supporter of Gen. Claire Chennault and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) in wartime China. Alsop's experience left him a strong supporter of Nationalist China and a vigorous anticommunist.

In 1946 Alsop resumed his work as a columnist, this time collaborating with his brother STEWART. Through their column, "Matter of Fact," they built a joint reputation as leading commentators of the day on foreign affairs. In both 1950 and 1952, they received recognition from the Overseas Press Club for "the best interpretation of foreign news." The Alsops took a strong stand against McCarthyism, maintaining that the real threat to the United States was not internal communist subversion, but external communist attack.

During the Eisenhower administration, the Alsops took a pessimistic view of world events. The column's doom-crying refrain was primarily the responsibility of Joseph Alsop. His New Year's message in 1954 was simply, "All is lost." In general, his favorite descriptions of the 1950s depicted an era poised dangerously on "the edge of the abyss."

In the autumn of 1953, Alsop journeyed to Asia, where he wrote ominously of the great power of Communist China and the harmful effects of the armistice in Korea. In November he called upon the American government to take a more active role in Vietnam. He warned that if the French pulled out, all of Indochina would soon fall under communist control. Alsop returned to Southeast Asia a number of times, always writing of its imminent collapse.

In 1956, Alsop turned his attention to the Middle East. He described the problems of Arab nationalism, growing Soviet involvement, and the plight of Palestinian refugees. He perceptively described the emerging crisis. The following year, he found himself in the Soviet Union. There he described the enormous strength of Soviet industry and what he thought was the illusory nature of de-Stalinization. "While somewhat more supple than their late master," he said, "Stalin's heirs have actually proven somewhat more adventurous."

In 1954, the brothers collaborated on a book entitled We Accuse!, which denounced the Atomic Energy Commission, and the commission's head LEWIS STRAUSS, in particular, for refusing to reinstate J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER's security clearance. They defended Oppenheimer's prewar connections with left-wing organizations as a "brand of political folly that was a common highbrow reaction to the menace of Nazism.” The Alsops pointed out that the scientist had quickly renounced the ties and had become what they saw as a prominent cold warrior, a position they both lauded. The two writers maintained that Oppenheimer had been brought to trial not because of his left-wing connections but because of his opposition to the development of the hydrogen bomb. The Alsops termed the administration’s security system “inherently repugnant in its present standards and procedures to every high tradition of the American past.” The two brothers predicted that if the system were not reformed quickly “lasting harm will begin to be done.”

In March 1958, the Alsop brothers ended their 12-year partnership when Stewart took a job as a contributing editor for the Saturday Evening Post. Their reputation was then at its height. The column was distributed to almost 200 newspapers throughout the world. Several months earlier, Newsweek had called the brothers “possibly the most influential and provocative columnists in the business.” After they ended their partnership, they collected a number of their articles into a book, The Reporter’s Trade, which they introduced with a plea for the government to be more open with the press. They also praised Eisenhower for bringing the McCarthy era to a close but criticized him for not pouring enough money into the national defense effort. Joseph Alsop continued to write “Matter of Fact” alone, focusing on the cold war struggle between the United States and the USSR. During the last years of the decade, he was one of several prominent Americans to warn of a growing “missile gap” between the United States and the USSR (a claim that was inaccurate).

Alsop was a firm supporter of the Vietnam War. In 1964, he wrote what some critics thought was his best book, From the Silent Earth, a study of the Greek bronze age. Alsop retired in 1974, soon after his brother’s death. Joseph Alsop died of cancer and emphysema on August 28, 1989 in Washington, D.C. —JPL

Alsop, Stewart (Johonnot) (Oliver)

(1914–1974) journalist, author

Alsop was born in Avon, Conn., on May 17, 1914, into a Connecticut family with a history of government service. His mother was a niece of Theodore Roosevelt and a cousin of both Franklin and ELEANOR ROOSEVELT. Stewart Alsop attended Groton and then Yale University, where he graduated in 1936. He became an editor for the Doubleday Doran publishing company in New York. Following the U.S. entry into World War II, he attempted to enlist in the army but was rejected on medical grounds. He then went to England and joined the rifle corps. In 1944, he was transferred to the U.S. Army. Alsop served in the Office of Strategic Services and parachuted into occupied France shortly after D-day. On his return to the United States, Stewart collaborated with his brother JOSEPH ALSOP on a syndicated column, “Matter of Fact.” The partnership lasted until 1958.

In 1950 and 1952, both Alsops were cited by the Overseas Press Club for the “best interpretation of foreign news.” In 1954 they joined forces to write We Accuse!, a defense of J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER against security-risk charges investigated by the Atomic Energy Commission. The book won an award by the Author’s Guild in 1955 for its contribution to civil liberties. When Stewart Alsop accepted a job as a contributing editor for the Saturday Evening Post in 1958, the brothers ended what had often been described as a “stormy partnership.” Later that year, they published The Reporter’s Trade, a collection of their columns introduced by a plea for government candor with the press.

In contrast to his brother, Stewart Alsop was a family man, a cautious writer, and a cheerful personality. Although he generally agreed with his brother’s positions, he freely conceded that “Joe can play the organ of gloom better than I.” During their partnership, his main contribution was a series of articles on ballistic missiles. He was the first to point out that the air force planned to fire an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) in 1957 and the first to report the Soviet ICBM tests.

Alsop had announced his support for Eisenhower as a presidential candidate as early as April 1950. However, soon after Eisenhower took office, Alsop joined his brother in criticizing the president for placing budgetary considerations above defense requirements. They expressed this view in an early series of attacks on GEORGE HUMPHREY, Eisenhower’s first secretary of the treasury. In his Nixon and Eisenhower, published in 1960, Alsop repeated the charge that the Eisenhower administration had failed “to maintain a genuine balance of power with the Communist bloc.” However, he offset the charge with his judgement that “the Eisenhower years have been a settling-down period, a time of adjustment and stabilization after an era of enormous change.”

Alsop continued working for the Saturday Evening Post until its close in 1968, when he began writing a weekly column for Newsweek. Although he was slow in advocating American withdrawal from Vietnam, he did not give the war the kind of support his brother did. In 1973 he wrote Stay of Execution about his impending death from leukemia. He continued his work for Newsweek until the eve of his death. His last articles expressed his concern over Watergate and his loss of faith in Richard Nixon, whom he had long admired. He died on May 26, 1974, in Bethesda, Md.

Anastasia, Albert

Born Umberto Anastasia on September 26, 1902, in Tropea, Calabria, Italy, Umberto Anastasia joined the Mafia while in Italy. He jumped ship in New York in 1919 but later reentered the United States legally. Encouraged by official laxity, Anastasia and his three brothers subverted the Brooklyn longshoremen's union. He changed his name to Albert Anastasia in 1921, following his arrest for the murder of a fellow longshoreman. Anastasia spent 18 months on death row until, in what was to become a familiar gangland pattern, a new trial was granted on a technicality and a four important prosecution witnesses disappeared. Arrested again in 1923, he served two years for carrying a gun. Between 1921 and 1954, he was arrested 10 times, five for murder.

In the 1920s, Anastasia served under Giuseppe (“Joe the Boss”) Masseria. Anastasia, however, was loyal to CHARLES (“LUCKY”) LUCIANO and FRANK COSTELLO. Anastasia sided with Luciano when the latter attempted to depose the old-line families headed by Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano. When Luciano emerged victorious in what became known as the Castellammarese War, Luciano placed Anastasia and Louis (“Lepke”) Buchalter in charge of the enforcement arm of the National Crime Syndicate, known as Murder, Incorporated. Anastasia and Buchalter terrorized unions in New York's garment district, often extorting “sweetheart contracts” at gunpoint. Between 1931 and 1940, Murder Inc., allegedly committed 63 murders. Abe (“Kid Twist”) Reles, a hit man for Murder, Inc., was arrested and agreed to testify against others in exchange for immunity from prosecution. His testimony led to the conviction of Buchalter and a number of hit men. Buchalter was sent to the electric chair in 1941. However, Anastasia went free when Brooklyn District Attorney William O'Dwyer, who had connections to organized crime, declined to prosecute him when Reles died after going out of a window in a room at the Half Moon Hotel while in police custody. O'Dwyer was censured by a grand jury for his conduct. From 1942 to 1944, Anastasia served in the army. After his discharge he bought a dress factory in order to establish a legitimate front.

In the early 1950s, Anastasia came into conflict with the head of his family, Vincent Mangano. When the latter vanished in 1951, Anastasia became head of the Mangano family.

During the 1950s, Anastasia's activities were the subject of two highly publicized congressional hearings. In 1950 and 1951, Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) and his Senate Crime Investigating Committee probed what they thought was a massive crime conspiracy aided by official corruption. Anastasia was called to testify and was cited for contempt of Congress when he refused to tell the committee how he earned his living. The Kefauver Committee report accused O'Dwyer, who was then ambassador to Mexico, of aiding crime by not prosecuting Anastasia. Despite the publicity generated by Kefauver's campaign and the widespread belief that a criminal network had extended its power throughout the nation, the federal government took little action against organized crime. The FBI did not officially recognize the existence of a national crime syndicate. Director J. EDGAR HOOVER shunned Mafia cases. They were difficult to prosecute and did not result in a high rate of conviction.

In May 1956, ROBERT KENNEDY, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, questioned Anastasia about racketeer domination of companies producing military uniforms under government contract. No action was taken on the matter. Kennedy later outlined another instance of Anastasia's penetration of labor. In 1955 private garbage collectors in New York formed an employer's association. According to Kennedy, Anastasia took control of this through Teamster Local 813 and maneuvered to monopolize the garbage industry through the employers' "adviser," Jimmy Squillante.

In the mid-1950s, Anastasia engaged in a struggle for power with VITO GENOVESE, who managed to secure the allegiance of Joseph Profaci, the boss of another family, and Carlo Gambino, Anastasia's underboss. The rivalry played out when Anastasia was shot to death in the barbershop of New York's Park Sheraton Hotel on October 25, 1957.

The following month, 58 known hoodlums were arrested in Appalachin, N.Y., at the largest Mafia conference ever held. Of these, 22 said their businesses dealt with labor-management relations. All were released for lack of evidence. It was later learned that Vito Genovese had called the conclave to ratify his control of America's largest Mafia "family" following the death of Anastasia and the retirement of Frank Costello.

Appalachin marked the beginning of an effort by the federal government against organized crime. Eisenhower's attorney general, WILLIAM T. ROGERS, established a special group within the Justice Department to investigate organized crime without asking Hoover. The section lasted only two years but provided a focus for anticrime activity. In the 1960s, Attorney General Robert Kennedy pressed for new wiretap legislation and encouraged a new policy of prosecuting mobsters under any and all available laws.

Anderson, Clinton P(resba)

(1895–1975) U.S. senator; chairman, Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy

A native of Centerville, S.Dak., Anderson was born on October 23, 1895. He studied at Dakota Wesleyan University from 1913 to 1915. After completing a year of pre-law studies at the University of Michigan, he attempted to enter military service but was rejected because of a tubercular condition. He then moved to New Mexico, where the climate helped him improve his health. From 1918 to 1922, he worked for the Albuquerque Journal, where he helped uncover evidence relating to the Teapot Dome scandal. He began a career in insurance in 1922 and eventually became president of his own firm. Anderson was appointed treasurer of New Mexico in 1933, and throughout the 1930s he helped administer various New Deal relief programs in the state.

In 1940, Anderson won election to the U.S. House as a representative at large. He led a congressional probe of national food shortages and black-marketing in the meat industry. President HARRY S. TRUMAN was so impressed by Anderson's investigations that he appointed the congressman secretary of agriculture in 1945. In 1948 Anderson won election to the Senate.

From the beginning of his Senate tenure, Anderson consistently voted with the Democratic liberals. An advocate of federal control of natural resources, he fought Eisenhower's concept of federal-state "partnership." In early 1953, the administration overturned Truman's designation of offshore oil lands as a navy reserve, thereby giving control of these fields back to the states. Anderson and other liberals staged an unsuccessful filibuster to protest the move and press for federal control. Administration backers succeeded in passing a bill supporting state ownership, but the Supreme Court eventually ruled in favor of limited control by those states whose colonial charters stipulated it.

Best known as an effective defender of New Mexico's interests, Anderson sponsored legislation that brought his state large sums of federal money for defense installations, land reclamation, and water resources. As chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, he was particularly influential in bringing the nuclear power industry to New Mexico. He consistently supported programs for nuclear power projects and later contended that the government had not adequately funded them. In 1956, Anderson served as floor manager of the Upper Colorado River Storage Project, a plan to divert Colorado River water to New Mexico, particularly to Indian lands. Because of his efforts, the Senate raised the administration's suggested initial appropriation from $8 million to $13 million.

In 1959, Anderson led the fight against confirmation of LEWIS STRAUSS as secretary of commerce. An advocate of public power development, the senator opposed Strauss because he had backed the 1954 Dixon-Yates contract giving a private combine, rather than the Tennessee Valley Authority, the right to supply power to Atomic Energy Commission installations in the Tennessee Valley area. Anderson also objected to Strauss's refusal to support J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER during the latter's security hearings in 1954. Partly as a result of Anderson's opposition, Strauss became the first cabinet appointee to be rejected by the Senate since 1925.

Anderson played a prominent role in the 1960s in both atomic affairs and the U.S. space program. In his final term in the Senate, he won the Goddard Memorial Trophy for "outstanding contributions to space flight programs that promoted American leadership in astronautics." He retired from the Senate in 1973 and died in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on November 11, 1975.

Anderson, Robert B(ernard)

(1910–1989) secretary of the navy, deputy secretary of defense, secretary of the treasury

Born in Burseson, Tex., on June 4, 1910, and raised on a farm in the cotton and cattle region of Texas, Anderson graduated from Weatherford College in 1927. To finance his law studies he taught Spanish, history, and mathematics in 1929 at a local high school. He won election to the state legislature the same day he graduated from the University of Texas Law School in 1932. Named state tax commissioner in 1934, Anderson successfully introduced a bill to organize the first social security agency in Texas. Three years later, he became general attorney for the vast W. I. Waggoner ranch, at that time the second richest in the nation. Appointed general manager four years later, he increased its holdings and introduced modern ranching methods.

During World War II, Anderson served as a civilian aide to the secretary of the army. In the 1940s, he was associated with several large business organizations, among them the American Petroleum Institute. Anderson was one of the oil industry's most effective witnesses before Congress. In 1949 he became chairman of the Texas State Board of Education.

Robert B. Anderson, secretary of the navy
(Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

President-elect Eisenhower designated Anderson secretary of the navy in December 1952. Early in the new administration, Eisenhower ordered an end to segregation on military bases and in schools in military bases. In June 1953, Rep. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.) charged that several figures in the administration had ignored or obstructed the president's order. Powell singled out shipyards in Charleston, S.C., and Norfolk, Va. Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, found Powell's charges to be essentially accurate and assigned MAXWELL RABB to handle the problem. Rabb met with Anderson, who ordered an end to segregation on 43 naval stations in the South. Over a weekend, the "white" and "colored" signs were removed from drinking fountains and lavatories. Mess halls were desegregated more gradually but expeditiously. The process went forward without a major incident. Anderson's handling of the situation greatly impressed Eisenhower. In November 1953 Eisenhower announced that the policy had been "completely effective."

Anderson was appointed deputy secretary of defense in March 1954. During his tenure, he helped Eisenhower formulate the Open Skies proposal delivered at the 1955 Geneva summit conference. The plan was designed to give the administration the psychological offensive following the Soviet Union's disarmament overture of May. It suggested that the United States and USSR exchange military blueprints and allow mutual air reconnaissance over their military installations. The Kremlin eventually rejected the proposal.

Anderson left his post in August 1955 to return to business, but Eisenhower called him into government service again in 1956 as his personal emissary to the Middle East. The former secretary attempted to initiate direct discussions between Israeli Prime Minister David Ben Gurion and Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser in an effort to resolve outstanding differences. However, his efforts failed, and in October Israel, France, and Great Britain attacked Egypt.

Eisenhower had great political plans for Anderson. The president found the deeply religious, conservative, mild-mannered Anderson the ideal man to implement his own ideas for America and urged him to be his running mate in the 1956 campaign. Eisenhower also thought that Anderson, a Southerner and a Democrat, would improve Republican chances in the South. However, Anderson refused, pleading inexperience in partisan politics. Eisenhower confided to EMMET J. HUGHES before the 1960 election that he considered Anderson his number-one choice for the presidency.

Anderson replaced GEORGE HUMPHREY as secretary of the treasury in July 1957. In fiscal and monetary policy he was as conservative as his predecessor. He stood firmly behind the administration's desire to reduce the size of government and balance the budget in order to cut inflation and invigorate private enterprise. Anderson differed with Humphrey, however, in his more relaxed attitude toward increased defense spending and his more liberal approach to foreign economic policy.

Anderson's concern with preventing inflation was reflected in his response to the recession of 1957-58. Convinced that the recession would be short-lived, he opposed tax cuts to stimulate the economy because he believed they would be inflationary. His popularity with Democratic congressional leaders Rep. SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) helped him maintain this policy. In March 1958, he made a "gentleman's agreement" with Rayburn, pledging that each would consult the other before moving to reduce taxes.

The budget for fiscal 1959 reflected Anderson's continued fear of inflation. In the wake of the Soviet launch of Sputnik in October 1957, demands grew for increased military spending. Anderson supported the increase but insisted that the budget be tightened elsewhere. As a result, the 1959 budget put a ban on flood control and reclamation projects, reduced agricultural subsidies, and implemented a cutback on federal grants for urban renewal and welfare programs. However, increases in military spending, together with a small decline in revenue caused by the recession, produced a deficit of $12.5 billion, the largest during Eisenhower's presidency.

Conflict between the secretary of the treasury and the Democratic Congress over economic policy came to a head in August 1959. The House Ways and Means Committee shelved the president's request to raise interest rates on government bonds. Anderson argued that the only alternative to the repeal of interest rate ceilings was to force more of the national debt into inflationary short-term securities, to which the ceilings did not apply. Intent on exploiting the issue, the Democrats in the Senate lashed out against the move, stating that it would raise interest rates for all borrowers. Anderson refused to yield to the criticism. Congress refused to raise the rate on long-term obligations.

With the retirement and death of Secretary of State JOHN F. DULLES, Anderson became increasingly influential in the cabinet. He used his position to fight for a balanced budget and persuaded Eisenhower to oppose Secretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER's attempts to arrange long-term financing of the Development Loan Fund. Anderson also convinced the president to insist that recipients of development loans spend their dollars in the United States. To reduce the balance of payment deficit, he insisted that the Allies remove their quotas against the importation of American goods and take on a greater share of the cost of defending their territories.

During the Kennedy administration, Anderson was a partner in the investment house of Loeb, Rhodes & Co. and a member of the presidential panel formed to study the U.S. foreign aid program. Anderson served as an informal consultant to President Johnson and advised him to pursue a conservative fiscal policy. Toward the end of his life, Anderson engaged in controversial activities, some of which led to legal difficulties. In 1987, he was disbarred and sentenced to jail after pleading guilty to charges of tax evasion related to an unregistered offshore bank he operated and allegations of money laundering. He also was reported to have been a lobbyist for Rev. Sun Myung Moon and his Church of Unification. Anderson died in New York on August 14, 1989.

Arends was born on September 27, 1895, in Melvin, Ill. After studying at Oberlin College for two years, he entered the army during World War I and received his discharge in 1919. Following in his father's footsteps, Arends became a farmer and banker in 1920. Seeking public office for the first time in 1934, he won election as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives from a prosperous agricultural region south of Chicago. Arends was a critic of what he believed was the dangerous centralization of power under the New Deal. He became Republican minority whip in 1943 and served as majority whip for two years after the Republican electoral victory of 1946.

Arends again became majority whip after the election in 1952. After the Republican defeat in the election of 1954, he again became minority whip.

Arends defended the administration's program to eliminate security risks from the government. In January 1954, Eisenhower maintained that under his program more than 2,200 communists had left the federal payroll. Congressional critics charged that Eisenhower was attempting to mislead the public into believing that all of these employees were communists, whereas many were social rather than political deviates. In February 1954, Sen. WAYNE MORSE (I-Oreg.) charged the president with responsibility for a "fascist big lie technique" and asked for a breakdown on how many of the security risks were communists. Two days later, Arends said there was no reason for a classification of the causes of the employees' dismissals and charged that Morse had "impeached the honesty and integrity" of the president.

In 1955, Arends denounced an unsuccessful Democratic effort to introduce a bill ending the administration's program of flexible farm price supports and restoring rigid supports at 90 percent of parity.

A strong supporter of private enterprise, Arends sought to minimize government intervention in the workings of the market economy. In 1955 he defended the sale of government-owned synthetic rubber plants to the highest-bidding private companies against Democratic charges that the sale might promote monopoly. Two years later, he unsuccessfully attempted to delete from a military public works bill a provision giving Congress a veto over the transfer of Defense Department work to private industry.

The second-ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee through 1956 and subsequently the senior Republican on the panel, Arends was a staunch defender of large military appropriations.

Arends generally opposed the domestic programs of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, although he voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He also backed the Johnson administration's Vietnam War policy. Arends announced in 1974 that he would not seek reelection. He retained his post as minority leader until his retirement. Arends died in Naples, Fla., on July 17, 1985.

Arendt, Hannah

(1906–1975) philosopher, political scientist

Born into a German-Jewish family in Hanover on October 14, 1906, Arendt earned a doctorate at the age of 22 from the University of Heidelberg. She studied under philosophers Karl Jaspers and Martin Heidegger. In 1933, she fled Hitler's Germany and went to Paris, where she worked for Youth Aliyah, a Zionist group that facilitated the rescue of Jewish children. After a brief detention in a French internment camp, she migrated to New York in 1941, accompanied by her mother and her husband. She found work as the research director for the Conference on Jewish Relations. In 1946 she became chief editor of Schocken Books, while also writing articles on diverse topics. From 1949 to 1952, she served as executive secretary of Jewish Cultural Reconstruction, Inc. She professed no personal religious affiliation, but always participated in Jewish cultural activities.

Arendt published The Origins of Totalitarianism, her first book in English, in 1951. Remarkable for its sweep and erudition, the book attempted to explain the rise of totalitarian governments, which she considered to be “the central event of our world.” She regarded the totalitarian state as essentially different “from other forms of political oppression . . . such as despotism, tyranny, and dictatorship.” It created “entirely new political institutions and destroyed all social, legal, and political traditions of the country.” She traced the roots of totalitarianism to imperialism and anti-Semitism. The book established her reputation and won her several university teaching positions. In 1953, she delivered the Christian Gauss lectures at Princeton University, and in 1959 she became the first woman to be appointed a full professor at Princeton. She also held positions at Columbia University, the University of Chicago, and for a number of years before her death, at the New School for Social Research.

In articles written in the 1950s and published primarily in Partisan Review, Arendt struggled with the broad concepts of history and freedom, tradition and authority. Her work culminated in a lecture series given at the University of Chicago in 1956 and published in 1958 as The Human Condition. In it, Arendt made a distinction between labor, the products of which are consumed and forgotten, and work, the products of which are used and admired. The book noted with dismay the forces present in modern life that diminished workmanship into labor. For Arendt, however, neither labor nor work rose to the level of public activity. Neither the jobholder nor the businessman engaged in the political realm. Indeed, economic self-absorption led to the ruin of the political realm.

Reviews of her work were mixed. Many acknowledged its importance as a philosophical structure for understanding the contemporary political situation but complained of its obscurity. Arendt made her position much clearer in the epilogue to the 1958 edition of the The Origins of Totalitarianism, which she wrote in response to the Hungarian revolt in 1956. She hailed the revolt as “the first and yet unique instance of a people’s uprising against total domination.” It was important as a display of man’s insuppressible freedom and his ability to act in the public realm, even under the most intolerable circumstances. However, she did not see the revolt as a portent of future uprisings. She attributed it to the temporary thawing of Soviet oppression, indicating that where oppression was total, rebellion might be impossible. The thaw left no room for optimism, since, according to Arendt, the period of de-Stalinization represented only a tactical maneuver on the part of the Soviet hierarchy and would be followed by a renewal of totalitarian policies. As evidence she cited the heavy-handed reaction to the Hungarian uprising and Khrushchev’s declarations that the Soviet Union had no need to fear the consequences of nuclear warfare.

In 1963, Arendt went to Jerusalem to report on the trial of Adolf Eichmann for the New Yorker. Her reports on the trial and a book published later that year, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, became the focal point of intense controversy. Arendt began her analysis of the roots of Eichmann’s banality with his use of language; he “was generally incapable of uttering a single sentence that was not a cliché. The longer one listened to him, the more obvious it became that his inability to speak was closely connected to an inability to think. . . .” This and his inability to see the Final Solution in terms beyond his own advancement within the SS, argued Arendt, made it difficult to regard Eichmann as an example of pure evil; indeed, it was difficult to take him seriously. “Everybody,” including the prosecutors, “could see that this man was not a ‘monster,’ but it was difficult indeed not to suspect that he was a clown.” In the end, the “unspeakable horror” of Eichmann’s deeds dwarfed the comic aspect. For Arendt, however, the real horror was the ease with which the modern bureaucratic state subverted an individual conscience. Eichmann was a “terrifyingly normal” example of modern man and the power of the totalitarian state. Some critics misread the work as an attempt to cast Eichmann in a more favorable light. Others misinterpreted the book as an indictment of Jews for going like sheep to the slaughter. Arendt developed this appraisal of bureaucracy into a deeply pessimistic evaluation of the modern world. America’s involvement in Vietnam and the circumstances surrounding the Watergate affair only served to make her evaluation more severe. She died in New York City on December 4, 1975.

Armour, Norman

(1887–1982) ambassador to Guatemala

Born on October 14, 1887, in Brighton, England, to American parents, Armour received his B.A. from Princeton in 1909 and graduated from Harvard Law School in 1913. He returned to Princeton for an M.A. in 1915 and entered the Foreign Service that same year. Assigned to Russia both prior to and during the Russian Revolution, he arranged for the escape of a princess whom he later married. Assigned as minister to Haiti in 1932, Armour oversaw the withdrawal of U.S. Marines and the return of the government to Haitians. Armour was appointed ambassador to Chile in 1938 and served as ambassador to Argentina and Spain during World War II. His experience in revolutionary Russia, fascist Spain, and post-revolutionary Chile instilled in him a loathing for rebellion and upheaval. He retired in 1945 only to be recalled by President HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1948 to become ambassador to Venezuela, where the U.S. was carrying on delicate oil negotiations. He retired again in 1951.

During the opening days of the Eisenhower administration, Armour joined other Foreign Service officers in protesting Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY’s (R-Wis.) attacks on the State Department. In March 1953, when Senate conservatives challenged CHARLES BOHLEN’s nomination as ambassador to the USSR because of his ties to Truman’s foreign policy, Armour and other career Foreign Service officers sent a letter to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in support of Bohlen. In January 1954, Armour joined four other career diplomats in publicly deploring the “sinister” effects of McCarthy’s “flimsy” attacks on the Foreign Service. The diplomats further complained that the administration’s loyalty-security and personnel policies might produce “a Foreign Service competent to serve a totalitarian government.”

Armour was once again called out of retirement in 1954 to become ambassador to Guatemala. He arrived in that country just after the Central Intelligence Agency had helped overthrow the leftist regime of Jacobo Arbenz. Armour’s task was to aid the rightist government in restoring the Guatemalan economy and to oversee the vast amounts of American economic aid given that country. Approaching 70 at the time of his recall to duty, Armour again retired in early May 1955, declaring that the post-revolutionary economic recovery of Guatemala was well under way.

In October 1956, Sen. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.), chairman of a special Senate subcommittee investigating foreign aid, appointed Armour to a panel making on-the-spot studies of the program. Assigned to observe activities in Greece, Turkey, and Iran, Armour reported back to the committee in March 1957 that new foreign aid efforts were needed. Estimates by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of Turkey’s military capabilities were probably “overly optimistic,” he said, while U.S. security interests in Greece were jeopardized because of unsettled relations between Greece and Cyprus. The United States, he warned, needed to provide “substantial assistance” for Iran to resist any Soviet aggression in the years ahead.

Armour retired from public life after his Mediterranean fact-finding mission, although he continued to advise the State Department and give lectures at Princeton and elsewhere. When he died in New York City on September 27, 1982, Armour was widely praised as a highly professional and polished diplomat.

Ashmore, Harry S(cott)

(1916–1998) journalist

Born in Greenville, S.C., on July 27, 1917, Harry Ashmore was the son of a merchant whose ancestors served in the Confederate army. He became acquainted with the plight of southern blacks when, as a teenager, he worked on a cotton farm during the summer. In 1937, he graduated from Clemson Agricultural College and began a career in journalism, covering the local courthouse for the Greenville Piedmont. Following service in the army during World War II, Ashmore was named associate editor of the Charlotte, N.C., News. He wrote editorials advocating two-party politics in the South, racial and religious tolerance, and the enfranchisement of African Americans. The Arkansas Gazette hired Ashmore as editor in 1947. He became executive editor the following year.

In 1953, the Ford Foundation commissioned Ashmore to head a team of scholars studying biracial education in the United States. The report, entitled The Negro and the Schools (1954), was published the day before the Supreme Court handed down its decision in Brown v. Board of Education, which struck down segregation in public schools. The study revealed that African Americans in segregated schools received an inferior education; it noted that a gap also existed in the North between the quality of education blacks were getting compared to whites. The report cautioned that desegregation was an explosive issue because of Americans' intense interest in education. It pointed to community attitudes as the most important factor in integration but noted that gradual desegregation had often proved more volatile than immediate integration. Both integrationists and segregationists used the study to support their positions.

In September 1957, when the Democratic governor of Arkansas, ORVAL FAUBUS, ordered national guardsmen to Little Rock to prevent the integration of Central High School, Ashmore endorsed President Eisenhower's use of federal troops to ensure desegregation. In an editorial, he wrote, "We are going to have to decide what kind of people we are—whether we obey the law only when we approve of it, or whether we obey it no matter how distasteful we find it." By mid-October, Ashmore had written more than 40 editorials and appeared on television and radio pleading for compliance. Faubus denounced him as an "ardent integrationist;" the White Citizens' Councils branded him "Public Enemy No. 1." In December 1957, segregationists attempted a boycott of Gazette advertisers to induce a change in the paper's editorial policies. Its circulation did drop for a short time, but throughout the incident, Hugh B. Patterson, Jr., the paper's publisher, backed Ashmore. In May 1958, Ashmore received the Pulitzer Prize for editorial writing. The Gazette also received a Pulitzer Prize for carrying his work.

Ashmore's book, An Epitaph for Dixie (1958), appeared following the Little Rock crisis. As the title indicated, he argued that the Old South was dying. He predicted that its reliance on agriculture, its one-party political system, and its racial policies would crumble in the face of the demands of a growing, northern-oriented, industrialized society. Ashmore observed that a developing industrial elite would replace the old agrarian-based southern high society. These new leaders, anxious for immediate economic growth, would realize that a prosperous black citizenry was essential for southern prosperity and therefore would accept integration. Segregation, with all its political, social, and economic consequences, had to end so that African Americans could be integrated into the new system. Ashmore also predicted that, in the future, blacks would be more aggressive in demanding their rights.

From 1955 to 1956, Ashmore took a leave of absence to work in ADLAI STEVENSON's presidential campaign. In September 1959, he left the Gazette to become a director of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. At the center, he concentrated his attention on race relations and the press, defending the growing militancy of the Civil Rights movement in the mid-1960s. He was also a prominent critic of the Johnson administration's policy in Vietnam. Ashmore left the center in 1974 amidst a financial crisis, which curbed its activities.

Ashmore served as editor in chief of the Encyclopædia Britannica and wrote a number of books, most of which dealt with race relations. He published Hearts and Minds: The Anatomy of Racism from Roosevelt to Reagan in 1982 and a memoir, Civil Rights and Wrongs, in 1994. He died in Santa Barbara, Calif., on January 20, 1998.

Avery, Sewell (Lee)

(1874–1960) chairman of Montgomery Ward & Company

The son of a wealthy lumberman, Avery was born on November 4, 1874, in Saginaw, Mich. Following his graduation from the University of Michigan in 1894, he managed one of his father's businesses, a plaster works, which was soon combined with other companies to form U.S. Gypsum Co. The enterprising Avery became its president at the age of 30. Twenty-eight years later, at the initiative of J. P. Morgan & Co., Avery assumed the board chairmanship of Montgomery Ward & Co. Avery turned the debt-ridden mail and retail department store chain into a once-again viable competitor. Operating in a highly autocratic fashion, he recruited the best marketers and upgraded Ward's merchandise line. By 1939 Ward's sales approached 75 percent of those of Sears Roebuck & Co., the leader in the field and the only department store chain surpassing Ward's in annual sales.

Politically, Avery was an extreme conservative. A frequent critic of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal, he engaged in a long struggle during World War II over the recognition of a retail employee's union. In a dramatic climax, President Roosevelt utilized special war powers in December 1943 and ordered the army to seize Ward's Chicago building. Army police bodily removed the intransigent Avery from his offices.

Following the war, Avery dictated company policy in anticipation of another Great Depression. This fear led him to suspend all expansion; between 1941 and 1957, Ward opened no new stores. He even kept the modernization of stores to a minimum in the interest of maintaining high liquidity.

Ward's earnings per share plummeted from $5.59 in 1950 to $2.62 in 1955. Its optimistic rival, Sears, expanded and increased its market share.

Ward suffered in other ways as a result of Avery's continued one-man rule. While Sears decentralized, Ward consolidated its management structure. Avery dominated its management past his 80th birthday. Subordinates quit or were fired at an unusually rapid rate; in August 1953, Avery caused the resignation of his 32nd vice president.

Avery's domination began to end in mid-1954. Between then and Ward's annual shareholders' meeting in May 1955, an investor from Florida, LOUIS E. WOLFSON, tried to buy controlling interest in Ward to exercise effective management. Wolfson planned to replace Avery. The battle ended with Wolfson's failure to secure more than 1 percent of Ward stock. Yet Wolfson's campaign itself placed enormous pressures on Avery, who at one point asked JAMES HOFFA, president of the Teamsters Union, to purchase shares on his behalf. Shareholders forced Avery's resignation at the annual meeting in 1955. His successor, John A. Barr, soon inaugurated an ambitious capital expansion program and decentralized operations on the Sears model. Despite Barr's initiatives, however, Ward's sales and earnings lagged through the decade.

Avery died in Chicago, Ill., on October 31, 1960.

Barden, Graham A(rthur)

(1896–1967) chairman, Education and Labor Committee

Born on September 26, 1896, in Sampson Co., N.C., Barden served in the navy during World War I and then studied at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he received an LL.B. in 1920. He practiced law in New Bern, N.C., while serving as judge of the Craven Co. Court from 1920 to 1924. Barden represented the county in the North Carolina General Assembly in 1933.

The following year, Barden won election as a Democrat to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he became known as a conservative and an opponent of organized labor. However, he did sponsor vocational rehabilitation and education bills. In 1949, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee, he introduced a school-aid bill that provided no assistance for either parochial schools or schools for racial minorities. Rep. John Lesinski (D-Mich.), chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, charged that the bill “dripped with bigotry and racial prejudice.” In 1950, following Lesinski’s death, Barden became chairman of the Education and Labor Committee.

Barden asserted that he “never knew the Republic to be endangered by a bill that was not passed.” Because of this belief and his desire to control the education and labor panel, he called few meetings of the committee. To further enhance his dominance, he decided personally which subcommittee would receive each bill. By 1955, however, the number of liberals on the panel had increased sufficiently to enable a revolt against the chairman. Barden agreed to establish a regular schedule of committee meetings and to create subcommittees with specified areas of jurisdiction. He rejected the liberals’ request that subcommittee chairmen be appointed on the basis of seniority. In practice, however, Barden did appoint chairmen on that basis—with the exception of Rep. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., (D-N.Y.), an African American whom he refused to appoint. Barden contended that his objections to Powell were of a personal rather than a racial nature.

In 1955, Barden backed a bill sponsored by the administration to raise the minimum wage from 75 to 90 cents an hour. During committee hearings, he opposed a greater increase, asserting that with a $1 minimum rate many firms might have to fire employees. However, the committee passed a $1 minimum wage bill, which became law in August. In 1960 another minimum wage bill failed to pass in part because Barden, the chairman of the House delegation in a Senate-House conference, insisted upon the $1.15 minimum voted by the House instead of the $1.25 minimum in the Senate version.

In 1960, the Education and Labor Committee considered a bill to legalize common-site picketing, which would have permitted unions to picket a firm at a construction site even if the effect was to stop the work of other firms at the same location. Barden opposed the measure, stating that employers on a construction site generally did not act as partners. He also said that it would have a “devastating effect . . . on the health and welfare of a community, or upon our national defense effort.” The bill passed the Education and Labor Committee but was blocked by the Rules Committee.

In 1955, the Education and Labor Committee passed a bill sponsored by the Eisenhower administration providing federal aid for school construction. Barden backed the measure and sponsored it on the House floor the following year. However, he withdrew his sponsorship after the chamber adopted an amendment, offered by Rep. Powell, barring federal funds for segregated schools. The bill failed to pass Congress. Two years later Barden opposed a scholarship provision, designed to meet the Soviet technological threat, in a school-aid bill. The scholarship plan cleared the committee but was stricken on the House floor. The following year, Barden opposed a bill providing aid for school construction, which was passed by the Education and Labor Committee but blocked by the Rules Committee. In 1960, he attacked a Senate-passed measure eliminating the noncommunist affidavit requirement from the National Defense Education Act of 1958. The bill was pigeonholed in the Education and Labor Committee.

In January 1960, Barden announced that he would not seek reelection. He died of cancer in New Bern, N.C., on January 20, 1967.

Bates, Daisy (Gatson)

(1922–1999) president, Arkansas NAACP

Daisy Gatson was born in 1922 and grew up on farms in eastern Arkansas. She attended Philander Smith College and Shorter College in Little Rock, Ark., and in 1941 founded the Arkansas State Press with her husband, L. C. Bates, to advance the cause of black rights. Daisy Bates first became known in the Civil Rights movement in 1946, when she was found guilty on contempt charges in circuit court for criticizing the trial of a black defendant. This conviction was overturned by the Arkansas Supreme Court.

When the U.S. Supreme Court ruled public school segregation to be unconstitutional in May 1954, a number of Arkansas school districts desegregated voluntarily. This process was supported by

Gov. FRANCIS A. CHERRY, who promised compliance with the law. In November 1954, ORVAL FAUBUS was elected governor, pledging not to “force” integration on those communities that opposed it. Faubus won reelection two years later, defeating a die-hard segregationist.

In response to the Brown decision, the Little Rock school board proposed a plan to gradually desegregate Little Rock’s schools. After the NAACP unsuccessfully challenged the plan in court, the school board began implementing the plan by desegregating Central High School in September 1957.

Nine black students were selected by the NAACP and coached in Daisy Bates’s home on nonviolent reaction to expected abuse by segregationists. Beginning in August 1957 and for the next two years, Daisy Bates served as the driving force behind Little Rock’s integration effort. Her life was repeatedly threatened. In September, Gov. Faubus uttered his famous warning that “blood will run in the streets” if integration were attempted, and he called out the National Guard to keep black students from entering Central. Later in the month, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER federalized the Arkansas Guard and dispatched federal troops to maintain order and escort the African-American students through hostile mobs to Central High. Central was forcibly integrated, but in October Little Rock’s City Council ordered the arrest of Daisy Bates and other civil rights activists on charges of failing to register as NAACP members under a new law. The defendants were convicted and fined in municipal court in December 1957. The Supreme Court overturned the conviction in 1960.

Little Rock remained under court order to desegregate all of its schools. Faubus closed all the city’s high schools in September 1958. As they prepared to reopen on an integrated basis, Daisy Bates’s home was bombed in July 1959. She escaped injury and wired Attorney General WILLIAM P. ROGERS, requesting federal protection. When this was denied, she telegraphed President Eisenhower, who referred her back to the Justice Department. All of Little Rock’s high schools reopened on an integrated basis in September 1959, and the tide of violence began to ebb.

Daisy Bates told her story in a book, The Long Shadow of Little Rock (1962). She continued to be an activist and 10 years later denounced President RICHARD NIXON's cutoff of Office of Economic Opportunity funds for an Arkansas community as "economic genocide." In 1974 Bates was honored for her role in Little Rock by the National Black Political Convention. She died in Little Rock on November 4, 1999.

Battle, John S(tewart)

(1890–1972) member, U.S. Civil Rights Commission

John S. Battle, the son of a Baptist minister, was born on July 11, 1890, in New Bern, N.C. He received his LL.B. at the University of Virginia in 1913. A member of the conservative Democratic Byrd machine in Virginia politics, he served for 19 years in the House of Delegates and state Senate, where he became chairman of the Finance Committee. In 1949, Sen. HARRY BYRD (D-Va.) picked the state senator as the organization's candidate for governor. Battle won the primary in August 1950 against the strongest liberal Democratic challenge to Byrd's dominance in decades and went on to win the general election in November. Fiscally liberal by the standards of the Byrd machine, Battle pioneered a $75 million public school building program.

Battle gained prominence at the Democratic National Convention in 1952, when he led rebellious southern delegations from Virginia, Louisiana, and South Carolina in refusing to sign a loyalty oath that required delegates to support the convention's presidential ticket, a pledge politically anathema in some southern states because of the fear that the convention would choose a supporter of civil rights. Battle insisted that the defiant delegates be seated. They were, and he went home a hero. He supported the nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, while Virginia's Democratic Party remained neutral.

Although a firm segregationist, Battle refused Sen. Byrd's call for "massive resistance" to school desegregation. Fully formulated by 1957, Byrd's resistance program called for states to block federal integration orders they deemed illegal. Some states declared the Supreme Court's desegregation decision itself null and void. President Eisenhower apparently noticed Battle's position. In August 1957, Congress created a six-member Civil Rights Commission to investigate voting rights violations as part of that year's Civil Rights Act. Trying to include a broad range of opinion, Eisenhower appointed Battle to the commission in November. During Senate confirmation hearings in February 1958, the former North Carolina governor described his job as exclusively fact-finding. The committee approved his appointment to the post at the beginning of March.

During the commission's first public hearings, Battle clashed with officials from Alabama attempting to obstruct its work. Six registrars from Montgomery refused to produce subpoenaed voting records, and Judge George Wallace threatened to jail registrars who complied. Battle assailed the officials, warning of new federal rights legislation if the defiance continued. He then joined the commission in asking Attorney General WILLIAM P. ROGERS to take appropriate legal action.

Battle dissented from the Civil Rights Commission's first report to Congress, presented in the summer of 1959. It recommended specific legislation to assure equal voting, educational, and housing rights. Battle thought this exceeded the commission's mandate. Insisting that existing civil rights guarantees were sufficient and should be enforced, Battle urged only the investigation of voting rights and did not favor sending federal registrars into the South. Battle contended that the commission's report was not factual and impartial as Congress had intended. The former North Carolina governor maintained that the document was only "an argument in advocacy of preconceived ideas in race relations."

Noting that the commission had completed its two-year term, Battle resisted Eisenhower's plea to stay on and resigned his position in October 1959. He returned to his law practice in Charlottesville, Va. Battle died there on April 9, 1972.

Bazon, David L(ionel)

(1909–1993) federal appellate judge

David L. Bazon was born on September 3, 1909, in Superior, Wis. His father, the proprietor of the local general store, died two years later, leaving the family virtually destitute. The family moved to Chicago, where Bazelon attended public schools, after which he spent a year at the University of Illinois. Bazelon received his B.S.L. from Northwestern University in 1931. He read law the following year and engaged in the private practice of law from 1932 to 1935, during which time he was also active in Democratic Party politics. In 1935 he became assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, a position he held until 1940, when he returned to private practice as the senior member of the firm of Gottlieb and Schwartz. In 1946, he was appointed assistant U.S. attorney general in the U.S. Lands Division. He remained in the Justice Department for three years, during which time he also headed the Office of Alien Property (1947–49). President HARRY S. TRUMAN named him to a recess appointment on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in 1949, making Bazelon the youngest person ever appointed to a federal judgeship. The Senate confirmed the nomination in 1950.

Over the years, Bazelon established a reputation as one of the most liberal federal judges in the nation. A judicial activist, he consistently advocated the protection of the rights of those accused of crimes and opening the judicial system to the findings of other disciplines, most notably psychology. His best known opinion, Durham v. U.S., came in 1954 and involved the case of a mentally disturbed man convicted of burglary. In his written opinion, Bazelon attempted to revise the prevailing legal test for insanity. Under the existing rule, a criminal could claim insanity as a defense only if it could be proved that the defendant was unable to distinguish between right and wrong or if the criminal act was the product of an “irresistible impulse.” The so-called “Durham rule” held that “an accused is not criminally responsible if his unlawful act was the product of a mental disease or defect.” Bazelon always maintained that he did not create a new formula; rather, he attempted to “open the door to information.” He hoped that his ruling would enable psychiatrists to present to juries insight into what motivated a criminal. In fact, the Durham rule proved unworkable, and even Bazelon became thoroughly disenchanted with the results of his own decision. The Court of Appeals abandoned the rule in 1972, with Bazelon writing a separate concurring opinion. Based on the experience of almost two decades, the court, and Bazelon too, concluded that the Durham rule had given psychiatrists too great a role and too much leeway.

During the 1960s, Bazelon and future chief justice, WARREN E. BURGER, who was then a judge on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, carried on a bitter and public debate over the rights of defendants in criminal cases. The elevation of Burger to the Supreme Court coincided with a waning of Bazelon’s influence.

Bazelon stepped down as chief judge in 1978, several months before the law required him to retire, so that his friend and colleague, J. SKELLY WRIGHT, would have a longer tenure as chief judge. Bazelon took senior judge status in 1979 and remained on the court until his death in Washington, D.C., on February 19, 1993. He published Questioning Authority: Justice and Criminal Law in 1988.

Beam, Jacob D(yneley)

(1908–1993) deputy director, State Department Policy Planning Staff; ambassador to Poland

Born in Princeton, N.J., on March 24, 1908, Beam, the son of a university professor, attended the Kent School in Connecticut and Princeton University, from which he graduated in 1929. Following a year of graduate study at Cambridge University, he joined the U.S. Foreign Service in 1931 as a clerk at the U.S. consulate in Geneva. From 1934 to 1940, he was assigned to the American embassy in Berlin. Beam served as secretary to the ambassador to Great Britain, John J. Winant, during World War II. From 1945 to 1947, he worked on the staff of the U.S. political adviser in Germany. Beam became consul general in Java in 1949, and during the early 1950s he was a U.S. Information Service officer in Belgrade. Beam temporarily headed the embassy in Moscow after Ambassador GEORGE F. KENNAN had been declared persona non grata in October 1952. He remained there through the tense period of Stalin’s death, leaving in April 1953, when CHARLES BOHLEN became ambassador. Beam became deputy director of the State Department’s policy planning staff that June.

President Eisenhower appointed Beam ambassador to Poland in June 1957. Along with his embassy responsibilities, the new American ambassador was given the task of negotiating with Communist China in the only official contact the United States had then had with that country. The primary issue under discussion was the shelling by the mainland Chinese of the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu, held by Nationalist China.

At talks held during the fall of 1958, Beam and his Chinese counterpart, Wang Ping-nan, found themselves deadlocked. Beam demanded an immediate cease-fire, after which the United States would negotiate to have the islands neutralized through a gradual Nationalist withdrawal. Wang, on the other hand, maintained that the cease-fire did not concern the United States because its troops were not under attack. He demanded that the Nationalists withdraw from the islands and that the U.S. remove its troops from Taiwan. Although the Communists did gradually stop the shelling, Beam and Wang failed to come to an agreement on the subject. Beam continued his contacts with the Chinese until he left his post in December 1961, when he was appointed deputy director of the U.S. Disarmament Agency.

President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Beam ambassador to Czechoslovakia in 1968. The following year, President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him ambassador to the Soviet Union. Beam held this post until his retirement in 1973. His service over five decades won him a reputation as a cool, professional diplomat with a keen sense of irony. After his retirement, Beam gave talks and wrote articles about the Soviet Union and arms control. He served as director of Radio Free Europe (1974–77) and published his memoirs, Multiple Exposure, in 1978. Beam died in Rockville, Md., on August 16, 1993.

Beck, Dave

(1894–1993) union leader

The son of a carpet cleaner, Beck was born in Stockton, Calif., on June 16, 1894. Forced to leave high school before graduation because of his family's financial difficulties, he went to work in a laundry and then became a laundry wagon driver. In 1917 he became a charter member of Seattle, Wash., Local 566 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT). During World War I, Beck was a machinist's mate with the Naval Aviation Service. He resumed work as a laundry driver after the War; in 1923 he won election to the executive board of his local and two years later became its secretary-treasurer. Beck was chosen president of the local in 1927.

During the 1930s and 1940s, Beck moved up through the ranks of the IBT to become one of the most powerful Teamster leaders in the nation. Acknowledging his work in organizing the West Coast, the IBT elected him to the newly created position of executive vice president in 1947. When the IBT's president, Dan Tobin, retired in 1952, Beck was elected president. He also sat on the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and became one of its vice presidents in 1953.

Described as a practical man with a "business rather than a social philosophy," Beck began a program to expand and consolidate the Teamsters' power. Under Tobin, the union had been composed of a series of locals with leaders interested only in their own affairs. When Beck took over, he employed the techniques he had used on the West Coast to forge a centralized structure. He formed regional conferences and merged small locals to centralize power. Along with the conferences, Beck established 15 trade divisions that sought contracts on an area-wide basis. Beck promised to double union membership by 1960 and alienated such labor leaders as WALTER REUTHER by his willingness to raid other unions. By 1955 the Teamsters controlled the nation's truck drivers in a tightly centralized organization guided by Beck and his right-hand man, JAMES HOFFA. In addition to trucking, the IBT represented workers in municipal government, canneries, breweries, and the taxi industry. Reflecting the union's national importance, in 1956 Beck moved its headquarters to Washington into a plush $5 million building facing the Capitol.

Beck had grave reservations about the merger of the AFL and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in 1955. Although he headed the largest AFL union, he refused to take part in negotiations on the merger and was away "on Teamster business" when the pact was ratified. In a press conference, Beck maintained that the merger had proceeded too quickly and that many large problems remained. One of the major issues unresolved between Reuther, GEORGE MEANY, and Beck was the Teamster leader's refusal to sign the organization's no-raiding pact. Pushing to increase his membership, Beck hoped to achieve his goal through a series of alliances in a trade-union center apart from the AFL-CIO.

During 1956, Beck became the focus of a congressional investigation of union corruption. ROBERT KENNEDY, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, learned that the union president had used $150,000 from the union treasury to improve his vast estate and had then sold his home to the IBT to repay the loan while arranging to live in it rent-free for the rest of his life. Beck had also used Teamster funds for personal purchases. In January and February 1957, Beck avoided testifying before the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, first claiming to be sick and then leaving the country on winter cruises. On March 26, he finally appeared before the panel, headed by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), to answer the charges. Beck took the Fifth Amendment 65 times. The AFL-CIO expelled Beck from its Executive Council for refusing to answer the committee's questions. As a result of pressure from the IBT, Beck did not seek reelection that year.

Following his retirement, Beck became involved in a series of legal cases dealing with the charges aired before the committee. In 1957, he was convicted of embezzling $1,900 for the sale of a union-owned Cadillac. Two years later, he was indicted on charges of having violated the Taft-Hartley Act by borrowing $200,000 from trucking industry representatives, but he was acquitted in 1962. Between 1962 and 1965, he served a 30-month prison term after being convicted for filing a false federal income tax return. After his release, Beck became a successful real estate promoter in Seattle, where he died on December 26, 1993.

Bell, Daniel

(1919–) sociologist

Born Daniel Bolotsky on May 10, 1919, in New York City, Bell was the son of Polish-Jewish garment workers and grew up on New York's Lower East Side. A precocious student, Bell joined the Young People's Socialist League at the age of 13. Following his graduation from City College in 1938, he edited the Social Democratic New Leader from 1941 to 1945. In 1945, he briefly held the job of managing editor at Common Sense. Bell left journalism in the fall of 1945 to become an instructor in social sciences at the University of Chicago. Three years later, he became labor editor of Fortune. He continued in that post until 1958 while maintaining ties to the academic community as a part-time instructor at Columbia University. He assumed full-time teaching at Columbia in 1959, earned his Ph.D. from Columbia, and rose to the rank of professor by 1962.

During the 1950s, Bell was an articulate spokesman for the growing centrist movement among postwar intellectuals. Along with other pluralist intellectuals, Bell argued that, in America, political parties and voluntary associations jockeyed for power and, in doing so, created a delicate balance. His most influential work of the decade was his introduction to The New American Right (1955), a collection of articles by scholars which publicized the view that McCarthyism was heir to the radical populist and agrarian agitation of an earlier time. Bell thought McCarthyism was a manifestation of the social tensions of the postwar period. Sen. McCarthy's attack on communists afforded an outlet for the "status anxieties" of various social groups. These included: the "new middle class" of German and Irish-Americans, which felt it had to prove its patriotism in light of World War II; the "souring patricians," members of old upper classes who saw their power diminishing; and the "new rich," uneasy with the way they acquired their wealth. Combined with an inbred American populism, "with its insistence on disclosure and leveling," these status anxieties produced support for McCarthy.

Bell argued that McCarthyism was unique in American life because it injected ideology into the mainstream of American politics. Previously, he maintained it had been confined to such tangential issues as Prohibition and Sunday blue laws. Bell feared that "the tendency to convert issues into ideologies, to invest them with moral color and high emotional charge, invites conflicts which can only derange a society.” Bell’s remedy was to return to the pragmatic, issue-oriented politics of the pre-New Deal age and a political system divorced from the intervention of moral issues.

In 1960, Bell published The End of Ideology: On the Exhaustion of Political Ideas in the Fifties. The work was soon acclaimed as a classic. In it, Bell adopted a position he described as “anti-ideological, but not conservative.” For all his protestations, however, Bell’s work reflected his disenchantment with traditional radicalism and radical ideologies. He emphasized the folly and danger of utopian ideologies and expressed his preference for the American party system, with its imperative not to turn “concrete issues” into “ideologically tinged conflicts” that had the potential to create disastrous divisions in the polity. Moreover, he believed that the problems facing modern America resisted ideological formulations; rather, they were more likely to be solved by “pragmatic compromise” and technological solutions.

During the 1960s, Bell continued to stress the effect of status anxiety on the development of American conservatism. He published a revised version of The New American Right, titled The Radical Right, in 1963. Toward the end of the decade, he grew increasingly pessimistic about government’s ability to produce beneficial social change. In 1969, Bell left Columbia’s sociology department for Harvard. He continued to publish prolifically. The Coming of Post-Industrial Society came out in 1973, Social Sciences since the Second World War in 1982, and Communitarianism and Its Critics in 1993.

Bennett, Wallace F(oster)

(1898–1993) U.S. senator

Born into a Mormon family in Salt Lake City on November 13, 1898, Bennett attended a church high school and received a B.A. from the University of Utah in 1919. His college career was interrupted by service as a second lieutenant of infantry during World War I. After graduating, he worked as a high school principal and later entered his father’s paint and glass firm. When his father died in 1938, Bennett became president and general manager of the business. In December 1948, he was elected president of the National Association of Manufacturers. The Mormon emphasis upon hard work and individual responsibility shaped his conservative political views. He opposed extensive social welfare programs and what he regarded as excessive government regulation of the economy. In 1950 he won a U.S. Senate seat by defeating the liberal incumbent, Sen. Elbert Thomas (D-Utah).

Serving on the Banking and Currency and Finance Committees, Bennett became a leading spokesman for the Eisenhower administration on matters of taxation and finance. In 1954 he supported the administration’s tax revision bill that many Democrats criticized for allegedly providing more tax relief to big business than to individual taxpayers. When Democrats unsuccessfully attempted to reduce personal income taxes the following year, Bennett defended the measure passed in 1954 as “carefully balanced to bring some measure of relief to every part of our economy” and denounced the Democratic proposal as “the height of fiscal irresponsibility.”

An opponent of strong federal controls over the economy, Bennett dissented from a majority report of the Banking and Currency Committee in May 1955 that recommended tightening existing regulations of the stock market and investigating the possibility of fraud and manipulation in the sharp rise of stock prices during the preceding 15 months. Bennett, along with Sens. HOMER E. CAPEHART (R-Ind.), JOHN W. BRICKER (R-Ohio), and J. Glenn Beall (R-Md.), denounced the majority for attempting “to disturb the economy” and “to weaken the confidence of the people in the Administration.”

A persistent critic of social welfare programs, Bennett successfully offered in 1957 a floor amendment to a housing bill to retain the federal contribution to slum clearance and urban renewal at two-thirds of the cost rather than raising it to three-quarters, as proposed by the Banking and Currency panel. In both 1958 and 1959, he was among the minority on the Committee that voted against reporting out area redevelopment bills to aid regions suffering from chronic unemployment.

Bennett supported legislation to promote the economic growth of his state. In 1955, he backed a billion-dollar program to construct water storage facilities in the Upper Colorado River Basin, an important project for promoting agriculture and the production of minerals in Utah. The measure became law the following year. In 1956, he contributed an amendment to the Defense Production Act that directed the government to promote the geographical dispersal of defense-related industries. Tax incentives resulting from the amendment played a major role in attracting the missile industry to Utah.

During the early 1960s, Bennett helped defeat a truth-in-lending proposal in the Banking and Currency Committee. He voted against most of the Kennedy administration's social welfare programs, including the aid-to-education bill in 1961, Medicare in 1962, and mass transit aid in 1962 and 1963. During the Johnson presidency, Bennett opposed the bulk of the administration's Great Society programs but supported its civil rights measures. He strongly supported the Vietnam War. In 1974, Bennett announced that he would not seek reelection and resumed his career in business. He lived in Salt Lake City, where he died on December 19, 1993.

Benson, Ezra Taft

(1899–1994) secretary of agriculture

Descended from Mormon pioneers who accompanied Brigham Young on the westward trek in 1847. Benson was born in Whitney, Idaho, on August 4, 1899. He grew up on a farm in Idaho and attended Utah State Agricultural College. He performed the required Mormon missionary service in Europe during 1922–23 and then returned to work on his father's farm while continuing his agricultural studies. He received a B.S. degree in 1926 from Brigham Young University. Benson took an M.S. degree in agricultural economics at Iowa State College the following year. In the early 1930s, he worked as a county agricultural agent for the University of Idaho Extension Service and later helped organize the Idaho Cooperative Council, of which he was secretary from 1933 to 1939. In the latter year, he went to Washington to assume the post of executive secretary of the National Council of Farm Cooperatives. Although Benson served with many government agencies during his tenure in Washington, including the National Farm Credit Committee and the National Agricultural Advisory Commission, he was a sharp critic of President Franklin Roosevelt's farm policies. In 1943, Benson gave up his influential job when he was selected to become the youngest member of the Council of Twelve Apostles, the ruling group of the Mormon Church. Despite his church work, Benson served as director of the Farm Foundation from 1946 to 1950 and remained in the spotlight with zealous attacks on "paternalistic government" and calls to the cooperative movement to propagate the "free enterprise" system.

After DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's victory in November 1952, observers thought that he would name his brother, MILTON S. EISENHOWER, to head the Department of Agriculture (USDA). But Milton was not interested in the job. Many prominent names were discussed until the president-elect settled on Benson, a relatively unknown figure nationally but highly recommended by farm leaders. At the time, the appointment was interpreted as a concession to the conservative wing of the Republican Party led by Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), whom Benson had supported for the Republican nomination. Nonetheless, Eisenhower assured Benson that he was in agreement with the new secretary's plans to decrease government interference in agriculture and to make research, education, and market development the USDA's prime responsibilities.

Farm policy constituted one of the most complex and intractable problems in postwar American politics. Despite a steady decline in farm population, advanced technology concentrated in ever larger farm units produced crops at a rate greater than the rise in demand, resulting in enormous surpluses. Democratic administrations bought and stored the farmers' surplus at a high cost to the taxpayers. In combination with production controls, this policy sought to ensure farmers' incomes at or near parity with the nonfarm population by subsidizing high prices in the market. Because of the relatively high demand created by postwar reconstruction and the Korean war, the surplus problem did not assume extraordinary proportions until the advent of the Eisenhower administration. By 1954, the government had enough cotton, wheat, and other commodities in storage to meet the needs of the market for an entire year. Not only was it expensive to store the crops, but their very presence depressed agricultural prices. At the same time, the price of manufactured goods purchased by farmers rose.

Secretary Benson believed that a return to the free market of supply and demand offered the best solution to the problems of overproduction and declining farm income. He argued that without artificial controls market prices would at first decline, thus encouraging farmers to cut production. According to Benson, government price supports had encouraged overproduction. Without supports, agriculture could be more efficient, and lower prices would stimulate consumption and ensure a higher standard of living for the general population. In addition, he believed that continued dependence on the federal government would prove morally corrupting to the farmer. In response to critics who noted that laissez-faire would drive smaller, less efficient farmers out of business—and thus destroy the cherished family farm ideal—Benson argued that, through education and marketing research, some small farmers could find new markets while others could find nonfarm work in their region. Besides, he pointed out, giant commercial farms, not small family unit, benefited most from existing price support policies.

President Eisenhower asked Benson to move slowly in his goal to reinstate the free market in American agriculture because of the considerable opposition radical changes in USDA policy would evoke in Congress and the farm states. In his election campaign, Eisenhower had been intentionally ambiguous about whether he would continue to support 90 percent of parity price supports after the law establishing that level expired in 1954. In January 1953, Benson aroused the ire of a number of farm-belt Republican senators at his confirmation hearings, when he refused to commit the administration to an extension of 90 percent of parity price supports for the six basic crops (wheat, corn, cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco) for three additional years. Criticism of Benson increased when, in February, at his first public speech as secretary, he told a meeting of cattle raisers concerned about falling beef prices that they should produce for a free market and consider price supports only as “disaster insurance” rather than as an encouragement to “uneconomic production.”

Ezra Taft Benson, secretary of agriculture (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Benson's reorganization of the USDA with the aid of the interim National Agricultural Advisory Commission established by President Eisenhower in July 1953 irritated Republican farm-bloc leaders whom Benson neglected to consult about new appointments. Granted greater powers than his predecessors, Benson angered Democrats in November by abolishing the Production and Marketing Administration (PMA), a New Deal stronghold, and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics (BAE). He also substantially reduced the authority of the Soil Conservation Service. In place of the PMA and the BAE, he set up the Commodity Stabilization Service to handle production control and price support functions and the Agricultural Marketing Service to handle marketing functions. Because of his desire to enlarge agricultural exports, Benson fostered the creation of the Foreign Agricultural Service to develop markets abroad. Finally, the secretary reorganized the USDA into four branches, each headed by an assistant secretary: federal-state relations, marketing and foreign agriculture, agricultural stabilization, and agricultural credit.

Benson's public statements and reorganization program as well as a steady decline in farm prices accelerated by the close of the Korean War elicited widespread calls for his resignation. President Eisenhower publicly declared his confidence in the secretary but privately cautioned Benson to moderate his attacks on high price supports.

In 1954, Benson presented Congress with a new farm package intended for implementation in 1955. He favored a new system of flexible price supports for basic commodities that could be gradually related to supply. As expected, members of the congressional farm bloc assailed Benson's recommendations, but they won the approval of a group of urban liberal Democrats.

In order to ensure the farm bill's passage, President Eisenhower took Benson's plan to the public, pointing out that a change from rigid to flexible price supports would affect less than one-fourth of the income received by farmers. In June 1954, Benson and Vice President RICHARD NIXON appeared on national television to inform the American people that a flexible price support program would merely implement legislation passed in 1949. Benson explained that, after World War II, the nation "stopped all-out production of munitions and ships [but] we didn't put a stop to all-out production of surplus food."

In August the Agricultural Act of 1954 finally passed after prolonged debate. Flexible price supports ranged from 82.5 percent to 90 percent of parity for basic crops—Benson had desired a minimum level of 75 percent—in 1955 and thereafter from 75 percent to 90 percent depending upon market prices. Of the six basic crops, only tobacco, which had no surplus problem, had a mandatory 90 percent support level. Surplus holdings of the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) were set aside, as Benson had requested, to be used for foreign and domestic disaster relief, school lunch programs, research, and other purposes. Benson's victory was marred, however, when in September the White House, concerned about the November elections, overruled his stringent controls on wheat acreage allotments. Nonetheless, the perception of Benson as a political liability seemed to be refuted by the elections, in which pro-Benson congressmen ran better than his critics in the farm belt.

The success of a flexible price-support policy depended in large part upon unloading surpluses abroad. The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act, passed in July 1954, met some of Benson's goals. The bill authorized the sale of surpluses abroad in exchange for foreign currencies with a provision allowing the CCC to take a $700-million annual loss in such transactions. The president could also send needy nations up to $300 million worth of surpluses over a three-year period. Another provision allowed the government to barter food for goods essential to national security.

The disposal of surpluses abroad, however, was politically complicated. If sold at price-supported domestic prices, most U.S. commodities could not compete with foreign producers in the world market. On the other hand, any dumping might violate the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and disturb the equilibrium of international trade. Despite these difficulties, Benson undertook a series of foreign tours to Latin America, Canada, and Europe in 1955 in order to promote U.S. farm products.

Benson's aggressive program to expand trade ran into opposition from Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, who did not wish to weaken the economies of American allies. Dulles's policy yielded some markets to allies and nonaligned nations in the interest of national security. In addition, the State Department steadfastly opposed trade with communist-bloc nations, which eliminated a potentially important market for American farmers. Benson, a fierce anti-communist was not inclined to confront Dulles on this particular issue, but expansion of exports remained one of the most consistent and possibly one of the most successful themes of his tenure.

By the late fall of 1955, Republicans were already worried about the 1956 elections. The decline in farm income by 20 percent since the peak of the Korean War, with no upturn in sight, was a major cause for concern. In 1955, a new protest movement, the National Farm Organization (NFO), was established. The NFO demanded 100 percent of parity and advocated collective bargaining for farmers. Leading Republicans concluded that the administration needed a new agricultural program to win the confidence of farmers. Benson refused to repudiate his price support policy.

Eisenhower hoped to promote conservation and at the same time aid farmers with a plan he called a Soil Bank. He wanted to pay farmers to retire land from production or to devote the land to conservation practices. The New Deal had paid farmers to take marginal land out of production, and some Republicans had advocated similar programs. Eisenhower thought that such a plan would both conserve soil and reduce surpluses, thereby raising agricultural prices. He also wanted the federal government to buy back marginal land on the Great Plains that had been homesteaded in the 19th century. Benson opposed adding to the public lands, and GEORGE HUMPHREY, the secretary of the treasury, disapproved of buying back land the government had given away. Benson, however, was willing to support the Soil Bank.

In December 1955, Benson announced the plan for the Soil Bank. Some of Benson's conservative supporters, opposed to federal subsidies, criticized the Soil Bank, while his opponents attacked it as insufficient to bring farm income up to nonfarm levels. Nonetheless, Benson both believed the Soil Bank could help stem overproduction and recognized its political value.

The administration offered its agricultural program to Congress in January 1956. It did not include Eisenhower's plan to buy back marginal lands, but it did offer farmers either cash or kind equivalent to the probable yield for land they left fallow (essentially the policy of the New Deal). It also included the Soil Bank, a longer-term program, which provided for farmers to receive payments over a period of years for land they put back into water storage or ungrazed grass or forest. Benson remained skeptical about the Conservation Reserve, as the program was officially named, but the president wanted it. Benson was more comfortable with the proposal to tie the Soil Bank to flexible price supports. Finally, the administration wanted to expand programs to dispose of the surplus.

The bill became entangled in election-year politics. Seeking the farm vote, Democrats in Congress introduced amendments calling for 90 percent of parity. Effectively, they offered the Soil Bank in exchange for fixed and high parity payments. Congress passed an omnibus farm bill in April that included the Soil Bank, 90 percent parity supports for basic commodities, and higher supports for dairy products. Eisenhower vetoed the bill. After efforts to override the veto failed, Congress passed and Eisenhower signed a compromise that included the Soil Bank and provisions to dispose of the surplus, but also established floors on cotton and rice acreage, a cotton export program, and a two-price plan for rice. It also included mandatory supports for small grains and a temporary freeze on parity pricing.

Benson's reputation now rested largely on the performance of the Soil Bank. He knew there was little chance that it would be an immediate success. The program was expensive, and farmers might cultivate their reduced acreage more intensively. Through 1957, production continued to outstrip demand, farm income fell, and USDA spending exceeded its budget. Despite the surplus disposal program, high production kept CCC holdings constant.

The only major bill Benson presented to Congress in 1957 proposed to allow corn farmers to expand their acreage allotments and still remain eligible for price supports, provided they agreed to participate in the Soil Bank. Since the bill was considered too favorable to the corn area, a coalition of southern and urban congressmen combined to defeat the plan in March. In May, Benson suggested that the parity floors for price supports be lowered or the secretary be given the authority to set levels at anywhere from zero percent to 90 percent of parity.

Meanwhile, the secretary directed criticism at another area of congressional inaction. He charged that congressional unwillingness to fund the Rural Development Program (RDP), established in 1955, prejudiced the future of the family farm that figured so prominently in congressional rhetoric. Benson maintained that the program could alleviate rural poverty by teaching either modern farming techniques or nonfarm skills and by providing easier credit and health services. An ambitious RDP, Benson suggested, could cope with the dislocations that might be caused by the end of price supports. Rural development, however, did not receive substantial funding until the 1960s.

Benson persisted in his efforts to move toward a free market. In 1958, he and President Eisenhower proposed lowering the support scale for basics and dairy products to between 70 percent and 90 percent of parity. The secretary predicted that lower prices and increased sales would result and that production controls could be eased or perhaps eliminated for corn. The Democratic Congress, however, passed a freeze on price supports and acreage restrictions, prompting a presidential veto in March. The Agricultural Act of 1958, enacted in August, was another compromise. Benson and the administration got an eventual reduction of price support floors for corn, upland cotton, and rice from 75 percent to 65 percent of parity, while various congressional groups won removal of limits on corn production and a bar to further large cutbacks in rice and cotton allotments.

Despite a slight increase in farm income in 1958, overproduction continued, and discontent was widespread in the farm belt. On February 30, farm-bloc Republican congressmen requested Benson's resignation, stating that his farm policies would cost the Republicans 20 to 25 House seats in the elections. As in the past, Eisenhower stood by Benson. The secretary campaigned vigorously in the farm states, defending his program and asking voters whether they wanted "a truly American or a left-wing dominated Congress for the next two critical years," but Democrats won impressive gains in both the House and Senate. Large Democratic majorities ensured that Benson could not hope to maintain the limited successes he had achieved.

Nevertheless, Benson persuaded the president to propose his most far-reaching agricultural program yet: abandonment of both the parity concept and the idea of a statutory price-support floor based on parity. In his message to Congress in January 1959, Eisenhower suggested that price supports be used to prevent precipitate price drops rather than to sustain farm prices against long-range market trends. The president recommended that either supports for a commodity in a given year be fixed at some percentage of its average market prices during the three years preceding or that supports be made discretionary, to be fixed by the secretary at zero percent to 90 percent of parity. Not surprisingly, Congress ignored these proposals.

In October 1959, Benson made a trip to the Soviet Union. On his return, the secretary said that he was more convinced than ever of the "superiority of our system of privately owned family-sized farms, the profit system, freedom for the farmer to decide what to grow and market, and competitive markets."

Some conservative Republicans tried to persuade Benson to run for the presidential nomination in 1960. The secretary, however, did not want to remain in public life. Furthermore, it was clear that Vice President Nixon was the favorite to capture the nomination and that Benson was too unpopular in the party to be nominated. The Democrats were preparing the most comprehensive farm platform in history, which sought to capitalize on anti-Benson feeling, promising farmers full parity of income with the nonfarm population. Fearing the effect of Benson's legacy on the elections of 1960, several farm-belt members of the Republican National Committee got GOP National Chairman Sen. THRUSTON B. MORTON (R-Ky.) to ask for Benson's resignation in December 1959. Nixon tried to dissociate himself from Benson and successfully persuaded Eisenhower to moderate his final farm message to Congress. Yet the vice president had generally supported Benson, and his campaign platform advocated a continuation of the secretary's policies. Benson had hoped to campaign for the Nixon ticket, but the Republican nominee kept him on the sideline. Nonetheless, the secretary was able to get his views across by circulating a personal statement, "Where We Stand," at the GOP National Convention and with publication of his book, Freedom to Farm.

Benson returned to Salt Lake City in January 1961 to resume his work with the Council of Twelve Apostles. He continued his interest in agriculture, and in the mid-1960s he was a vigorous defender of the John Birch Society. After leaving Washington, however, Benson devoted most of his time to the church. In 1985, he became the 13th president, prophet, seer, and revelator of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He continued in that role even after becoming incapacitated in 1989; he was unable to speak and, at times, to recognize even friends and relatives. Death came at Benson's home in Salt Lake City on May 30, 1994.

Benton, William (Burnett)(1900–1973) U.S. senator

The descendant of a family that first settled in Connecticut during the 17th century, Benton was born in Minneapolis, Minn., on April 1, 1900. After service in the army during World War I, he entered Yale and received his degree in 1921. Benton turned down a Rhodes scholarship for a job as advertising copywriter with the George Batten agency in New York. During the 1920s, he rose in the advertising world, and in 1929, he helped found the firm of Benton and Bowles with his Yale schoolmate CHESTER BOWLES. The agency prospered in spite of, or some say because of, the Depression, pioneering in such fields as consumer surveys and sponsorship of soap operas.

In 1936, Benton left the advertising business to become vice president of the University of Chicago, then under the leadership of ROBERT HUTCHINS. Benton remained there for eight years, helping the university pioneer in the use of educational radio and movies. Benton also urged the University of Chicago to publish the Encyclopædia Britannica and provided the necessary working capital for the venture. In 1943, he became chairman of the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Benton served as assistant secretary of state from 1945 to 1947, supervising the State Department's overseas information program. At that post, he helped establish the United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and organized the Voice of America broadcasts. In 1949 Chester Bowles, then governor of Connecticut, appointed his former advertising partner to fill a Senate seat vacated by the retiring Raymond Baldwin. Benton won reelection to the remainder of the term in 1950 by a bare 1,100 margin. During his short career, Benton gained a reputation as one of the upper chamber's most liberal members. Moreover, he remained an amateur in a body that respected professionalism. He did not always follow the traditions and precedents of the Senate.

The freshman senator quickly emerged as a major opponent of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Angered at McCarthy's role in the Maryland senatorial campaign of 1950, during which McCarthy campaigned against Millard Tydings (D-Md.)—one of his most vocal critics—Benton began a personal crusade against the senator from Wisconsin. Benton regarded McCarthy's claims to knowledge of communist subversion as outright lies. Further, he was disgusted by McCarthy's denunciation of George Marshall as a communist sympathizer.

In August 1951, Benton presented a resolution asking for an investigation of McCarthy's actions in order to decide if he should be expelled. The following month, Benton presented a lengthy, biting indictment of the senator on the Senate floor. In words that even his lawyers thought libelous, he excoriated McCarthy for his charges against Marshall, saying that if the senator actually believed his "towering lies," Congress "might investigate the precedent of an expulsion proceeding against a senator thought to be of unsound mind." The Privileges and Elections Subcommittee reluctantly voted to investigate Benton's charges as well as McCarthy's countercharges. The senator from Wisconsin maintained that Benton had shielded security risks and had failed to report a $600 donation as part of his campaign funds. McCarthy refused to answer Benton's charges and testified before the panel only on his allegations against Benton.

In January 1953, the panel issued its report. It contained no recommendations but said that the probe raised questions about McCarthy's activities and charged that McCarthy had deliberately "set out to thwart the committee." The panel criticized Benton for accepting the $600 contribution but took no action. The Justice Department also cleared him of campaign irregularities.

While the congressional probe was in progress, Benton, hoping to bring his crusade to court, had in 1952 waived congressional immunity on his Senate speech against McCarthy. McCarthy then instituted a $2 million libel suit. The case, carried on during 1952 and 1953, proved inconclusive. In March 1954, McCarthy announced he had dropped the suit because his lawyers could find no one to testify that they believed Benton's charges. Benton's allies launched a campaign to gather signatures of "Believers"; 14,000 responded.

Benton lost his Senate seat in the election of 1952. Out of office, he criticized the Eisenhower administration. In 1956, he charged that the GOP had failed to keep a campaign pledge from 1952 to revise immigration restrictions and said the United States had been fortunate to “avoid disaster” under the Eisenhower administration’s foreign policy.

Benton attempted a political comeback in 1958. During the spring, he ran for the Democratic senatorial nomination against his liberal friend Chester Bowles and conservative THOMAS DODD. The state party chairman, John Bailey, and Gov. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF supported Benton; they feared that Bowles’s controversial views on foreign policy would weaken the ticket. At the convention in June, Benton and Bowles split the liberal vote, giving the nomination to Dodd. After his defeat, Benton returned to his business. From 1963 to 1968, he was the U.S. member of the executive board of UNESCO. He died in New York City on March 18, 1973.

(1908–1994) historian and educational critic

Born in Chautauqua, N.Y., on September 20, 1908, Bestor received his B.A. and Ph.D. from Yale University in 1930 and 1938, respectively. He taught at Teachers College of Columbia University before moving to Stanford University and then the University of Illinois.

As a professional historian, he was perhaps best known for his early work on utopian communities of the 19th century. The American Historical Association awarded Bestor’s book, Backwoods Utopia, the Albert J. Beveridge Prize in 1946. In the 1960s, he turned his scholarly attention to the field of constitutional history, specifically to the constitutional provisions for making war and peace and the role of the presidency in defining foreign relations. Bestor testified before several congressional committees regarding the intent of the framers of the Constitution with respect to the role of the Senate in the making of treaties.

He became best known by the general public, however, for his critiques of the American educational system. By the post–World War II era, progressive educational theories dominated public education in the United States. Progressive educational theories held that education should be “child-centered.” Each child should learn at his or her own pace and by active engagement rather than by rote memorization. Further, each child should receive a basic liberal education and, beyond that, an education that would develop the child’s particular abilities (including vocational training) and would allow the child to function effectively in society. By proposing to offer a basic liberal education for all and to meet the specific demands of each child, however, progressive education had promised more than it could deliver. By the mid-1950s, progressive education came under a withering attack. The year 1953 saw the publication of Albert Lynd’s Quackery in the Public Schools, Robert Hutchins’s The Conflict in Education, Paul Woodring’s Let’s Talk Sense about Our Schools, and Bestor’s Educational Wastelands. Of these books, Bestor’s was easily the most influential. He had first publicly criticized American education in the article “Liberal Education and a Liberal Nation,” which appeared in The American Scholar in 1952. After that, he wrote several more harshly critical essays in The New Republic, The Scientific Monthly, and the American Association of University Professors Bulletin. His attack climaxed with the publication of Educational Wastelands. Two years later, Bestor came out with a revised and expanded version titled The Restoration of Learning.

In Educational Wastelands, Bestor denounced what he called a “retreat from learning.” He maintained that the purpose of education was intellectual training, or “the deliberate cultivation of the ability to think.” This, he argued, was best done through the academic disciplines, which evolved as systematic methods for solving problems. Modern schools, he contended, had subverted this purpose by separating the schools from scholarship and teacher training from the arts and sciences. He attacked progressive education’s emphasis on life-adjustment as “a parody of education.” To reform education, he called for the education of teachers to place a greater emphasis on training in subject matter and less on pedagogy. Bestor further advocated rigorous standards, greater attention to content, and a stronger commitment to liberal education.

When the Soviet Union launched Sputnik in 1957, many looked for something to blame for what they perceived as America’s second-place standing in the space race. Progressive education became a favorite target, and Bestor’s book gained a wide audience.

Bestor moved to the University of Washington in 1962 and taught there until his retirement in 1976, when he became professor emeritus. He was among the first constitutional scholars to call for the resignation of President RICHARD M. NIXON. Bestor died of lung cancer on December 13, 1994, in Seattle, Wash.

Bethe, Hans A(Ibrecht)

(1906–2005) physicist

The son of a distinguished physiologist, Bethe was born on July 2, 1906, in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine. He was educated in Germany, where he received his doctorate in physics in 1928. He taught at various German universities, but because of his part-Jewish ancestry, fled the country in 1933. After a year in England, he settled in the United States and in 1937 joined the faculty of Cornell University, where his research into celestial energy aided scientists in developing the hydrogen bomb. From 1943 to 1946, Bethe worked on the Manhattan Project under the direction of J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER. Although the project's primary goal was to build an atomic or fission bomb, work also proceeded on the development of the hydrogen bomb. The latter project was put aside in 1944 because of technical problems.

Bethe and Oppenheimer became leading spokesmen for "finite containment" in the postwar debate over continuation of research on the hydrogen bomb. These scientists believed that a large stockpile of American nuclear arms was necessary to contain Soviet aggression. However, they maintained that further technological advances would bring the supply of weapons to dangerous levels unwarranted by strategic considerations. Declaring that the Soviet Union was "largely imitative" in its atomic energy programs, they maintained that the United States could forego the hydrogen weapon without incurring a serious security risk. Instead, they suggested that work on the bomb be conducted only at a theoretical level. President HARRY S. TRUMAN rejected their advice, and, following recommendations of EDWARD TELLER, authorized production of the weapon in 1950. The outbreak of the Korean War changed Bethe's mind. Previously an outspoken opponent of the H-bomb, he agreed to devote himself to thermonuclear research at Cornell and Los Alamos. It was first exploded in November 1952.

During the early years of the Eisenhower administration, Bethe became a leading defender of Oppenheimer, who had been suspended from his post as an Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) consultant in 1953 as an alleged security risk. In part, this suspension was based on his failure to endorse a "crash" program for the development of the hydrogen bomb. When the suspension and subsequent hearings were publicized in April 1954, Bethe joined many outstanding scientists who declared their confidence in Oppenheimer and testified on his behalf. Following the AEC's decision not to reinstate Oppenheimer despite its finding that he was "loyal," Bethe released a statement by the American Physical Society denouncing the ruling as based on differences over nuclear weapons policy rather than on actual security risk.

In 1956, Bethe was appointed to the President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC). Two years later, he became chairman of a special panel formed to study the possible effects of a nuclear test ban agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union and to research the efficiency of various methods of detecting atomic blasts. Bethe testified before the Senate Disarmament Subcommittee in April 1958 that the United States would gain "considerably" from a test ban if it included "a good inspection system with all the trimmings." He rejected Teller's testimony that the Soviet Union would benefit more than the United States and that adequate detection was impossible. Bethe maintained that if tests continued the USSR "will surely attain the same level of capability as we. . . . It is more advantageous to stop when . . . you are still ahead." He did, however, suggest that any ban include provisions for continued high-altitude tests to gain information on such explosions.

Bethe attended the 1958 U.S.-Soviet disarmament talks in Geneva, where the two delegations agreed that any test ban accord would include acoustical, radiological, seismic, and electromagnetic detection systems. A year later, in secret testimony before the Senate Disarmament Subcommittee, he recommended that a treaty also provide for satellite monitoring of explosions in outer space. The advocates of finite containment won a major victory in March 1960, when the United States and the USSR agreed to negotiate a ban on nuclear tests except for small underground ones considered unverifiable.

Bethe continued to serve as a presidential adviser during the Kennedy administration. Throughout his career, Bethe won many scientific honors, including the Max Planck Medal, West Germany's highest scientific honor, for his research on celestial energy. He received the AEC's Enrico Fermi Award in 1961 and the Nobel Prize in physics in 1967. Bethe continued to teach at Cornell until 1975.

Bethe died at his home in Ithaca, N.Y., on March 6, 2005.

Bible, Alan D.

Bible was born on November 20, 1909, in Lovelock, Nev. He graduated from the University of Nevada at Reno in 1930 and from Georgetown University Law School in 1934. Bible gained admission to the Nevada bar in 1935 and, for the next two decades, engaged in the private practice of law when not holding public office. A protege and law partner of Sen. PATRICK McCARRAN (D-Nev.), Bible served as district attorney of Storey County from 1935 to 1938 and, in the last year, received an appointment as deputy attorney general of Nevada. After serving as state attorney from 1942 to 1950, he resumed the private practice of law. When McCarran died in 1954, Bible was elected to serve out the remainder of his term. Bible won reelection to a full term in 1956.

During the Eisenhower administration, Bible voted as a moderately conservative Democrat, backing the party leadership in the Senate. He supported the Civil Rights Act of 1957 but only after voting for the elimination of a provision authorizing the attorney general to institute civil action for preventive relief in civil rights cases. He also voted to remove a similar enforcement provision from the Civil Rights Act of 1960. By the late 1950s, Bible was identified by Congressional Quarterly as one of a small number of Northern and Western Democrats who voted more than half the time with the conservative coalition of southern Democrats and Republicans.

As a representative of a state heavily dependent on mining, Bible continued McCarran's efforts to raise tariffs on lead and zinc. Calling attention to the depressed condition of the domestic minerals industry, Bible advocated the establishment of a national minerals policy to protect the industry from foreign competition. However, the administration feared that heavy tariff increases would hurt foreign countries whose economies the United States wished to aid. When Eisenhower presented a minerals plan in 1957 providing for low sliding-scale import taxes on lead and zinc and limiting government assistance for mining exploration, Bible called it a "joke." Eisenhower imposed import quotas on lead and zinc in 1958. Many regarded the move as a trade-off in exchange for the support of Western congressmen for the administration's reciprocal trade program. Bible never succeeded in getting the comprehensive subsidy program he had long desired.

During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, Bible's numerous committee assignments attested to his great influence. He sat on the Appropriations, Interior and Insular Affairs, and Select Small Business Committees, as well as the Special Committee on Aging and the Democratic Steering Committee. He chaired the District of Columbia Committee from 1957 to 1968. Bible's record of support for the liberal legislation of the 1960s was mixed. He served in the Senate until his resignation in 1974, after which he returned to his law practice. He died in Auburn, Calif., on September 12, 1988.

Biemiller, Andrew J(ohn)

(1906–1982) union leader

Born of Quaker parents on July 23, 1906, in Sandusky, Ohio, Andrew Biemiller graduated from Cornell University in 1926. After doing graduate work at the University of Pennsylvania, he taught history, specializing in the British trade union movement, at Syracuse University and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1932, he became a reporter for the Milwaukee Leader. From 1932 to 1942, he was labor-relations counselor and organizer for the Milwaukee Federation of Trade Councils and the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor. Biemiller won election as a Socialist-Progressive to the Wisconsin legislature in 1936, and served there until 1942, when he became assistant to the vice chairman for labor production of the War Production Board. Elected to Congress as a Democrat from Wisconsin's fifth district in 1944, he served from 1945 to 1946 and from 1949 to 1950. He was defeated for reelection in that traditionally Republican state in 1946 and 1952. Between terms, he worked as director of political education for the upholsterers' union.

During 1951 and 1952, Biemiller was a special assistant to the secretary of the interior and a public-relations counselor in Washington, D.C. In 1953, he joined the American Federation of Labor (AFL) as a legislative lobbyist. There he helped AFL president GEORGE MEANY negotiate the merger with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) that led to the creation of the AFL-CIO in 1955. Biemiller became director of the organization's department of legislation the following year.

As the AFL-CIO's chief lobbyist, Biemiller often opposed measures supported by the Eisenhower administration on Capitol Hill. In 1957, he challenged Eisenhower's minimum-wage bill, which extended coverage to 2.5 million additional workers, as "too little too late." Instead, he backed Rep. A. B. Kelley's (D-Pa.) unsuccessful measure that would have extended coverage to 9.7 million workers and raised the hourly wage to $1.25. Biemiller and the AFL-CIO favored Medicare financed through Social Security rather than Eisenhower's health reinsurance proposals, and he worked with House Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) to defeat the administration's program in 1957. The following year, he supported increased school construction as a means of combating the recession and attacked Eisenhower's failure to mention the proposal in his anti-recession message to Congress. In 1959 he called Eisenhower's four-year, $1-billion housing program inadequate and condemned the president's lack of action on unemployment. That year Biemiller focused his attention on defeating the Landrum-Griffin bill, which contained provisions limiting secondary boycotts. Despite Biemiller's efforts, Eisenhower signed the measure into law in September.

During the 1950s, Biemiller became involved in the question of atomic energy control. He was chairman of the AFL-CIO's committee on atomic energy and a member of the labor-management advisory committee of the Atomic Energy Commission. Testifying before a congressional committee in May 1954, he supported Eisenhower's "Atoms-for-Peace" plan and recommended that Asian nations be included within its provisions for atomic energy development under control of the United Nations. Biemiller was concerned with the possibility of private monopolies of nuclear power and told Congress in 1955 that the government should prohibit them. The following year, he warned against the hazards of nuclear reactors and charged that the Atomic Energy Commission had underestimated their dangers and muzzled press reports of accidents.

Disappointed at Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON'S (D-Tex.) failure to oppose the Landrum-Griffin Act, Biemiller supported Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960. Biemiller maintained close contact with the White House during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. He testified on Capitol Hill in support of Kennedy's manpower retraining, education, and foreign aid bills and lobbied for Johnson's Great Society legislation. Biemiller also supported the administration's policy in Vietnam. During the Nixon administration, he played an important role in blocking the appointment of southern judges Clement F. Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell to the U.S. Supreme Court. Biemiller left the AFL-CIO in 1979 and resided in Bethesda, Md., until his death there on April 3, 1982.

Bissell, Richard M(ervin), Jr.

(1909–1994) special assistant to the director of Central Intelligence; deputy director of plans, Central Intelligence Agency

Born in Hartford, Conn., on September 18, 1909, Bissell attended the elite Groton School and then went to Yale, where he graduated in 1932. From 1932 to 1933, he studied at the London School of Economics. He then returned to Yale as an instructor and eventually assistant professor in economics. Bissell received his Ph.D. from that university in 1939. He was appointed assistant administrator of the Marshall Plan in 1948 and served there until 1951.

In 1954, Bissell joined the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) as special assistant to Director ALLEN W. DULLES. Bissell was one of the few high-ranking members of the agency who had no background in wartime intelligence work. His major responsibility was to develop techniques for obtaining information on the strategic capabilities of the Soviet Union. He sided with Dulles in advocating the use of modern technology rather than operatives to gather data. He conceived and supervised the program of U-2 flights over the Soviet Union and helped develop the SR-71 high-altitude surveillance plane. He was also an early advocate of spy satellites. Bissell's U-2 program became public in May 1960, when pilot FRANCIS GARY POWERS was shot down over Soviet territory. The United States defended the mission and announced that it would continue overflights to prevent communist expansion.

In 1959, Bissell became deputy director for plans, responsible for coordinating covert operations. According to the report of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence Activities, issued in 1975, at this post Bissell supervised plans to assassinate Congolese leader Patrice Lumumba as well as Cuban Premier Fidel Castro and his brother Raul. In September 1960, a CIA scientist, Joseph Scheider (whose real name was Sidney Gottlieb), acting on orders from Bissell, obtained poison and hypodermic needles from army stockpiles and flew to Leopoldville with instructions for CIA station officer Victor Hedgman to kill Lumumba. When this failed, Bissell asked a senior CIA officer, Michael Mulroney, to undertake the assignment. Mulroney refused to assassinate Lumumba, but he flew to the Congo and got two other CIA agents to attempt the assassination. Before the CIA could make further attempts, however, Lumumba was killed by Congolese opponents.

According to the Senate Select Committee's report, during the summer of 1960 Bissell sanctioned attempts on the lives of Raul and Fidel Castro. The decision to kill Raul was reversed before action could be taken, but an attempt was authorized on the life of the premier. The plan involved CIA cooperation with organized-crime leaders Sam Giancana and John Roselli, who were given money, poison, and electronic gear to give to hired assassins. Although the plan was never put into operation, the CIA did make several attempts on Castro's life during the early 1960s.

The origin of the orders to assassinate Lumumba and Castro was never clearly determined, because the system of executive command in the agency was purposefully ambiguous to permit "plausible denial." Bissell testified in 1975 that he had assumed he had the authority of Eisenhower and Dulles to assassinate Lumumba. He also said he had interpreted Dulles's original order to eliminate Castro as including possible assassination. However, Bissell also testified that he had not informed Eisenhower of the plot to kill Castro and that, to his knowledge, neither did Dulles. Bissell did say that he believed Dulles would have informed the president in an "oblique" way but admitted that this was "pure personal opinion." The committee was never able to discover Dulles's role in the action. It did conclude that Bissell had exceeded his delegated authority by engaging in the projects.

On March 17, 1960, Eisenhower ordered the CIA to help unify opposition to the Castro regime. Dulles turned the task over to Bissell, who proposed to train guerrillas in Guatemala to infiltrate Cuba and organize a popular revolt. When infiltration proved unworkable, Bissell proposed a full-scale invasion of the island by refugees trained and armed by the United States. Bissell organized the project in Guatemala. The plan called for not only the development of camps for training guerrillas but also the construction of airstrips. These would provide a base for CIA planes, which would drop arms to guerrillas already in Cuba and provide cover for the invasion. Eisenhower authorized only the formation and training of the exile force. He reserved the decision on whether or how to use it. Above all, Eisenhower emphasized the importance of finding a Cuban leader who could unify the opposition forces and form a credible government in exile. Without a proper political foundation, he believed, the enterprise was worthless. When Eisenhower left office, he remained skeptical about the force and the political preconditions necessary for its use. Nevertheless, he passed the exile force on to his successor.

The new president, JOHN F. KENNEDY, gave approval for the invasion, which took place on April 17, 1961. The operation was an abysmal failure; the exile force was defeated by April 19.

Bissell resigned in February 1962. Shortly thereafter he became head of the Institute for Defense Analysis. He remained there until 1964, when he became an executive of the United Aircraft Corp. Beginning in 1974, he worked as a self-employed management consultant. He died in Farmington, Conn., on February 7, 1994.

Black, Eugene R(obert)

(1898–1992) president, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development

Born on May 1, 1898, in Atlanta, Ga., and raised there, Black received his B.A. from the University of Georgia in 1918 and served as an ensign in the navy during World War I. Black joined an Atlanta-based New York investment house in 1931 and two years later associated himself with the Chase National Bank of New York, where he became an expert on the bond market. From 1933 to 1947, Black was involved in Chase's international activities. He briefly served as undersecretary of the treasury in 1936. In 1947 President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Black an executive director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank). The appointment of the conservative Black was welcomed by Wall Street, which disapproved of the bank's earlier liberal loan policies. Black became president of the World Bank in 1949.

During Black's presidency, the bank turned from an emphasis on European redevelopment loans to an emphasis on projects in underdeveloped nations. He emphasized education and the development of technological knowledge in directing the bank's investments. Under Black, the bank tried to avoid high-risk projects and instead opted for the development of "economies of scale," such as transportation facilities, power installations, irrigation, and land reclamation projects—prerequisites for increased productivity in many sectors of the borrowing nations's economies. To prevent political pressures, the bank usually made loans only where they could be entrusted to a quasi-autonomous authority, not to the government of a recipient nation.

Black became deeply involved in the negotiations for financing the Aswan High Dam in 1955–56. The bank did a study in 1953–54 showing that the project was both technically sound and economically feasible. Black reported directly to President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER that the construction of the dam was Egypt's highest economic and social priority and recommended joint financing by Great Britain, the United States, and the World Bank. He then attempted to counter President Gamal Abdel Nasser's fear that the agreement would infringe upon Egypt's sovereignty and to convince him to accept the plan. Black also had to persuade Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES to agree to the measure, despite Egypt's increasing closeness to the USSR.

Black's task became more difficult in May 1956, when Nasser's recognition of Communist China and rumors of Egypt's increased arms and financial dealings with the Russians further cooled the administration's enthusiasm for the project. He continued to promote the proposal, cautioning that the United States would lose a public relations battle and push Nasser into the arms of the Soviets if it refused aid. Nevertheless, Dulles decided to withdraw American support for the project in July.

Black also served as a mediator in disputes arising from the Suez conflict of 1956. In December 1958, he left for Cairo to negotiate a settlement of the British-French claims arising from Nasser's 1956 nationalization of the canal. Black's efforts ended triumphantly in February 1959 with the signing of an Anglo-Egyptian accord outlining terms of compensation to British property owners.

The Kennedy administration also used Black as mediator in the conflict between India and Pakistan in 1962. In 1963, Black retired from the World Bank but maintained close contacts with the business community. That year he served on the Clay Committee, formed to study the nation's foreign aid program. During the Johnson administration, Black served as presidential adviser on Southeast Asian economic affairs. He died on February 20, 1992, in Southampton, N.Y.

Black, Hugo L(afayette)

(1886–1971) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court
Born on February 27, 1886, in Harlan, Ala., and raised in rural Clay Co., Ala., Hugo Black received a two-year undergraduate law degree from the University of Alabama in 1906. He built a successful law practice in Birmingham and held several local offices there before winning election to the U.S. Senate in 1926. Reelected in 1932, Black quickly became an outspoken supporter of the New Deal. President Franklin D. Roosevelt selected the Alabamian as his first nominee to the Supreme Court in August 1937. Shortly after the Senate confirmed Black's appointment on August 17, a Pittsburgh newspaper published evidence of his membership in the Ku Klux Klan. The furor died down only after Black made a brief radio speech on October 1 stating that he had joined the Klan in 1923 but had resigned from it in 1925.

On the bench, Black favored expanded government power over the economy, and he voted to sustain the New Deal's economic and social welfare legislation. However, he opposed government intrusion on individual liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and gradually emerged as one of the foremost defenders of civil liberties on the Court. Black insisted that the provisions of the Bill of Rights were absolutes that government could not abridge. He also contended that the Fourteenth Amendment had made the first eight Amendments fully applicable to the states as well as the federal government. The justice gave a special position to the First Amendment, for he believed the rights of free speech, press, and assembly formed the foundation of a free government. He argued that the amendment unequivocally barred all government interference with individual thought and expression. This led Black to oppose restrictions on obscenity, "subversive" speech, and even libel. Black was especially ardent in his defense of the First Amendment during the McCarthy era, when a majority of the Court often restricted the rights of free speech and association in loyalty-security cases. In a famous dissent in the Dennis case (1951), for example, Black asserted that the Smith Act, which made it illegal to teach or advocate violent overthrow of the U.S. government, violated the First Amendment.

During the Eisenhower years, Black continued to express his absolutist views of the First Amendment. When the Court reconsidered the Smith Act in June 1957 and interpreted it in a manner that gave greater scope to freedom of speech but did not declare the act unconstitutional, Black wrote a separate opinion. He again argued that the statute was unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

The justice also opposed legislative investigations into subversion that probed individual beliefs. He repeatedly voted to overturn the contempt convictions of witnesses who refused to answer committee questions about their political ideas and associations. In June 1957, he joined the majority in two decisions setting limits on congressional and state investigative powers (Watkins v. U.S. and Sweezy v. New Hampshire) and dissented when the Court retreated from this position in two cases decided in June 1959 (Updegraff v. U.S. and Barenblatt v. U.S.). In his dissenting opinion in Barenblatt, Black contended that the chief aim of the House Un-American Activities Committee was to expose and try witnesses who were suspected communists and to punish them by humiliation and public scorn. As a result, the committee was not only violating individual rights of free association and expression, but was also illegally exercising a judicial function that the Constitution had assigned to the courts.

Justice Black spoke for the majority in two cases, decided in May 1957, that placed limits on the legal profession's power to regulate admission to its ranks. He overturned the refusal of state bar associations to admit candidates with actual or alleged communist backgrounds as a denial of due process of law.

Black's absolutist views generally led him to give wide scope to the constitutional rights guaranteed to those accused of crimes. He continually insisted that the states as well as the federal government must supply counsel to all indigent criminal defendants. In April 1956, he ruled that the states must also supply an indigent defendant with a free trial transcript if it was essential to appeal a criminal conviction. Black believed the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination was beyond the reach of government. He dissented in February 1954, when the Court upheld a state gambling conviction, because he thought the defendant's Fifth Amendment rights had been denied. Black also wrote the majority opinion in a well-known case, Thompson v. City of Louisville (1960), which held it a denial of due process to convict an individual of loitering or vagrancy when there was no evidence to support the charge.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Black gave his full support to the Court's rulings overturning racial segregation and discrimination. He voted with the majority in May 1954 to hold segregated public schools unconstitutional (Brown v. Board of Education) and wrote the majority opinion in Boynton v. Virginia (1960), which extended the Court's earlier prohibition against segregation in interstate travel to cover accommodations in terminals used in interstate travel.

For much of his career, Black's literalist interpretation of the Bill of Rights led him in the direction of liberal activism. The same approach, however, could lead to different conclusions. For example, the Fourth Amendment prohibited only "unreasonable" searches and seizures, and Black was reluctant to restrict the power of the government on a term so open to interpretation, as can be seen in his vacillation on the exclusionary rule. He also balked at the creation of new rights. When a majority of the Court found a right of marital privacy in the "penumbras" of the first ten Amendments (Griswold v. Connecticut, 1965), Black dissented vigorously. Moreover, despite his absolutist reading of the First Amendment's protection of free speech, Black opposed extending that protection to symbolic speech, such as picketing.

One of the most controversial members of the Court, Black's commitment to judicial activism led him into sometimes bitter and even personal conflict with justices committed to judicial restraint, most notably FELIX FRANKFURTER and ROBERT JACKSON. Black's consistent adherence to his belief that the Court should turn to notions of reasonableness or social utility only when the text and historical context of the Constitution failed to resolve an issue made him an intellectual leader on the Court. He thus became an important figure in the effort to balance claims for an active judicial review with those of majoritarian democracy.

When he died in Bethesda, Md., on September 25, 1971, he was widely praised as a defender of civil liberties when such a position was rejected by a majority of his brethren on the Court and unpopular with the public. Whether they agreed or disagreed with Black, no one could question his influence on constitutional law.

Blake, Eugene Carson

The son of a Presbyterian elder, Eugene Carson Blake was born in St. Louis, Mo., on November 7, 1906. He received his A.B. degree with honors in philosophy at Princeton in 1928. After studying at Edinburgh University, he was awarded a Th.B. from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1932. During the next two decades, Blake held pulpits in Albany, N.Y., Pasadena, Calif., and New York, N.Y. In 1948 he was a delegate to the conference establishing the World Council of Churches, an organization founded to foster cooperation between 163 different Protestant and Orthodox denominations. Two years later, Blake helped form the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. (NCCC), an organization of Protestant and Orthodox churches formed to promote ecumenism and coordinate church welfare programs, social research, and charity. He was elected stated elder of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S. in 1951 and president of the NCCC in 1954.

During the 1950s, Blake was in the forefront of what church historian Harvey Cox called the "New Breed" of clergymen, social activists who led the struggle for civil liberties and civil rights. In December 1953, the General Council of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S. sent a letter to its congregations decrying "assaults on basic human rights" in the United States. Defending the message, Blake pointed to two serious threats to religion in America: "anti-intellectualism . . . which tends to blur all distinctions except those of white and black” and the forces of “totalitarianism, communism, and fascism.”

The following year, Black chaired a subcommittee of the NCCC that called for the adoption of procedural reforms in congressional investigating committees to protect individual freedom.

In February 1960, it was revealed that an air force training manual contained charges that the NCCC was communist infiltrated. Six Protestant leaders, including Blake, demanded apologies from Air Force Secretary Dudley C. Sharp and Rep. FRANCIS E. WALTER (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). They also demanded assurances that the manual containing the allegations would not be reissued. Walter offered to let the six testify before the committee on the accuracy of the charges, but they refused on the grounds that HUAC was not the proper forum for discussing their protest. They maintained that there were other committees charged with the oversight of government operations. The manual was withdrawn without any determination as to the charges.

Blake was also active in the growing Civil Rights movement. In 1956, he sent a telegram to the Rev. Solomon S. Seay in Montgomery, Ala., assuring African Americans that he supported the Montgomery bus boycott. Two years later, he issued a statement declaring that desegregation in the South should be enforced “with troops and tanks if necessary.” The view was rejected by Philip Howerton, moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (Southern Presbyterian Church), who warned that force would result in “nothing but chaos.”

In 1960, Blake was one of 13 prominent Protestant clergymen who, in an open letter to fellow pastors, condemned the use of anti-Catholicism in the presidential primary campaign.

Blake maintained his involvement in civil rights throughout the 1960s and continued to champion the union of Protestant denominations. He also emerged as a prominent opponent of the Vietnam War. Blake became secretary-general of the World Council of Churches in 1966 and served at that post until 1972. He died in Stanford, Conn., on July 31, 1985.

Blatnik, John A(nton)

Blatnik was born in Chisholm, Minn., on August 17, 1911. After graduating from Chisholm High School, he taught in a one-room rural school before attending State Teachers College, where he earned a bachelor of education. He taught high school chemistry in Chisholm for two years and became assistant superintendent of schools of Saint Louis Co. from 1939 to 1941. He won election to the state senate in 1940 and served from 1941 to 1947. Overlapping with his two terms in the state senate, he served in the U.S. Army Air Corps and the Office of Strategic Services from August 1942 to 1946.

Blatnik won election as a Democrat to Congress in 1946 from the ore-mining region of northeastern Minnesota. In the House, he supported the labor and civil rights legislation of the Truman and Eisenhower administrations. A descendant of Slovene immigrants, Blatnik was particularly concerned with the loss of American influence in Yugoslavia following World War II. He denounced Eisenhower’s foreign policy, describing it as based “almost entirely on armament” rather than economic aid and cultural exchange.

By the early 1950s, the high-grade iron ores that had made Blatnik’s district the iron capital of the world were becoming seriously depleted, and steel manufacturers were turning to cheaper foreign sources. In an effort to counteract this trend, Blatnik fought for the long-postponed Saint Lawrence Seaway Project, which he viewed as a means of opening the isolated region to industrial development. In 1954, Congress finally authorized the construction of a deep-water navigation channel in the Saint Lawrence River, making it possible for large ships to sail from the Atlantic Ocean to Duluth, Minn., at the western end of the Great Lakes.

During the Eisenhower years, Blatnik also became known as a crusader for clean water legislation. As chairman of the Public Works Committee’s Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee, he sponsored the Federal Water Pollution Control Act of 1956, steering it skillfully through the pro-industry committee and a hostile Congress. The act authorized federal grants for the construction of local sewage treatment plants and established a Water Pollution Control Advisory Board within the Public Health Service. It gave federal investigators power to force polluting industries or cities to clean up rivers and streams, but only in cases of interstate pollution. Moreover, they were not given the legal right to inspect industrial plants or municipal waste treatment facilities. Although these jurisdictional limitations weakened the law, the act was a landmark in the fight for clean water. Through 1961, Blatnik was the principal sponsor of congressional efforts to strengthen the federal program.

During the 1960s, Blatnik maintained his liberal record on most issues, but he ceased to be a vigorous proponent of pollution-control legislation. The reasons for this about-face were not clear, but critics suggested that it resulted from the Federal Water Quality Control Administration's attempt to stop the Reserve Mining Co., the largest employer in Blatnik's district, from dumping industrial wastes into Lake Superior. Blatnik retired from Congress in 1974. After leaving Congress, Blatnik worked as a consultant both to the shipping industry and on environmental and economic development. He died in Forest Heights, Md., on December 17, 1991.

Blossom, Virgil T(racey)

Born in Brookfield, Mo., in 1907, Blossom graduated from Missouri Valley College, which he attended on an athletic scholarship. Subsequently, he earned an M.S. from the University of Arkansas and attended classes at Northwestern University. In 1935 he took a job as a teacher and athletic director at Okmulgee, Oklahoma. Three years later, he became principal of Fayetteville High School in Arkansas. Blossom became Fayetteville's superintendent of schools in 1942. In the spring of 1953, he became superintendent of schools in Little Rock, Arkansas, while continuing to hold his position in Fayetteville. Following the Supreme Court's ruling in May 1954 that declared segregated schools unconstitutional, Blossom desegregated Fayetteville without incident. The following September, he took up his post in Little Rock on a full-time basis. He pursued his duties so energetically that in 1955 Little Rock citizens named him "Man of the Year."

While Blossom did not welcome desegregation, he thought it best to comply with the Supreme Court's ruling. During the summer of 1954, he developed a plan to desegregate public schools in Little Rock. At that time, Little Rock had only one high school for whites and one for blacks, but two new schools were under construction. Horace Mann, in the east, was being built in a predominantly black area. The other new school, Hall, was located in the affluent, predominantly white, western suburbs. At the time construction of the new schools began, the school board intended that Horace Mann would become the city's black high school. The old black high school would become a black junior high. Central, up to that time the only white school, would continue to serve whites, as would Hall.

Blossom's plan called for desegregation to begin at the high school level. After monitoring progress at the high schools, the school board would integrate the junior high schools. The final step would be the integration of elementary schools. In May 1955, the school board adopted a revised version of Blossom's plan. Integration would begin at the high school level in 1957 and then only at Central High, which drew from a predominantly working-class population. Integration would come to the junior high schools in 1959 or 1960, then, finally, to the elementary schools. The plan set no specific date for desegregation of the elementary schools but suggested 1963. The plan also allowed students to transfer out of schools in which their race would be a minority. This ensured that Horace Mann would have no white students.

The NAACP challenged the plan in court, but Judge John E. Miller ruled that the Blossom plan met the Supreme Court's requirement of a "prompt and reasonable start." At this point, it seemed reasonable to expect that desegregation would begin with little or no trouble. The school board had voluntarily developed a plan for desegregation, and a federal court had endorsed it. Moreover, the governor, ORVAL FAUBUS, had avoided direct involvement with the issue of desegregation. He had condoned the desegregation of public colleges and universities in Arkansas and had not intervened in Hoxie or Fayetteville. Facing reelection and a challenge from a segregationist opponent, however, Faubus moved to a tougher position on desegregation in 1956. Faubus won reelection, and voters passed three ballot measures designed to resist desegregation. Nevertheless, in March 1957, moderates defeated their segregationist opponents in elections to Little Rock's school board.

Throughout the summer of 1957, however, segregationist opposition grew. After some maneuvering in court, Faubus went on statewide television on September 2. His speech blamed Blossom for "forcing" desegregation on "the people." Further, until the legal issues were resolved, no black students would be admitted to white schools, and units of the Arkansas National Guard would enforce the order. The school board then lost its nerve and asked a federal judge to delay desegregation; the judge denied the request. On September 4, the National Guard blocked the entry of the black students. The school board again petitioned the court for delay and was again rejected. Moreover, the court issued a restraining order against Faubus, ordering him not to interfere with the desegregation of Central High. A meeting between President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and Faubus failed to resolve the situation. On September 20, the federal district court ruled that Faubus had acted unlawfully in obstructing the order to proceed with integration and enjoined the governor and officers of the National Guard from preventing the black students from attending classes. Faubus withdrew the guard.

The black students attended Central High on September 23, but rioting outside the school led school authorities to withdraw the students for their own safety. That night, the president went on national television and issued a proclamation commanding all persons obstructing the court orders to cease and desist. The next morning, a mob again gathered at Central High. Eisenhower nationalized the guard and sent 500 paratroopers of the 101st Airborne to ensure compliance with the court's orders. The black students attended Central High for the remainder of that year under the protection of the 101st and then the Arkansas National Guard.

Blossom remained the target of local extremists. He was nearly assassinated by a sniper and had his telephone disconnected to stem the tide of threatening calls. In September 1958, after failing to get a court order to halt further integration, Gov. Faubus closed Little Rock's secondary schools completely. Five of the six school board members friendly to Blossom resigned. Newly elected segregationists then fired the superintendent. Blossom moved to San Antonio, Tex., where he guided a rural school district through a period of expansion. He died of a heart attack in San Antonio, Tex., on January 15, 1965.

Blough, Roger M(iles)

(1904–1985) chairman, United States Steel Corporation

The son of a truck farmer, Roger Blough was born on January 19, 1904, in Riverside, Pa. After graduating from Susquehanna University in 1925, he taught history at the high school in Hawley, Pa., for three years before deciding to go to law school. He graduated from Yale Law School in 1931 and joined the Wall Street firm of White and Case. Blough's association with U.S. Steel began in the late 1930s, when he served as an associate counsel for the corporation during a congressional investigation of the steel industry. Blough left White and Case in 1942 to become general solicitor for U.S. Steel. In 1951, he became executive vice president and a member of the board of directors. A close confidante of U.S. Steel's president, BENJAMIN FAIRLESS, Blough continued his ascent in the firm's hierarchy. When President HARRY S. TRUMAN seized the steel mills in 1952, Blough helped to plead the corporation's case before the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court ruled Truman's action unconstitutional, and the mills were returned to their owners. After the death of the company's general counsel in July 1953, Blough assumed the position, and, upon the retirement of Fairless in 1955, Blough became chairman of the board of directors and chief executive officer.

The world's largest steel-making enterprise and the producer of one-third of the nation's total steel capacity, U.S. Steel had total sales of $3.5 billion at the time of Blough's ascendancy. After mid-decade, however, U.S. Steel, along with the rest of the industry, was afflicted by a slowdown in orders for military hardware, autos, business construction and, after 1957, exports.

As chairman of the corporation, Blough supervised negotiations with the United Steel Workers of America (USW). In 1955, talks were held under the wage-reopening clause of a two-year pact signed in 1954. At midnight on June 30, steelworkers went on strike, but the next morning, Blough hastened to sign an agreement granting an average hourly wage increase of 15 cents. The contract also provided the union with protection against the unilateral introduction of labor-saving machinery by the company.

With the basic steel agreements due to expire in 1959, U.S. Steel conducted a massive public relations and advertising campaign that blamed the demands of the USW for inflation. The union, on the other hand, contended that the company enjoyed high profits as a result of several price increases since 1955, which outstripped by far increases in labor costs. The USW also insisted on a voice in determining the pace of technological change, since the company's closure of older plants in 1957 and 1958 resulted in layoffs for thousands of steel workers. Blough countered that the corporation had to hold the line on union demands in order to remain competitive.

The workers went out on a strike that lasted 116 days and required Eisenhower's intervention to settle. The contract, finally signed in January 1960, granted workers raises and other benefits costing 41 cents an hour over a 2½ year period. The benefits included increased and broadened pensions, continued supplemental unemployment benefits, and creation of a human relations research committee to study wage adjustment, job classification, incentive pay, and other problems. Blough maintained that the cost of the new wage package would be "well over one billion dollars."

In 1962, Blough engaged in a major confrontation with the Kennedy administration when he sought to increase steel prices. That year, the steel industry and the USW reached an agreement for a modest increase in wages, which pleased the Kennedy administration. Blough maintained that the cost of domestic labor was rising more rapidly than that of foreign producers. Moreover, the corporation's profits declined from $304.2 million in 1960 to $190.2 million in 1961. This, argued Blough, threatened the ability of the company to reinvest and to modernize. Blough therefore announced an increase of 3.5 percent in the price of steel. After a campaign of presidential pressure to roll back the price of steel, Inland Steel announced that it would not increase prices. Kaiser Steel also announced that it would not increase prices. Bethlehem Steel, the second largest producer in the country, then rescinded its price increase. U.S. Steel had no choice but to rescind its increase.

Blough retired from U.S. Steel in 1969. During his tenure as chairman of the board, his company's share of the sale of domestic steel declined from 30 percent to 25 percent. Moreover, imported steel increased to 16 percent of the market by 1968.

Immediately after leaving U.S. Steel, Blough returned to White and Case. He remained a partner in the firm until 1976. He died in Hawley, Pa., on October 8, 1985.

Boggs, J(ames) Caleb

(1909–1993) governor of Delaware

The product of an old, established Delaware family, Boggs was born in Cheswold, Del., on May 15, 1909. He received an A.B. degree from the University of Delaware in 1931 and an LL.B. from Georgetown University six years later. He set up law practice in Dover, Del., and later helped found the Wilmington firm of Logan, Duffy and Boggs. Following service in the Army during World War II, Boggs was elected to Congress as a Republican in 1946. On Capitol Hill, he took a stand against what he termed the "waste and duplication" of the Truman administration, which he thought was "drifting towards socialism." He won reelection twice.

In November 1952, Boggs defeated the Democratic incumbent, Elbert N. Carvel, to win election as Delaware's governor. He continued to maintain his position against the growth of federal power and increased spending. During his first year in office, Boggs signed a bill requiring all communists and members of organizations appearing on the attorney general's subversive list who lived in or passed through Delaware to register with the state police.

The law proved unenforceable. In 1953, Boggs attempted civil service reform but was blocked by the state legislature. Three years later, he had considerably more success in getting through a program of extensive executive and judicial reform, school consolidation, and increased salaries for teachers.

Boggs received national attention in 1954, when he requested that Delaware's Board of Education comply with the Supreme Court's Brown decision outlawing segregation in public schools. His action made Delaware the scene of the first of many confrontations over desegregation. Although integration proceeded smoothly in the northern, industrialized sector of the state, it met with stiff resistance in the southern section. In September Boggs was forced to intervene when a plan bringing 11 black children into an all-white school in Milford, Del., resulted in a much publicized boycott. He temporarily halted implementation of the plan and ordered the arrest of Bryant W. Bowles, self-styled founder and president of the National Association for the Advancement of White People, whom Boggs alleged had come to the state specifically to organize the boycott. The governor justified the arrest as being directed against "organized mob rule and mass hysteria," though the state supreme court subsequently declared Bowles innocent.

Boggs was reelected governor in 1956, and in 1959 he served as chairman of the U.S. Governors Conference. He won election to the U.S. Senate in 1960, where he compiled a generally conservative record, although he was a strong supporter of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In 1965, Boggs was appointed to the White House Conference on International Cooperation and in the same year joined Sen. MIKE MANSFIELD (D-Mont.) on a fact-finding tour of Asia, which resulted in a plea for a negotiated settlement in Vietnam. Boggs was defeated for reelection in 1972 and returned to his old law firm. He died in Wilmington, Del., on March 26, 1993.

Boggs, T(homas) Hale

The descendant of a colonial family, Boggs was born on February 15, 1914, in Long Beach, Miss. He received a law degree from Tulane University in 1937 and then entered private practice in New Orleans. In 1939, he helped form the People's League of Independent Voters, an organization of business and professional men established to combat the state's Democratic machine. In the 1940 Democratic House primary, Boggs ran successfully against the machine-backed incumbent and went on to win the general election. However, the former incumbent defeated him in the Democratic primary in 1942. Boggs joined the U.S. Naval Reserve in November 1943.

In 1946, Boggs was again elected to the House from New Orleans. A political protégé of the Democratic leader, Rep. SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), Boggs was appointed to the influential Ways and Means Committee. He became head of the panel's Subcommittee on Narcotics in 1951, and during that year, he successfully sponsored a bill to stiffen the penalties for violations of federal narcotics and marijuana laws. In January 1952, he lost the Louisiana Democratic gubernatorial primary.

A moderate southern Democrat, Boggs often broke with his more liberal party colleagues. In July 1953, he joined with conservatives on the Ways and Means Committee in an unsuccessful attempt to block an administration-sponsored effort to extend an excess-profits tax on corporations. Boggs also voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. In March 1959, as a member of the Joint Economic Committee, he dissented from a report of the panel's Democratic majority urging emphasis on the expansion of production and employment rather than the containment of inflation. In March 1960, Boggs voted with a majority on the Ways and Means Committee opposing the Forand bill, which would have provided medical care for the aged under Social Security.

The sugar industry was an important element of Louisiana's economy, and in March and April 1955, Boggs and Sen. ALLEN J. ELLENDER (D-La.) introduced a sugar quota bill intended to enlarge the domestic producers' share of excess market demand above estimated annual American consumption. A modified version of this measure became law in May 1956.

In 1957, Boggs became chairman of the Ways and Means Committee's Foreign Trade Policy Subcommittee, where he advocated liberal foreign trade programs. That December, he backed Eisenhower's request for a five-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements granting the president authority to cut tariffs by as much as 25 percent. In August 1958, Eisenhower signed a four-year extension bill permitting cuts up to 20 percent. Boggs's subcommittee began hearings on American investment in underdeveloped areas in December 1958. A month later, he introduced a bill to encourage investment in those regions by permitting investors to defer payment of U.S. corporate taxes on foreign earnings until the funds were returned to America. A modified version of this proposal passed the House in May 1960 but was rejected by the Senate Finance Committee. Another provision of the bill Boggs introduced in 1959 liberalized the terms by which U.S. firms with investments abroad could take credit for their foreign tax payments in computing their U.S. tax liability. That measure was introduced as a separate bill early in 1960. Sen. ALBERT GORE (D-Tenn.), a leading advocate of tax reform and an opponent of the foreign tax credit, denounced the proposal in May 1960 as an attempt to expand an already unjustified loophole. Nevertheless, the bill passed both chambers and was signed into law in September.

In 1962, Boggs succeeded Rep. CARL ALBERT (D-Okla.) as majority whip. During the mid-1960s his voting record became more liberal. He opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 but supported the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the Civil Rights Act of 1968. Boggs also voted for antipoverty legislation. In 1971, he became majority leader following the retirement of House Speaker JOHN McCORMACK (D-Mass.). Boggs was a passenger in a plane that disappeared over Alaska on October 16, 1972. The craft was not located, and Boggs was presumed to have died in a crash.

Bohlen, Charles E(ustis)

(1904–1974) ambassador to the Soviet Union, ambassador to the Philippines

The son of a well-to-do sportsman and a descendant of the first U.S. ambassador to France, Bohlen was born in Clayton, N.Y., on August 30, 1904. He was educated at Saint Paul's School and Harvard University. Two years after graduating from Harvard in 1927, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted as vice-consul in Prague. He remained there until 1931, when he was assigned to Paris as vice-consul and language officer. While in France, he took extensive courses in Russian history, language, and culture in preparation for a specialization in Soviet affairs. Upon the recommendation of William Bullitt, ambassador to the Soviet Union, Bohlen became part of the first America mission to the USSR in 1934. He served there intermittently until 1939, when he received a post to Tokyo. Bohlen was at the embassy during the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and, like the other members of the mission, was interned by the Japanese for six months after the attack. Upon his return to Washington, he became acting chief of the State Department's division of Eastern European affairs.

During World War II, Bohlen served as an adviser and chief interpreter at the Teheran Conference of 1943 and the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences of 1945. He also worked as liaison officer between the State Department and the White House. In 1947, Bohlen became personal adviser to Secretary of State George C. Marshall. Bohlen played an important role in developing the Marshall Plan and molding the Truman policy of containment of the Soviet Union. He became counselor of the Paris embassy in 1949. Two years later, he returned to Washington and served as an aide to JOHN FOSTER DULLES at the Japanese peace conference in San Francisco.

President Eisenhower nominated Bohlen as ambassador to the Soviet Union in 1953. Conservatives, led by Sens. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.) and PATRICK McCARRAN (D-Nev.), bitterly opposed the nomination. They claimed that Bohlen was too closely associated with Truman's foreign policy to represent the Republican administration. They also charged that FBI reports contained damaging information about Bohlen's family life. McCarthy demanded that the FBI files be made available to the Senate. After initially refusing, Eisenhower agreed to allow two senators to examine the files and report to the Senate. Although the senators were never able to reveal specific instances of disloyalty, their charges seriously jeopardized confirmation. For many individuals in the State Department, the Bohlen case became a test of the new Administration's willingness to defend the beleaguered department against McCarthy's continuing attacks.

At the confirmation hearings, Bohlen defended the Yalta agreements as the best that could have been achieved and refused to repudiate them. Dulles supported the appointment fully and denied that Bohlen had security problems. He conceded that the two men did not often agree on policy and specifically that they viewed the Yalta agreements in different lights. Nevertheless, he reminded the Foreign Relations Committee that as ambassador Bohlen would have little influence in policymaking. Eisenhower, too, defended the nomination, although he apparently had been asked by a high-ranking official, never identified, to withdraw it. McCarthy's attempt to prevent the appointment failed when several important conservatives, led by Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), rejected the Wisconsin senator's contention that Dulles had lied in defending Bohlen's security record. The Senate confirmed Bohlen in March 1953.

As ambassador, Bohlen's task was to inform the Kremlin of official U.S. positions and to gather as much information as possible about Soviet leadership and policy changes. During his tenure, he reported on the changes of leadership following Stalin's death in 1953 and on the Soviet reaction to the Suez Crisis and the Hungarian revolt of 1956. These reports often contained policy recommendations, but, according to Bohlen, Secretary of State Dulles rarely heeded them. In summing up his four years in the Soviet Union, the ambassador wrote, "I cannot say I accomplished much during my four years . . . nor can I think of any serious mistakes we made at the embassy."

In 1957, Dulles, apparently as a result of a commitment to appoint LEWELLYN THOMPSON ambassador to the Soviet Union, announced that Bohlen had decided to give up his position. Bohlen, who had not considered this, thought of resigning from the Foreign Service. Instead, he accepted a post as ambassador to the Philippines. Despite Bohlen's protestations, rumors persisted that he was being "exiled" to the Philippines because of policy disagreements with Dulles. During his tour, Bohlen settled Philippine war claims against the United States and unsuccessfully attempted to convince Congress to give the Philippines jurisdiction over the prosecution of crimes committed by U.S. military personnel off U.S. bases.

In 1959, Secretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER appointed Bohlen his special assistant for Soviet affairs. Herter dropped plans to make him a counselor or assistant secretary because he feared that conservative senators would oppose confirmation. As Herter's assistant, Bohlen was an adviser and interpreter at the abortive summit conference in May 1960.

During the 1960s, Bohlen served as a presidential adviser to both JOHN KENNEDY and LYNDON JOHNSON. He was named ambassador to France in 1962 and remained at that post until the end of 1967, when he was appointed deputy undersecretary of state for political affairs. Bohlen retired in January 1969 and died in Washington, D.C., on January 1, 1974.

Bolton, Frances P(ayne Bingham)

Born to one of Cleveland, Ohio's, oldest and wealthiest families, Frances Bingham was born on March 29, 1885. After marrying Chester C. Bolton, a steel executive, in 1907, she devoted both time and money to a variety of philanthropic enterprises, notably the Tuskegee Institute. With particular interest in nursing, Bolton persuaded the War Department, then headed by fellow Clevelander Newton D. Baker, to create the Army School of Nursing during World War I. Beginning in 1928, she participated in her husband's usually successful campaigns for the House. Upon her husband's death, Bolton ran as a Republican and won election to his seat in a special election in 1940.

One of the few women members of the House in the 1940s, Bolton fought for an end to discriminatory practices by the Armed Services. During World War II, she called for the desegregation, both by race and sex, of military nursing units. After the war, she argued for the inclusion of women in the Selective Service System in 1949.

Throughout her House career, Bolton served on the Foreign Affairs Committee. She led efforts that resulted in the restructuring of the committee's procedure. A frequent defender of the United Nations, she also advocated independence for colonial Africa in the late 1940s. Although a mild isolationist prior to Pearl Harbor, Bolton assumed more internationalist positions than those of most of her fellow Midwestern Republicans.

In February 1954, Bolton declined to join some GOP members of Congress in criticizing a plan—presented by Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES—for a conference that April at Geneva, which would have included a delegation from Communist China. Senate Majority Leader WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, JR. (R-Calif.) led an assault upon Dulles's qualified support for Communist China's representation at talks on Indochina and Korea. Bolton, Sen. WALTER F. GEORGE (D-Ga.), Reps. James P. Richards (D-S.C.), and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. (D-N.Y.) supported Dulles; they argued that China's presence at the discussions would not indicate American recognition of the Communist regime.

Bolton consistently supported foreign policy legislation favored by the White House. During the 84th Congress (1955–56), she voted for 93 percent of the foreign policy measures endorsed by the president, as measured by Congressional Quarterly. The average among Republicans in the House was 70 percent. She similarly led her fellow Republicans 79 percent to 56 percent in the 85th Congress (1957–58).

By the 1960s, Bolton was both the ranking woman representative and the ranking GOP member on the Foreign Affairs Committee. Her oldest son, Oliver P. Bolton, served three terms in the House from the nearby 11th District; they represented the only mother-son team in the lower chamber. Bolton encountered little opposition in winning reelection until 1968, when at age 83, she lost her seat due to redistricting. Bolton died in Lyndhurst, Ohio, on March 9, 1977.

Bonner, Herbert C(ovington)

Born in Washington, N.C., on May 16, 1891, Bonner worked as a salesman and a farmer before enlisting in the army during World War I. In 1924, he became secretary to Assemblyman Lindsay Warren. When Warren was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, Bonner accompanied him to Washington. In 1940, Bonner was elected as a Democrat to fill Warren's unexpired term, vacated when the Congressman became controller general. In Congress, Bonner represented a district in eastern North Carolina consisting of small towns and textile mills until his death in 1965. During the 1940s, he led a number of congressional investigations, including one into postwar profiteering and another on waste in military installations.

While on Capitol Hill, Bonner compiled a record as an opponent of labor and civil rights legislation. He voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. Bonner also opposed federally financed public housing and measures to aid education. A conservative on foreign policy, he voted against lower tariffs requested by President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and most foreign aid bills except those specifically designed to curb communist aggression. Bonner was a strong anticommunist and supported measures, such as the Eisenhower Doctrine, that were designed to give the president the power to act swiftly against communist aggression throughout the world.

Bonner's major concern in Congress was the U.S. maritime industry. As chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, he criticized what he thought were excessive union demands and the failure of management to modernize shipping. He also pleaded for increased federal aid to the industry. During 1956, Bonner was responsible for defeating amendments to the "50-50 law." This law, supported by the industry, required that at least half of all agricultural surpluses shipped as foreign aid be moved in American ships. In February, Bonner's committee issued a report concluding that the law did not impair the success of the aid program and was "vitally necessary" to American shipping.

Although a vocal supporter of the construction of a nuclear-powered merchant vessel, he objected to Eisenhower's proposal that the vessel be used as a "peace ship," carrying "practical knowledge of the usefulness of [atomic] science." Bonner called the president's plan "an international side-show, a Mississippi River Showboat" and proposed development of a second "practical" vessel. The final bill, signed into law in July 1956, combined Eisenhower's and Bonner's proposals. The first nuclear ship, the Savannah, was launched in 1962.

During the 1960s, Bonner pushed for compulsory arbitration in the shipping industry and increased federal subsidies for shipbuilding. Bonner died in Washington, D.C., on November 7, 1965.

Boulware, Lemuel (Ricketts)

(1895–1990) vice-president in charge of employee, community, and union relations, General Electric Company

Born on June 3, 1895, in Springfield, Ky., Boulware graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1916. He taught business administration briefly before embarking on a career as an industrial executive. He served as an infantry captain in World War I. During World War II, he joined the War Production Board as an operations vice chairman and met CHARLES E. WILSON of the General Electric Co. (GE). When Wilson became president of GE after the war, he brought Boulware into the company.

GE's relations with the United Electrical Workers had been relatively amicable from the mid-1930s through the war years. After the union won a major victory through a strike in 1946, however, the company sought to restrict future union gains by adopting a firmer approach toward bargaining. Boulware was charged with devising an aggressive employee-relations policy, which came to be known as "Boulwarism" after its inauguration in 1947. GE proceeded to carry out what its opponents called one of the best-financed, most highly organized, and longest antiunion campaigns in corporate history.

The principal element in the Boulware formula was what the company called "truthful offers." In an effort to end what Boulware described as "eastern bazaar haggling" and to deny unions the opportunity to claim that they had forced the company to raise its contract offers, GE put on the bargaining table everything it was willing to give. Under Boulware, GE listened closely to union demands, examined the wages and working conditions at competitor companies, conducted extensive research on all issues, and put forward a "fair, firm offer," with nothing withheld for future negotiations. As a result, the company's first offer was usually its last. Unions charged that GE with bargaining by ultimatum. However, Boulware denied that the company attempted to drive a bargain less favorable to its employees than could be achieved by the more conventional negotiating approach used by most large businesses.

Boulwarism also featured the extensive use of advertising and mass-marketing techniques. Fearing that unless the company communicated its proposals by every means available, employees and the public would learn only the unions' version of events, GE produced regular plant bulletins, sent management representatives to public gatherings, and placed full-page advertisements in the press of all communities in which its plans were located. With the aid of a large research staff, Boulware applied the techniques of market research to merchandise GE's "product"—its contract offers—on all fronts in order to make the most effective "sale" to employees and local communities.

Although several unions competed for jurisdiction over GE workers after 1949, the International Union of Electrical Workers (IUE) was the largest by far, and its president, JAMES CAREY, was GE's principal adversary during the 1950s. At the yearly contract rounds between 1950 and 1955, Carey usually failed to move the company from its initial bargaining position. He also failed to gain his membership's support for a strike in the face of effective publicity by the company. As a result, the IUE repeatedly ended up accepting GE's offer long after the expiration of the previous year's contract.

In 1955, with market forecasters predicting a long-term boom, GE planned new investments in plant, equipment, manpower, and research and prepared to expand into the fields of atomic power and computers. In a temporary departure from Boulwarism, the company also offered a five-year contract in 1955, including quarterly cost-of-living adjustments, a comprehensive medical insurance program, and an informal pledge not to launch any antiunion campaigns during the contract's annual escape periods. In 1956, Boulware became vice president for employee and public relations. In 1958, the agreement reached in 1955 was renegotiated after the recession of 1957 severely affected

GE's utility apparatus, industrial equipment, and appliance departments. Talks ended in a stalemate when the company refused the IUE's demands for supplemental unemployment benefits and joint union-management automation committees.

Boulwarism was revived after 1958, as GE prepared for a confrontation with the electrical workers union. The IUE went out on strike in 1960. The company responded with company-organized back-to-work movements, widely-publicized plant openings, and occasional use of police force. After three weeks, the IUE called off the strike. The labor editor of the New York Times, A. H. Raskin, called it "the worst setback any union has received in a nationwide strike since World War II."

Boulware retired in 1961. He published two books, one of which defended his approach to labor relations (The Truth about Boulwarism, 1969). Boulware died in Delray Beach, Fla., on November 7, 1990.

Bowie, Robert R(ichardson)

(1909–) director of policy planning, Department of State; assistant secretary of state for policy planning
Born on August 24, 1909, in Baltimore, Md., Bowie graduated from Princeton in 1931, and, after receiving a law degree from Harvard three years later, returned to Baltimore to begin legal practice. He served as assistant director of the Maryland Legislative Council from 1940 to 1941 and as assistant attorney general of Maryland from 1941 to 1942. After service in the Army during World War II, Bowie became a professor of law at Harvard, where he remained intermittently until 1955. During the Truman administration, he was special assistant to the deputy military governor of Germany from 1945 to 1946 and served as director of the task force of the Hoover Commission on the Reorganization of the Federal Government in 1948. Bowie returned to Germany as general counsel and special adviser to the U.S. high commissioner in 1950 and 1951.

In 1953, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES appointed Bowie director of policy planning in the State Department. Dulles frequently consulted Bowie, who often opposed the secretary's uncompromising anticommunism. Yet, despite Dulles's respect for him, Bowie never exerted much influence over the secretary, and the planning staff wielded far less power than it had during the Truman administration.

At a series of conferences held in the spring and fall of 1953, Bowie helped formulate the administration's policy of "massive retaliation." Under this plan, the United States relied on strategic nuclear weapons rather than conventional warfare to prevent Soviet expansion and guard against a nuclear attack by the Soviets. The department reiterated its support for "containment" of communism in eastern Europe and upheld the use of nuclear weapons to prevent communist subversion in nonaligned nations. However, the administration rejected suggestions of "liberating" eastern Europe by force.

Bowie criticized Dulles's belligerent policy regarding Quemoy and Matsu in the spring of 1954 and disliked the secretary's willingness to discuss possible use of nuclear weapons against Communist China. Relying heavily on information supplied him by Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Adm. ARTHUR RADFORD, Dulles claimed that tactical nuclear weapons could "destroy military targets without endangering unrelated civilian centers." Astonished by Dulles's statements, Bowie gave him Central Intelligence Agency estimates that civilian casualties on the Chinese mainland would reach 12 to 14 million, even if the United States dropped tactical atomic bombs on only military targets.

In August 1955, President Eisenhower appointed Bowie assistant secretary of state for policy planning. The appointment was opposed by Republican Senate Policy Committee Chairman STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.), who accused Bowie of favoring Communist China's admission to the UN. However, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved Bowie after he swore that he had never advocated Communist China's replacement of Taiwan in the organization. The Senate confirmed Bowie's appointment in February 1956. He was involved in the decision not to build the Aswan Dam.

Following his retirement from the State Department in May 1957, Bowie returned to Harvard, where he taught international relations. He was director of the Harvard Center for International Affairs from 1957 to 1972 and Clarence Dillon Professor of International Affairs from 1972 until his retirement in 1980. In 1960, Bowie wrote a report for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in which he argued that the United States should remain vigilant with respect to the Soviet Union, despite an apparent thaw in relations between the two countries and rising living standards in the Soviet Union that he thought might lead the Soviets to an accommodation with the United States. The report also advocated looking beyond the immediate points of conflict with the USSR and recommended a less direct competition between the two countries for the allegiance of uncommitted nations. In 1998, Bowie coauthored, with Richard H. Immerman, Waging Peace: How Eisenhower Shaped an Enduring Cold War Strategy.

While at Harvard, Bowie continued to serve the government. He was counselor to the State Department from 1966 to 1968 and served as deputy director at national intelligence for the CIA from 1977 to 1979. He is currently Dillon Professor Emeritus at Harvard.

Bowles, Chester

The scion of a well-to-do Yankee family, Bowles was born on April 5, 1901, in Springfield, Mass. He graduated from Yale University in 1924 and then worked for a short time as a journalist for his hometown newspaper, the Springfield Republican. In 1925, he moved to New York to accept a position as a copywriter in an advertising agency. Four years later, he and WILLIAM BENTON founded their own agency, which prospered despite, or even perhaps because of, the depression.

With the outbreak of World War II, Bowles administered Connecticut's rationing program. His success impressed President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who invited him to Washington to serve as director of the Office of Price Administration in 1943. President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him Director of economic stabilization in 1945. Bowles also represented the United States at the first conference of the United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization in 1946 and served as special assistant to UN Secretary General Trygve Lie.

In 1948, Bowles was elected governor of Connecticut. Bowles lost his bid for reelection in 1950, but President Truman named him ambassador to India the following year. There he defended the neutralist policies of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru against criticism by American conservatives who equated neutralism with procommunism. Bowles joined other liberals in urging a shift from military to economic aid. He retired from government service at the end of the Truman administration.

During the early years of the Eisenhower administration, Bowles wrote numerous articles and books, including The New Dimensions of Peace (1953), Africa's Challenge to America (1956), and Ideas, People and Peace (1958), which established his reputation as a leading critic of American policy toward developing nations, particularly in the area of foreign aid. Bowles deplored the refusal of colonial powers to grant their territories independence. This, he maintained, led to discontent, which proved a fertile ground for communist subversion. He argued that foreign aid provided America's best deterrent against the spread of communism. Bowles charged that the Eisenhower administration's foreign aid program was stingy and its emphasis on military aid misguided. The small amount of foreign aid offered, he stated, was designed not to improve living standards but to gain support for the United States in the United Nations and win a popularity contest with the Soviet Union. Quite often the programs failed to meet such expectations. This, in turn, disillusioned Congress, which then slashed foreign aid. Bowles also criticized State Department officials for their ignorance of the cultures and languages of developing countries.

At a time when many liberals, defensive about their past connections with the Left, were becoming cold warriors, Bowles stood apart from them. He downplayed the Soviet threat and stressed the dangers of poverty and hunger. However, his plans for a successful foreign aid program did have some anti-Soviet overtones.

In 1958, Bowles began a political comeback by seeking the Democratic nomination for a Senate seat from Connecticut. Ironically, his old advertising partner, WILLIAM BENTON, who previously served in the Senate, entered the race along with Rep. THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.). Benton had the backing of the state party chairman, John Bailey, and Gov. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF, who feared that Bowles's controversial stands on foreign policy would weaken the ticket that he headed. At the party's convention in June, Benton and Bowles split the liberal vote, permitting Dodd to win the nomination. Bowles then ran for a House seat in his traditionally Republican home district and won by a large margin. During his one term in Congress, he lobbied for improvements in foreign-aid programs.

In 1959, many liberals mentioned Bowles as a dark-horse candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. However, his controversial stands limited his appeal. In late 1959, presidential aspirant Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) elicited Bowles's support in the belief that his endorsement would aid him in a struggle with ADLAI STEVENSON. Bowles did endorse Kennedy, but his refusal to campaign for the senator against his old friend, Sen. HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.), alienated many Kennedy supporters. Bowles served as Kennedy's foreign policy adviser during the general election campaign in 1960.

When Kennedy became president, Bowles was appointed undersecretary of state. As a result of clashes with Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY and many powerful members of the State Department and Congress, Bowles was forced to resign in November 1961. Kennedy then appointed him special adviser on Asian, African, and Latin American affairs. In December 1962, Bowles once again became ambassador to India. During the 1960s, Bowles lobbied for increased foreign aid for that nation but had little success in convincing presidents Kennedy and Johnson to follow his recommendations. Bowles retired in 1969 and returned to Connecticut. He lived there until his death in Essex, Conn., on May 25, 1986.

Braden, Spruille

(1894–1978) chairman, Crime Committee of Greater New York

Born on March 13, 1894, in Elkhorn, Mont., into a mining family—his father founded the Braden Copper Co.—Braden studied mining engineering at Yale University. After receiving a Ph.D. in 1914, Braden worked in a number of South American mining ventures and married the daughter of a prominent Chilean physician. During the 1920s, he advised South American governments in loan negotiations, participated in inter-American financial conferences, and served as an official of several large corporations.

In 1933, he was appointed U.S. delegate to the Seventh International Conference of American States. From 1935 to 1939, he headed the U.S. team at the Chaco Peace Conference, where he negotiated the settlement of the war between Bolivia and Paraguay. After serving as ambassador to Colombia from 1939 to 1942, he then became ambassador to Cuba. In 1945, he was made ambassador to Argentina and that same year was promoted to assistant secretary of state for American republic affairs. During the postwar period, Braden recommended a "hard-line" policy against all forms of dictatorship. His widely publicized efforts to press Argentine dictator Juan Domingo Perón to restore constitutional liberties, deliver over to the United States Nazi agents hiding in Argentina, and abide by the provisions of inter-American defense commitments disturbed State Department officials eager to restore friendly relations with Perón's government. Braden also made enemies in the Pentagon with his opposition to large military aid programs to Latin American nations, arguing that such programs wasted U.S. taxpayers' money and encouraged military adventurism among the Latins. "Bradenism" became a term that described a heavy-handed approach to negotiating with Latin American officials.

Braden left government service in July 1947, believing that his anticommunist, antifascist policies had been sabotaged by pro-communist, incompetent employees of the State Department. He then settled in New York City and worked as a lecturer and as a consultant to a number of large corporations, including Anaconda Copper, American Foreign Power, Lone Star Cement, and United Fruit. In February 1949, Braden became president of the American Arbitration Association.

Reacting to the growing concern over the activities of organized crime and corruption in government, a group of prominent citizens formed the New York City Anti-Crime Committee in January 1951. They asked Braden to act as the committee's unpaid chairman. Supported by the municipal government, the Anti-Crime Committee concentrated its investigations on organized crime's infiltration into labor, business, and politics. In February 1953, the panel issued its first report, citing evidence of organized crime's influence in the city's food, garment-trucking, and building industries. The committee's investigation of crime on the waterfront was instrumental in influencing the American Federation of Labor to expel the International Longshoremen's Association and to set up a new union in September 1953. Organized crime's role on the docks became a national issue, and the situation in the port of New York was dramatized in the successful film, On the Waterfront (1954). In July 1955, Braden warned that racketeers planned to take over the trucking industry and strongly criticized Teamsters president DAVID BECK for failure to take action against his vice president, JAMES HOFFA. The Anti-Crime Committee suspended its operations in December 1956 for lack of funds. Braden, however, was satisfied with the committee's work and believed that it had encouraged the public to demand more vigorous prosecution of official corruption.

During the 1950s, Braden was closely identified with some of the most right-wing elements in public life. In November 1954, he helped organize "10 Million Americans Mobilizing for Justice," an organization opposed to the Senate's proposed censure of Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Braden also cooperated with the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee's investigations into communist subversion in the U.S. government. In December 1953, he told the subcommittee that communism could not be eliminated from Latin America until "insidious groups" and "bad characters" were removed from the State Department. He asserted that the official actions of Alger Hiss were "down the communist line" and noted that his own reports warning of communism were missing from the State Department's files. Testifying before the subcommittee again in November 1954, Braden stated that pro-communists were apparently still influencing State Department policy.

Braden spoke out strongly against the government of Guatemala's president, Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, and urged the new Eisenhower administration to take action against it. In a widely reported talk to a symposium at Dartmouth College in March 1953, he criticized President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for failing to intervene in Guatemala to prevent what Braden described as a communist takeover. In subsequent years, Braden continued to speak out publicly on foreign affairs. He defended U.S. private investments in Latin America, arguing that, overall they helped rather than exploited the Latin American people. In addition, he believed that the United States had the responsibility to intervene in nations of the Western Hemisphere to protect U.S. businesses and to suppress communism. Finally, Braden was a leading opponent of American foreign aid programs. In June 1957, he testified against the Eisenhower administration's foreign aid package before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Braden published his memoirs, Diplomats and Demagogues, in 1998. He died in Los Angeles on January 10, 1978.

Braun, Wernher von

(1912–1977) director, Guided Missile Development Division, Redstone Arsenal; director, Development Division, Army Ballistic Missile Agency

Born to an aristocratic East Prussian family on March 23, 1912, in Wirsitz, Germany (now Wyrzysk, Poland), von Braun attended the French Gymnasium in Berlin (where his family moved after Wirsitz became part of Poland in 1920 as a result of the Treaty of Versailles). As a boy, he developed an interest in astronomy and rocketry. After attending secondary school near Weimar, he did his undergraduate work at Berlin's Charlottenburg Institute of Technology. Von Braun served as a volunteer assistant to Professor Hermann Oberth, a pioneer in rocketry, and joined the Verein für Raumschiffahrt (Spaceflight Society). From 1931 to 1932, von Braun took part in experiments with liquid-fueled rockets. Early on, he came to the recognition that the development of rocketry and space flight would cost huge amounts of money that only a government could provide. He also concluded that it was unlikely that any government would invest such an amount for purely scientific purposes. Von Braun signed a contract with army ordinance in 1932 and became technical director of the German army's rocket experiment station. While working for the army, he earned a doctorate from the University of Berlin in 1934. Von Braun and his team initially developed three series of rockets, the A-1, A-2, and A-3. Needing a larger facility, von Braun selected Peenemünde as the location for a new facility dedicated to the development of rocket-propelled weapons and aircraft for the German army and air force. By 1943, the facility employed 1,950 scientists, engineers, and technicians. The team at Peenemünde developed the V-1, a pilotless flying bomb, and the A-4 (later renamed the V-2), a large ballistic missile.

The V-2 made its first successful flight in October 1942. After the Royal Air Force bombed the facility at Peenemünde in August 1943, manufacture of the missiles moved to an underground facility in the Harz Mountains. The first V-2 was launched against England in September 1944. From 1943 to the end of the war, approximately 60,000 slave laborers worked at the underground facility; roughly 20,000 of them died. More people died building the V-2 than died from its use as a weapon.

The nature and extent of von Braun's commitment to the Nazi regime remain uncertain. He joined the Nazi Party in 1937 and accepted a commission in the SS in 1940. Heinrich Himmler promoted him three times, and von Braun became a major in the SS in June 1943. The Gestapo arrested him in 1944 and charged him with placing his commitment to space travel above the development of an effective weapon. He was released after two weeks because he was essential to the V-2 program. Although he had no direct administrative responsibility for the supervision of slave labor, he accepted the use of slave labor at Peenemünde and certainly was aware of the horrific treatment of the laborers at Nordhausen.

In 1945, von Braun and other members of his team fled the advancing Soviet army and headed for central Germany, where they surrendered to American forces. He later said he did this because the United States seemed more likely to support his research and because "the next time, I wanted to be on the winning side." The Americans, on the other hand, wanted to gain access to German advances in rocketry. Von Braun signed a contract with the U.S. Army and, together with 119 scientists and engineers who had worked with him in Germany, flew to the United States in September 1945.

Von Braun and his group of German scientists initially were sent to Fort Bliss, Tex., where they taught the army to handle captured V-2s. They also continued to work on the development of new missiles for research and military uses. In 1950, the army transferred von Braun's team and the Army Ordnance Guided Missile Center to the Redstone Arsenal in Huntsville, Ala. Von Braun became technical director and then chief of the Guided Missile Development Division.

During the Korean War, his group was directed to develop a surface-to-surface ballistic missile with a 500-mile range. The rocket, named the Redstone, had a shorter range than expected, but it laid the technical base for future developments in rocketry. The Redstone, which was capable of carrying a nuclear warhead, was successfully tested in August 1953. The missile became part of the U.S. Army's arsenal in 1958.

During the years when he worked on the Redstone, von Braun also became the leading advocate of space flight in the United States. He helped develop a series of articles on the subject for Colliers titled "Man Will Conquer Space Soon!" and appeared on camera for three episodes of the Disneyland television show devoted to travel in space. In numerous television appearances and in popular books he wrote or cowrote, von Braun pressed the case for space exploration. He became a naturalized American citizen in 1955.

In 1955, von Braun's team began elaborating on the Redstone to devise rockets capable of the higher speeds needed for intermediate range ballistic missiles (IRBMs). The result of this work was the Jupiter, which consisted of a Redstone with two additional stages. To attain the carrier capabilities needed to place a satellite in orbit, von Braun added a fourth stage, creating the Juno 1.

In February 1956, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency (ABMA) was established, incorporating the Redstone Arsenal's Guided Missile Division. Von Braun became director of the ABMA under the military command of General John B. Medaris. With the navy working on its own Polaris missile and the Vanguard rocket and the air force authorized to develop the Intercontinental Ballistic Missile, the ABMA was restricted to work on IRBMs and limited feasibility studies of missiles with greater ranges.

As had been the case in Germany, von Braun's primary efforts focused on the development of rockets as weaponry. However, he advocated the use of rockets for space exploration well before Soviet advances in the field convinced American officials of the importance of a space program. In 1951, von Braun proposed that the United States develop a doughnut-shaped space station, and, in Mars Project, published in 1952, he envisioned the eventual construction of an interplanetary space fleet. In 1955, he pointed out that, with a few relatively minor alterations, a Redstone missile could carry a small craft into orbit around the earth. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, however, wanted to demonstrate America's peaceful intentions in space, and he announced that the navy's Vanguard rocket, which was based on the Viking (a scientific research rocket) would carry the first U.S. satellite. He preferred not to have the Redstone or Jupiter missiles, which had been designed to carry nuclear payloads, launch the satellite.

In April 1957, von Braun and Medaris proposed to the Defense Department's Research and Development Council a schedule for ABMA to use Jupiter missiles to launch satellites beginning that September. The Council initially rejected the proposal, but, things changed after the Soviet Union placed its Sputnik satellite into orbit in October 1957. The day after the Soviets launched Sputnik, Secretary of Defense NEIL McELROY went to Huntsville, where von Braun told him that the United States could launch a satellite within 90 days. Von Braun received instructions to prepare to launch a satellite with a Jupiter rocket as a backup to the navy's effort. After the Vanguard exploded on the launchpad on December 6, a modified Jupiter rocket launched Explorer I, the first U.S. satellite, into orbit on January 31, 1958.

During testimony before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee in December 1957, von Braun proposed that the United States establish a national space agency with a $1.5 billion annual budget. Such an agency, he told the subcommittee, could have "a man orbiting the earth on a returnable basis" within five years and could produce a manned space station in 10 years. President Eisenhower endorsed the plan in the following spring. Congress passed a law creating the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), independent of the Defense Department, in July 1958. The army turned the Redstone Arsenal's rocket program over to the newly created NASA. Von Braun became director of NASA's facility in Huntsville, renamed the George C. Marshall Flight Center, in 1960.

In the early 1960s, von Braun played a large role in the U.S. space program. The first two Americans in space, Alan B. Shepard and Virgil I. Grissom, rode in capsules powered by Redstone launchers. Von Braun oversaw the development of the large Saturn rocket used by the Apollo missions. He was a leading advocate of the position that manned flight to the moon should be the focus for the American space program, and he participated in much of the decision making surrounding the Apollo missions. A frequent spokesman for NASA, his books and articles helped stimulate national interest in the space program. Von Braun served as the director of the Marshall Center until 1970 and moved to Washington, D.C., as associate director of NASA for two more years. He left the agency in 1972 to become vice president of engineering and development at Fairchild Industries. Von Braun died in Alexandria, Virginia, on June 16, 1977.

Brennan, William J(oseph), Jr.

The son of Irish immigrants, Brennan was born on April 25, 1906, in Newark, N.J. He received a B.S. from the Wharton School of Finance of the University of Pennsylvania in 1928. He earned a degree from Harvard law school in 1931, and then joined the Newark law firm of Pitney, Harbin, and Skinner, where he became a partner in 1937 and a specialist in labor law. A leader of a group of young attorneys who successfully promoted reform and streamlining of the New Jersey judicial system, Brennan was named a judge on the state Superior Court in 1949. The next year, Governor Alfred E. Driscoll appointed Brennan to the Appellate Division of the Superior Court. In 1952, Driscoll appointed Brennan to the New Jersey Supreme Court.

President Eisenhower announced Brennan's appointment to the U.S. Supreme Court to replace retiring Justice SHERMAN MINTON on September 29, 1956. Although a Democrat, Brennan had not been politically active, and he had the judicial experience and high standing within the legal profession that Eisenhower wanted in a Supreme Court candidate. Brennan began serving on the Court under a recess appointment on October 16. The Senate confirmed his nomination on March 19, 1957. Only Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), whose methods Brennan had criticized in two speeches in the mid-1950s, voted against him.

By the end of his first term on the Court, Brennan had clearly aligned himself with the liberals on the bench. In June 1957, his majority opinion in the highly controversial Jencks case held, that in federal criminal trials, the government must let the defense examine relevant reports previously made to the government by prosecution witnesses. On the same day, Brennan's opinion for the Court in the E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. case held that DuPont's ownership of 23 percent of General Motors stock had given it an illegal advantage when competing for sales of automotive finishes and fabrics to GM. Brennan voted with the majority in several cases handed down on June 17, 1957, a date critics referred to as "Red Monday." In Yates v. U.S., the Court held that, while advocating and teaching a course of action designed to overthrow the government could be punished, advocating or teaching such a course of action as an "abstract doctrine" could not. This reversed the convictions of the top leaders of the communist party in California and effectively halted prosecutions under the Smith Act. The second decision, Service v. Dulles, ruled that, since the State Department had been unable to find formal grounds for dismissing JOHN STEWART SERVICE, it could not dismiss him because top officials wished to do so. In Watkins v. U.S., the Court held that congressional investigations had to be related to an explicit legislative purpose; speaking for the majority, Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote, "There is no Congressional power to expose for the sake of exposure."

Though he had joined the Court's libertarian wing in his votes, Brennan remained largely independent of it in his judicial philosophy. Unlike Justice HUGO BLACK, for example, Brennan did not consider First Amendment guarantees absolute but believed that these rights must be balanced against government interests. He insisted, however, that only a real and very substantial government need justified any curtailment of individual rights and thus usually favored the individual in loyalty-security cases. In June 1958, for example, Brennan dissented when the majority upheld the dismissal of municipal employees in Philadelphia and New York because they had refused to answer questions from superiors about their political activities. The justice declared that there had been no demonstration in either suit of a government security interest sufficient to justify the denial of the appellants' free speech rights. Brennan again dissented in two cases, decided a year later, in which the majority sustained the contempt convictions of witnesses who had failed to provide information during congressional and state investigations into possible subversion. The record in both cases, he asserted, showed the investigations had no valid legislative purpose but only the impermissible goal of exposure for exposure's sake.

Brennan's rejection of Black's absolutist reading of the First Amendment came to the fore in cases dealing with the law of obscenity, and in this area, Brennan emerged as the primary spokesman for the Court. In Roth v. U.S. (1957), Brennan, writing for the majority, declared that "obscenity is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech or press." This led him to define obscenity, which he characterized as material "which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interests." Brennan's test for obscenity was "whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interests." Moreover, any idea having "the slightest redeeming social importance" could claim protection of the First Amendment. Hugo Black and WILLIAM DOUGLAS dissented. Writing for the dissenters, Douglas argued that speech or writing might be suppressed only when they amounted to conduct or were "so closely brigaded with illegal actions as to be an inescapable part of it." For two decades after Roth, the Court struggled unsuccessfully to arrive at a working definition of obscenity.

In Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964), Brennan emphasized an element he had established as part of the Roth test. For material to be obscene, prosecutors had to establish that it was utterly without redeeming social importance. Brennan again spoke for the majority in a case upholding the conviction of a publisher for violating federal postal censorship laws (Ginzburg v. U.S., 1966). In Memoirs v. Massachusetts (1966), Brennan's lead opinion held that for material to be found obscene, all elements of the Roth test had to "coalesce." Brennan consistently attempted to protect art while permitting the banning of obscenity. In 1973, with four Nixon appointments on the Court, Chief Justice WARREN BURGER revised the Roth test. Burger ruled that, in order to be found obscene, material did not need to be "utterly without redeeming social value"; it needed only to lack "serious artistic, political, or scientific value" (Miller v. California). Brennan entered a long dissent in which he asserted that the Court had failed to reach a workable definition of obscenity and that failure "has certainly taught that the outright suppression of obscenity cannot be reconciled with the fundamental principles of the First and Fourteenth Amendments."

In criminal rights cases, Brennan generally adopted a liberal position. He favored extending the right to counsel in state court criminal cases, and he voted in March 1960 to overturn the espionage conviction of Soviet Col. Rudolf I. Abel because he believed the evidence used against Abel had been illegally obtained. In March 1959, however, Brennan was part of a majority in two cases that decided that an individual could be tried in both federal and state courts for the same offense without violating the prohibition against double jeopardy.

During the heyday of the Warren Court in the 1960s, Brennan became an even more staunch liberal who believed the judiciary was constitutionally vested with the job of protecting the integrity and privacy of the individual from unnecessary interference by the government. He wrote significant opinions for the Court in cases involving reapportionment, freedom of the press, and the Fourteenth Amendment. Such decisions won him a reputation as a justice who was firmly committed to individual civil liberties and to the guarantees of procedural due process.

Brennan served long enough to see the Court take a more conservative direction in the 1980s. While he had often functioned behind the scenes as the architect who constructed majorities during the Warren era, Brennan later became more outspoken in his liberal views and his criticism of the direction of the Court. He retired from the Court in 1990 and died in Arlington, Va., on July 24, 1997. In his 34 years on the Court, Brennan wrote 533 majority opinions, 694 dissents, and 346 concurring opinions. Many of his dissents came during the later part of his career, as did most of the public attention he attracted. His greatest influence, however, came as the point man for the Warren Court.

Brewster, Frank W.

(1898–1996) vice president, International Brotherhood of Teamsters

Born in Seattle, Wash., in 1898, Brewster was the son of a postman. He got his first job in 1913 driving a dray team. After serving two years in the army during and after World War I, he became recording secretary of his Teamsters Union local. When the Western Conference of Teamsters was formed in 1937, Brewster became its secretary. He succeeded DAVE BECK as president of the organization in 1953. During 1956, Brewster was involved in a dispute with Beck, then president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT), and JAMES R. HOFFA, a vice president, over a mutual aid pact between the Teamsters and the International Longshoremen's Association. Beck and Hoffa favored the pact. Brewster, however, wanted no part of the "racketeering and communism of the longshore unions."

During the opening months of 1957, the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee probed charges of racketeering and illegal use of union funds in the IBT. Over a three-month period, subcommittee counsel ROBERT F. KENNEDY revealed evidence that Brewster had engaged in a variety of illegal activities. Brewster was charged with having used union funds to pay his personal bills (including several for maintenance of his racing stable and traveling expenses for his jockey). Testimony also revealed Brewster's links to organized crime.

Brewster initially refused to testify before the subcommittee and was cited for contempt of Congress in February. The following month, he appeared before the panel. He swore that he had “never conspired” to engage in any racket and knew of no “official or employee of the Teamsters who [had].” Brewster also denied any involvement with organized crime. Finally, he refused to admit that he had used union funds to pay personal bills. He acknowledged, however, that he had ordered his secretary to spend union money for plane tickets for his jockey. Brewster said he had intended to pay it back—although he had not yet done so.

In March, officials of the Western Conference gave Brewster a vote of confidence. They charged that the Senate investigation was being used by employers to prevent unions from obtaining the best possible hours, wages, and working conditions. Brewster was convicted of contempt of Congress in June 1957. The conviction was reversed in April 1958, when an appeals court ruled that the Senate committee had exceeded its jurisdiction in investigating rackets. In June, Brewster was deposed as head of the Western Conference in a power struggle with Jimmy Hoffa. After that, he served as president of Joint Council 28, which represented 46 Teamsters locals in Washington state until 1964. Upon his retirement, Brewster moved to Cathedral City, Calif., where he lived until his death in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on November 15, 1996.

Bricker, John W(illiam)

(1893–1986) U.S. senator; chairman, Senate Commerce Committee

John W. Bricker was born on September 6, 1893, in rural Madison Co., Ohio. He grew up there and received a B.A. from Ohio State University in 1916. During World War I, he served as an army chaplain. Bricker returned to Ohio State and earned a law degree in 1920. He then held several local elective offices as a Republican. He won election as state attorney general in 1932 but lost his bid for reelection. Bricker was elected governor in 1938. A white-maned, handsome man, an effective speaker, and an efficient administrator, “Honest John” won reelection in 1940 and 1942 by wide margins. After a brief try for the Republican presidential nomination in 1944, Bricker agreed to run for vice president. The GOP ticket lost in November. Two years later, Bricker won election to the U.S. Senate. There, he stood with the party’s conservative “Old Guard.” In 1952, as in 1940 and 1948, Bricker backed his fellow Ohioan, Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), for the Republican presidential nomination. Running for reelection in 1952, Bricker defeated the Democratic nominee, MICHAEL V. D’SALLE, by a comfortable margin.

Few members of the Old Guard created more problems for the Eisenhower administration than Bricker did between 1953 and 1954. In March 1953, he joined conservative Republicans voting against confirmation of CHARLES E. BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union. Bricker also initiated efforts to cut the administration’s foreign-aid requests. In January 1954, he opposed funding for the Saint Lawrence Seaway, despite its expected benefits to Ohio’s ports on Lake Erie. That December, he voted against the censure, quietly sought by the White House, of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.).

Yet no position more aggravated Eisenhower than did Bricker’s sponsorship of an amendment to restrict the federal government’s treaty-making powers. Bricker had advocated such a proposal since the Truman administration. As reported by the Judiciary Committee in June 1953, the Bricker amendment first voided any provision of treaties that conflicted with the Constitution. Second, it stipulated that “a treaty shall become effective as internal law in the United States only through legislation which would be valid in the absence of a treaty.” Known as the “which clause,” this section raised the possibility that a single state could nullify an international compact. More important, the amendment delimited Congress’s powers. Because of a Supreme Court ruling in 1920, Congress appeared empowered to extend its authority over states in enacting social legislation whenever it was carrying out the obligations of a treaty. Bricker’s article would have prevented Congress from passing laws on the basis of that precedent. Finally, the amendment made all executive understandings with foreign powers subject to Senate ratification.

Bricker and other Republican nationalists had condemned Franklin D. Roosevelt’s secret agreements with the Soviet Union during World War II. Bricker and others cited undisclosed, undebated understandings that accepted Soviet expansion into Eastern Europe immediately after the war. The Ohioan had long been a foe of those he called "One Worlders," generally liberal easterners like ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, who promoted international agreements in social and economic policy. Repeatedly, Bricker worked against American funding of the UN's International Labor Organization or its International Atomic Energy Commission. The UN's Covenant on Human Rights particularly incensed Bricker. This covenant, under negotiation between 1948 and 1954, included provisions that suspended such rights as freedom of speech during times of national emergency.

The fight for the Bricker amendment quickly evolved into a mass crusade. Many associations had long advocated a clarification of the statutory effect of treaties and world organizations upon domestic law. Others wanted to restrict the ability of presidents to make international agreements. The Republican platform in 1952 had endorsed Bricker's amendment, as had Taft, the American Bar Association (ABA), and especially its past president, Frank E. Holman. Besides the ABA, pro-amendment associations included the American Farm Bureau, American Legion, and the Daughters of the American Revolution. Special committees like the Vigilant Women for the Bricker Amendment organized spontaneously. Viewing it as a defense of states rights, Southerners opposed to federal civil rights legislation overwhelmingly backed the proposal.

The most pronounced critics of the measure tended to be liberal, long-standing internationalists. Advocates of a strong chief executive, they deemed the Bricker amendment a hazardous weakening of presidential powers. Opponents of the amendment also viewed the mass movement in support of it as "new isolationism."

Eisenhower regarded the Bricker amendment as foolishness and would have preferred simply to let the issue die. Given the widespread support for the amendment, particularly the nearly unanimous support within the Republican party, however, it would not go away. Without Eisenhower's opposition, the amendment would almost certainly have been adopted. Eisenhower met with Bricker several times in an attempt to persuade the senator to settle for innocuous language that Eisenhower could support, but to no avail. The president's supporters in the Senate blocked any action in 1953. Eisenhower, who believed that the amendment restricted presidential authority beyond what the Constitution intended, took a more public stand in opposition to the Bricker amendment in 1954. Administration officials worked out a compromise with Bricker in January, but after conferring with Holman, Bricker repudiated the compromise. Eisenhower then launched an all-out public campaign against the Bricker amendment. Bricker complained that Eisenhower's role in the debate was "highly improper," because, under the Constitution, the president had no formal role in the process of amending the Constitution. Eisenhower became so frustrated with the matter that he told JAMES HAGERTY that "if it's true that when you die the things that bothered you most are engraved on your skull, I am sure I'll have there the mud and dirt of France during [the] invasion and the name of Senator Bricker." Eisenhower's opposition led a number of his supporters in the Senate to withdraw their support for the amendment.

Ultimately, the administration beat the Bricker amendment. On February 25, 1954, Bricker's amendment was defeated 50-42. The next day, a milder version, sponsored by Sen. WALTER F. GEORGE (D-Ga.), fell one vote short of the necessary two-thirds majority. After that, Bricker inexplicably abandoned his crusade. He did reintroduce the amendment in 1955 but did not labor strenuously for it.

On domestic policy, Bricker figured prominently first as chairman (1953-55) and then as the ranking Republican (1955-59) of the Commerce Committee. Early in the fall of 1953, he acknowledged that he had accepted money from his Columbus law firm, which represented the Pennsylvania Railroad; he had done so even though his panel oversaw transportation policy.

Bricker attacked the two then-dominant television networks in February 1955 as a monopoly. In June 1956, however, he defended the major automobile manufacturers on the same charges during Judiciary Committee hearings. That July, Bricker blocked floor consideration of a new bill that policed the pricing policies of major producers.

Bricker unexpectedly lost his Senate seat in 1958. He had originally planned to retire from politics, but Eisenhower, despite the amendment quarrel, urged him to seek a third term. Bricker agreed. However, his victory was jeopardized when a group of Ohio business leaders met in June and determined to place a "right-to-work" (RTW) referendum on the November ballot. The RTW proposal would have prevented "union shop" labor contracts (those compelling employees to join unions after being hired). At the businessmen's gathering in June, Bricker objected vehemently to the initiative. The Ohio GOP would lose badly, he predicted, because it would invariably be identified with the pro-business RTW forces and against organized labor. Although he evaded the RTW issue, he lost to his Democratic opponent, Stephen M. Young, by just over 100,000 votes. But for the RTW issue, Bricker believed, he might have won by between 250,000 and 500,000 votes. Bricker quit active politics to practice law in Columbus. He died there on March 22, 1986.

Bridges, Harry (Alfred) (Renton)

(1901–1990) president, International

Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union

The son of a prosperous real estate agent, Bridges was born in Melbourne, Australia, on July 28, 1901. He spent five years as a seaman before beginning work on the San Francisco docks in 1922. In the early 1930s, Bridges emerged as a leader of the newly chartered local of the International Longshoreman's Association (ILA). He led a dock strike in 1934 that touched off a general strike in San Francisco. The strike propelled Bridges into the presidency first of the ILA local and then of the Pacific Coast District. In 1937, he led the Pacific Coast District out of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and into the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) as the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU). Bridges became the ILWU's first president. Throughout this period, he was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World and remained close to the Communist Party. Bridges always denied that he belonged to the Communist Party, which would have been grounds for deportation, but files of the Communist International opened in 1992 showed that Bridges was elected to the national Central Committee of the Communist Party in 1936. During the 1940s, Bridges became one of the most powerful labor figures on the West Coast, and his ILWU became an important base of communist strength in the CIO.

Beginning in 1939, Bridges was the target of a 16-year effort by the federal government to denaturalize and deport him. Although the CIO expelled the ILWU in 1949 because of communist domination, the Justice Department never proved that Bridges was a communist. However, in 1950, he was convicted of perjury. A jury ruled that he had obtained his U.S. citizenship in 1945 by fraud when he had denied he had ever been a communist. The Federal Appeals Court upheld the conviction in 1952, but in 1953 the Supreme Court ruled that Bridges had been indicted after the statute of limitations had run out.

Long an opponent of congressional investigations of alleged subversion, Bridges threatened in 1955 to shut down all of Hawaii's industries in a protest strike against a four-day hearing Sen. JAMES O. EASTLAND (D-Miss.) had planned to investigate subversion on the islands. However, only 3,000 of Hawaii's 24,000 ILWU members walked off their jobs when the probe began in November. At the hearings, Gov. Samuel W. King testified that ILWU leaders, including Bridges, were the core of the territory's communist problem. He expressed hope that the probe might lead to the ILWU being "listed as Communist-infiltrated" under the Communist Control Act of 1954 and that Hawaiian industry consequently would be freed "from the necessity of recognizing such organizations as legitimate labor unions. . . ." The power of Bridges's union was regarded as one of the obstacles to Hawaiian statehood.

In 1959, Bridges was called to testify on possible Communist Party affiliation before the House Un-American Activities Committee. He invoked the Fifth Amendment, saying he had been cleared of such charges in the past. In answering questions on the union's attitude toward China, Bridges said he personally would "object in every way I could" to shipment of U.S. arms to Nationalist China for the invasion of the Chinese mainland. However, he asserted it would be up to union members to decide whether the ILWU would boycott such shipments. He denied having joined Teamster president JAMES R. HOFFA in plans for a worldwide transport workers' union or having conferred with foreign communists during a trip abroad on how to institute a worldwide shipping boycott.

In October 1959, Bridges became the first labor leader to defy the Landrum-Griffin Act, when he refused to comply with Secretary of Labor JAMES P. MITCHELL's request that he report on communists and ex-convicts in the ILWU. Bridges maintained that the law "violates . . . at least the First and Fifth Amendments."

Bridges continued as president of the ILWU during the 1960s and 1970s. In 1960, he signed a five-and-one-half-year collective bargaining contract with the Pacific Maritime Association. Known as the M & M Agreement, it had a far-reaching impact on the nature of longshore work and the character of the industry. Bridges retired as head of the union in 1977. He died of emphysema in San Francisco, Calif., on March 30, 1990.

Bridges, (Henry) Styles

(1898–1961) U.S. senator

Born in West Pembroke, Maine, on September 9, 1898, Bridges was raised in Maine, where he attended public schools. He received a degree in agriculture from the University of Maine in 1918. After serving as an instructor at Sanderson Academy, in Ashfield, Mass., from 1918 to 1919, he worked as an agricultural agent until 1922, when he became executive secretary of the New Hampshire Farm Bureau Federation. Bridges served as editor of the Granite Monthly Magazine from 1924 to 1926 and director and secretary of the New Hampshire Investment Company from 1924 to 1929. He received an appointment to the New Hampshire Public Service Commission in 1930 and served until 1934, when he won the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Later that year, he easily won the general election and became the youngest governor in the nation. As governor, he balanced the budget while sponsoring state unemployment compensation and old-age benefits. In 1936, he bucked the Democratic tide and won election to the U.S. Senate.

Known from the beginning of his tenure as a vigorous conservative and anticommunist, Bridges assailed many of Franklin D. Roosevelt's domestic policies but supported Roosevelt's efforts early in World War II to supply the Allied powers. He was a foe of Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON and led the "Asia firsters" in denouncing the administration's refusal to give large-scale aid to Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) as a "sellout" to the Communists.

Bridges, called the Gray Eminence of the Republican Party, became the senior member of the GOP and its floor leader in the Senate in 1952. With the Republican victory in the election of 1952, he was named president pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, from which post he frequently pressed for cuts in the federal budget.

Bridges remained a strident anticommunist. When President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER nominated CHARLES BOHLEN to be ambassador to the Soviet Union in February 1953, Bridges joined other conservatives in attempting to block the appointment. He seized the moment to attack the Yalta agreements of 1945, which Bohlen had helped negotiate, as a traitorous mishandling of American foreign policy and to denounce Bohlen as an "appeaser" of communists. Despite the efforts of conservatives, the Senate confirmed Bohlen in March.

Bridges was a strong supporter of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) attacks on alleged subversives in government and disdained Republican moderates' misgivings about McCarthy's tactics. When, in September 1954, the Senate Select Committee to Study Censure Charges filed a report recommending censure of McCarthy for his contempt of the Senate and his abuse of Gen. RALPH ZWICKER, Bridges began attempts to either dilute the resolution or defeat it entirely. First he pressed to delay the full Senate hearings on the resolution until after the elections that November. With that objective accomplished, he used the period of Senate inactivity to attempt to win moderate Republican support for McCarthy. He hoped to win enough Republican support to approach Democratic leaders and offer a compromise resolution so that the censure did not appear to be a partisan Democratic move. The support did not materialize; the Senate condemned McCarthy in December. One of 22 Republicans to vote against the measure, Bridges denounced the action as a blow against patriotic anticommunism.

Undaunted, Bridges carried his anticommunist battle to the White House. When President Eisenhower agreed to U.S. participation in a Geneva summit conference in 1955, Bridges avowed that all international conferences held the dangers of "appeasement, compromise and weakness"—particularly those conferences that included the USSR. Eisenhower, who had been threatened with the Bricker amendment that sought to curb his treaty-making power, promised Bridges and other Republican leaders that he would take no actions without congressional approval.

In 1956 Bridges introduced amendments that would have cut off all aid to Yugoslavia. He also ridiculed the neutralist positions of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru and wanted to decrease U.S. assistance to India.

Bridges was a prominent political strategist in the Republican hierarchy, particularly as the chairman of the GOP Policy Committee from 1955 to 1961. Eisenhower's heart attack in 1955 occasioned major concerns within the party: the possibility of his death in office, the delegation of his responsibilities during the illness, and the status of the Republican ticket in 1956. Fully aware of the importance of the vice presidency, some conservatives, displeased with RICHARD NIXON because of his association with Eisenhower's moderate policies, hoped to advance Bridges as a candidate for the office. Bridges, however, strongly supported Nixon's remaining on the ticket. During Eisenhower's illnesses, Bridges advocated Nixon's assumption of some presidential duties, but he found his suggestions blocked by the White House chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS. The New Hampshire senator believed Nixon to be a strong candidate for president in 1960.

Bridges won a fifth term in the Senate in 1960. He supported those actions of the Kennedy administration that he believed challenged communism and advised a resumption of U.S. nuclear testing in 1961. He died in Concord, N.H., on November 26, 1961.

Brown, Clarence

Brown was born in Blanchester, Ohio, on July 14, 1893. As a boy, he sold popcorn and newspapers and served as a janitor in a bank. He studied at Washington and Lee University law school from 1913 to 1915. Rather than practice law, he became a newspaper publisher. In 1918, Brown was elected lieutenant governor of Ohio and served two two-year terms. He won the election for secretary of state in 1926. In 1932, he lost in the Republican gubernatorial primary. Two years later, he won the nomination for governor but was defeated in the general election. Brown headed Frank Knox's campaign for the vice presidency in 1936.

Brown won election to a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1938. Before World War II, he generally opposed legislation aimed at reversing American neutrality. After the war, he opposed aid to Greece and Turkey on grounds of economy but was paired in favor of the Marshall Plan.

Brown compiled a consistently conservative record on domestic issues. He supported the establishment of the Un-American Activities Committee on a permanent basis in 1945, the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, and the Internal Security Act in 1950. However, he backed a bill outlawing the poll tax in 1944 and the Fair Employment Practices Act of 1950.

In 1952, as in 1940 and 1948, Brown actively supported Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) for the Republican presidential nomination. He served as one of Taft's campaign managers and was one of the Ohio senator's major strategists in the struggle over contested delegate seats at the Republican National Convention. At the first session of the convention, he moved to exclude, on a technicality, Taft's Louisiana delegates from the provisions of the "Fair Play" amendment. This rule stipulated that contested delegates could not vote on any challenges to delegates' credentials. The defeat of Brown's proposal was an early signal that Taft's nomination bid would fail. Taft and many others regarded Brown's proposal as a major tactical error, because it appeared to be a crude, unprincipled attempt to strengthen the Ohioan's forces.

Brown was appointed to the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, unofficially known as the Second Hoover Commission. An opponent of what he regarded as government encroachment on business, he concurred with the committee's report, issued in 1955, which urged substantial cutbacks in government activity. Its major proposals, echoing the general theme "get government out of business," included the transfer of federal lending agencies and power installations to private hands and the elimination of federal medical services. Testifying before the Government Operations Committee's Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee in 1954, Brown criticized military commissaries as presenting "a real threat to free enterprise" because of their competition with private business.

A member of the Rules Committee, which had the power to block legislation on the way from its committee of original jurisdiction to the House floor, he generally joined the coalition of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans on the panel in their often successful efforts to kill liberal social welfare measures. He helped block housing bills in 1955, 1959, and 1960 and school aid and minimum wage bills in the latter year. However, in 1957 and 1960, he backed successful efforts to clear civil rights bills for consideration on the floor of the House.

As a member of the rules panel, Brown was a leading opponent of President JOHN F. KENNEDY's domestic legislation. Brown died of uremic poisoning in Washington, D.C., on August 23, 1965.

Brown, Edmund G(erald)

(1905–1996) governor of California

The son of Gold Rush settlers, "Pat" Brown was born in San Francisco, Calif., on April 21, 1905. He attended public and parochial schools in San Francisco. Lacking the money to attend college, he worked in his father's cigar store–poker room establishment while studying law at night. He received his LL.B. from the San Francisco Law School in 1927 and opened a private practice in San Francisco. In 1928, Brown entered politics as an unsuccessful Republican candidate for the California Assembly. He switched parties during the New Deal and, after an unsuccessful bid for the office in 1939, won the first of two terms as San Francisco district attorney in 1943. Brown was elected state attorney general in 1950 and again in 1954. As the only Democrat holding statewide office, he was the titular head of the state Democratic Party. During his eight years in office, he earned a reputation as a progressive but a tough criminal investigator.

In 1958, Brown entered the state's gubernatorial race against Republican Sen. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND. Knowland's extreme conservatism enabled Brown to seize the center of the political spectrum. Brown described himself as a "responsible" liberal and advocated more ambitious state programs to keep pace with California's demographic and physical growth. Backed strongly by organized labor, which mobilized its ranks to help Brown and defeat a right-to-work initiative backed by his opponent, the Democrat won the November election by more than 1 million votes. He became the state's second Democratic governor in the century. Democrats also swept into all the top state offices except one and carried the first Democratic majorities in both houses of the legislature since 1889.

As governor, Brown undertook an ambitious bipartisan legislative program that easily passed the legislature. He took action on air pollution, problems confronting the elderly, prisons, highway safety, and atomic energy. Brown also established a state economic development commission, a consumers' council, and the state's first fair employment practices commission. The governor developed $200 million in new tax revenues and abolished the state's troublesome cross-filing primary election system, which allowed a voter to participate in any primary he chose, regardless of his registration. Brown also brought northern and southern California interests together to approve the $1.7 billion California Water Project in 1960. The project, the most costly in U.S. history, was designed to provide water from the northern part of the state for the burgeoning population of the south and the irrigated farmlands of the Central Valley.

At the time, Brown's plan was lauded as a spectacular achievement. By the 1970s, however, observers concluded that the plan had become unnecessary because of the slowdown in California's population increase and had caused ecological damage to northern rivers. One of Ralph Nader's research groups charged that the water project was a “special interest boondoggle” that ultimately cost close to $10 billion and placed greater burdens on the individual taxpayer than on the largest industrial and corporate farm users of the water.

During his early years as governor, Brown made a number of important enemies, who continued to plague him throughout his career. His unsuccessful effort to pass a tax on oil alienated California’s powerful oil lobby. His attempts to subject unions to state regulations failed and weakened organized labor’s support for his future political ambitions.

Brown’s inconsistent position on the fate of CARYL CHESSMAN, a convicted rapist, hurt his standing both among conservatives and a large segment of liberal Democrats. Chessman, who had spent over a decade on San Quentin’s Death Row, had become an international cause célèbre through repeated protestations of his innocence and publication of four popular books. In October 1959, Brown rejected a plea for clemency, but Chessman’s life was spared for the seventh time by a stay of execution from the U.S. Supreme Court. In February 1960, Brown reprieved Chessman 10 days before his eighth scheduled date of execution because, Brown said, the State Department had informed him that President Eisenhower’s visit to Uruguay might be disturbed by hostile demonstrations if Chessman were executed. In addition, Brown argued that he wanted the California legislature to consider abolition of the death penalty. Chessman was finally executed in May 1960 after Brown refused to grant another reprieve. Demonstrators at the execution attacked the governor as “the hangman of California.”

Brown’s power within California’s Democratic Party declined after 1961, as President Kennedy looked to the Democratic Speaker of the assembly, Jesse Unruh, as his chief political operative in the state. Nonetheless, Brown won a spectacular reelection victory in November 1962 over former vice president RICHARD NIXON. Brown’s second term coincided with the student revolt at the University of California at Berkeley, the Watts riot in 1965, and the growing farmworker movement. Conservative Republicans resented these developments and held Brown’s “soft” liberalism partly responsible. In 1966, Brown lost his bid for a third gubernatorial term to Ronald Reagan, a former movie star and conservative spokesman. Following his defeat, Brown served as head of the National Commission for the Reform of Federal Criminal Laws. He died in Beverly Hills, Calif., on February 16, 1996.

Brown, Winthrop G(ilman)

(1907–1987) ambassador to Laos

Born on July 12, 1907, in Seal Harbor, Maine, Brown attended Yale law school, and after receiving his degree in 1929, practiced in New York. He joined the staff of the Lend-Lease Administration in 1941. Over the next five years, he represented the agency in missions in London and New Delhi. Brown was director of the Office of International Trade Policy from 1947 to 1950 and of the Office of International Materials Policy from 1950 to 1952. During the 1950s, he served as minister for Economic Affairs in London and New Delhi. In July 1960, he became an ambassador to Laos.

Brown arrived at his assignment shortly before a coup on August 9, led by Laotian Air Force Capt. Kong Le, toppled the pro-American government of Gen. Phoumi Nosavan. Brown sympathized with Le, whom he considered a sincere nationalist disturbed by Phoumi’s corruption. The ambassador did not think Le a potential ally of the communist Pathet Lao, which controlled a large portion of the countryside, and he saw no danger to American interests from the new regime. Despite requests from the State Department that he take steps to have Le removed, Brown did not act, preferring to see how the situation developed.

Kong Le turned administrative power over to neutralist Prince Souvanna Phouma, who formed a government composed of opponents of Phoumi’s pro-Western stance. Phoumi refused to accept Souvanna’s offer of a position in the new regime. Instead, he decided to use his control of the Royal Laotian Army to retake the government by force.

Brown respected Souvanna and soon threw his support behind the neutralist leader. He questioned the possibility of developing a pro-Western government in light of the corruption of the previous regime and growing nationalist feelings in the country. However, many high State Department officials feared that Souvanna would make an alliance with the Left, and they demanded his replacement.

Because of the growing opposition to Souvanna in Washington, Brown was anxious to promote a rightist-neutralist coalition that would exclude pro-communists. At the same time, he attempted to prevent Phoumi from reestablishing his control through military action. Brown was unsuccessful in his efforts, because the Central Intelligence Agency continued to supply Phoumi with troops and material.

Unable to get U.S. military aid or assurances of diplomatic backing, Souvanna formed an alliance with the Pathet Lao in September. Hoping to reverse Souvanna's stand, Brown asked the State Department to grant him assistance. Washington did give both Souvanna and Phoumi loans but granted military aid only to Phoumi. Nevertheless, Brown still pushed for a reorientation of American policy. He risked his own diplomatic position by returning instructions to Washington and asking for clarification. In this way, he hoped to maintain a discussion of policy options.

By November, Brown and Washington were pursuing opposite policies. The State Department openly backed Phoumi, who had begun his military campaign against Souvanna. Brown opposed this action and asked for U.S. air support to reinforce Souvanna's troops, led by Kong Le. By the end of the month, he was able to persuade Washington to cut off aid to Phoumi. However, by that time the general had driven Souvanna to exile and Kong Le into an alliance with the communists.

Brown remained at his post into the Kennedy administration. Unlike his predecessor, JOHN F. KENNEDY, although reluctantly, supported a neutralist government in Laos. It was formed in June 1962. Brown, however, had little part in the negotiations leading to its creation. During the Johnson administration, he served as ambassador to Korea and special assistant to the Secretary of State. He was appointed deputy assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs in 1968. Brown retired from the Foreign Service two years later. He died in Washington, D.C., on May 25, 1987.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr.

(1904–1996) attorney general

The son of a university teacher, Herbert Brownell, Jr., was born on February 20, 1904, in Peru, Neb. He grew up in Nebraska and attended the University of Nebraska, where he edited the college newspaper. He earned his law degree from Yale law school, where he was editor of the law review in 1927 and began his career with Root, Clark, Backner & Ballantine in Manhattan. In 1929, he joined the firm of Lord, Day and Lord, with which he was associated for 60 years. Brownell's specialty was hotel and restaurant law. He also served as counsel for New York's 1939 World's Fair.

Brownell became active in New York Republican politics early in his career. From 1933 to 1937, he represented a Manhattan district in the New York State Assembly. Brownell became politically prominent with the help of Manhattan district attorney THOMAS E. DEWEY. He managed Dewey's unsuccessful bid for the governorship in 1938 as well as his successful campaign in 1942. Accompanying Dewey to Albany, Brownell handled patronage but refused a cabinet post. He was manager of Dewey's unsuccessful presidential campaigns in 1944 and 1948, and he also served as chairman of the Republican National Committee from 1944–46.

During the campaign of 1952, Brownell was one of Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's key advisers. He played a major role in the formulation of strategy at the convention, most notably in his recommendation that Eisenhower forces support a "Fair Play Amendment," under which many delegates backing Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) were unseated. Brownell also urged Eisenhower to select Sen. RICHARD NIXON (R-Calif.) as his running mate. After Eisenhower's election in November, Brownell continued in his crucial advisory role, proposing cabinet nominees and overseeing patronage. According to presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS, "Eisenhower at that time had more confidence in Brownell's political advice than he had in anyone else's." On November 21, the president-elect designated Brownell as his attorney general.

During Brownell's first year in office, the debate over communists in government continued to rage. A vigorous anticommunist, Brownell generated controversy with a speech he gave to the Executives Club of Chicago on November 6, 1953, in which he alleged that Harry Dexter White, an assistant secretary of the Treasury whom President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed to be executive director of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1946, had not only been a spy but that evidence of his activities had been forwarded to the Truman White House before Truman named him to the IMF. Based on the testimony of Elizabeth Bentley and WHITTAKER CHAMBERS, White had been accused in 1948 of spying for the Soviet Union (a charge that would, in the 1990s, be supported by the release of the Venona transcripts). Brownell based his accusation on files in the Justice Department that both supported the allegations of spying and established that Gen. Harry Vaughn, Truman's military aide, had received a report from the FBI on White's activities in December 1945. Moreover, when Truman's nomination of White became public, the FBI sent Truman a second, more detailed report of White's activities.

Truman vehemently denied that White had been a communist and that he had seen the FBI reports. The former president accused Brownell of making the accusation for political purposes and accused him of "McCarthyism." Other prominent Democrats quickly echoed Truman's charges. However, Truman later admitted that he had, indeed, seen the reports, but only after it came out that a duplicate of the second report had gone to JAMES F. BYRNES, then the secretary of state. Truman then changed his story; he had fired White as soon as he discovered the latter's disloyalty. In fact, White had remained at the IMF for 11 months and then resigned without explanation. Moreover, Frank Coe, whom White had appointed as his assistant and whom the FBI had identified as a member of a Soviet espionage ring (a charge that would also be supported by the Venona transcripts), remained at the IMF until December 1952.

On November 10, Truman gave a speech in which he called Brownell a liar and denounced "fake crusaders who dig up and distort records of the past." In a press conference on November 11, Eisenhower said that he did not believe that Truman had knowingly appointed a communist to high office. The president went on to say that it was reckless and un-American to make accusations without being prepared to make the evidence available. However, he maintained that FBI files should not be released. At the same time, Eisenhower backed his attorney general and rejected suggestions that Brownell had impugned Truman's loyalty. In the meantime, the House Committee on Un-American Activities had subpoenaed Truman, and Eisenhower said that he would not have subpoenaed the former president. On the same day, Brownell explained that he criticized the "laxity" of the previous administration and had not intended to question Truman's loyalty.

On November 16, Truman gave an address on national television and radio, in which he acknowledged that he had received the FBI report on White in February 1946, after White's confirmation for the IMF. He further said that the FBI's charges were "impossible to prove." Truman then stated that he had appointed White to the IMF with the approval of the FBI in order not to disrupt ongoing FBI investigations or to alert White that he was under suspicion. The next day, in sworn testimony before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, J. EDGAR HOOVER, director of the FBI, contradicted Truman's version of events. Hoover testified that he told TOM CLARK, Truman's attorney general, that appointing White was "unwise"; he also stated that White's appointment actually hampered the FBI's investigation, because the IMF's premises were "extraterritorial" and therefore FBI agents could not enter them. Brownell also testified before the same subcommittee, and the administration partly declassified the FBI reports on White sent to the White House between November 1945 and February 1946. Brownell told the subcommittee that the FBI report received by the White House in December 1945 "constituted adequate warning to anyone who read it" that appointing White to the IMF constituted an "extreme danger to the security of the country." The attorney general also testified that, although a grand jury had not indicted White in 1948, "much of this evidence" against White had been obtained by wiretap and was therefore not admissible before a federal grand jury. The subcommittee took no action, and the White matter quickly faded from public attention.

In a letter to AL GRUENTHER, commander of NATO, Eisenhower wrote that "the White case was unquestionably distorted in the papers, and I am quite ready to admit that the manner of its presentation was probably not the best. However, so far as the plain, unvarnished fact is concerned, I can see no flaw in the entire line of argument and exposition that was presented publicly by Attorney General Brownell and J. Edgar Hoover.”

On other issues involving communists and suspected subversives, Brownell consistently followed a hard line. In June 1953, he filed an immediate protest when Supreme Court Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS granted a stay of execution to convicted spies JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG. The full Court soon reversed the order. Brownell advised Eisenhower to reject calls for clemency. Brownell asked Congress in April 1954 to permit the death penalty for peacetime spying as well as wartime espionage.

In August 1953, Brownell declared that U.S. communists were “a greater menace now than at any time [because they] have gone underground since the Smith Act trials started. They are better organized and detection is more difficult.” In line with his pledge to “utterly destroy all” Communist Party activities in the United States, Brownell from 1953 to 1955 proposed a body of anticommunist legislation for congressional enactment. He sought legislation to compel witnesses to testify if granted immunity from criminal prosecution. He requested a “greatly needed” amendment to the perjury law to make “willful giving of contradictory statements under oath” a crime. Existing law required the government to prove one of the statements false. He recommended increasing penalties for seditious conspiracy and advocating the forcible overthrow of the government to a maximum of 20 years imprisonment; he also sought authority for the government to revoke the citizenship of persons convicted of such offenses. Under his existing authority, Brownell added scores of left-wing organizations to the attorney general’s list of subversive groups, a number that exceeded 300 by 1955.

The attorney general personally intervened in a split within the Justice Department in 1955 over a case involving the right of a fired government employee to confront his accuser. The department’s brief, urging the Supreme Court to uphold the 1951 U.S. Public Health Service’s dismissal of Dr. John Peters on loyalty grounds, was signed by Brownell instead of Solicitor General SIMON SOBLOFF, who normally represented the government before the Supreme Court. Sobeloff argued that Peters’s dismissal violated the Fifth Amendment’s ban on depriving a person of liberty or property without due process of law, while Brownell maintained that the due process clause did not cover government jobs, since government security programs depended on undercover agents and secret informers. Sobeloff declined to argue the case. In June 1955, the Court overturned Peters’s dismissal. The Court decided the case on procedural grounds; it held that the Loyalty Review Board had exceeded its authority by deciding to review a case that had not been appealed to it. The Court did not rule on the constitutional question of whether Peters had been denied due process of law.

Brownell singled out labor unions for special attention in his anticommunist offensive. In an interview in August 1953, he rejected the idea that communists were “concentrated in the clergy”; he said, “I suppose there are more in labor unions than anywhere else.” In July 1955, he asked that the striking Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers be stripped of its privileges before the National Labor Relations Board on the grounds that it was communist-dominated. In December, he urged the Subversive Activities Control Board to declare the striking United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (UE) “communist-infiltrated.” The president of the UE, Albert Fitzgerald, denied Brownell’s accusation and denounced him as “the nation’s No. 1 strikebreaker.”

In the area of antitrust policy, the Justice Department under Brownell differed in a number of ways from its Democratic predecessors. In June 1953, Brownell pledged that the Eisenhower administration would tolerate “no winking” at antitrust violations but would emphasize civil rather than criminal actions. He attempted to hire only top law school graduates for the department and the antitrust division under the so-called Honors Program. He promulgated a firm rule whereby lawyers who had worked for the division could not represent firms being sued by the division for a two-year period after leaving the Justice Department.

He also sought legislation raising from $5,000 to $50,000 the maximum fine for antitrust violations and enabling the government to sue for actual damages resulting from violations, since the government was the nation's "largest single purchaser of goods" and its losses could be substantial.

Among the firms prosecuted for antitrust violations by Brownell's department were the Westinghouse Electric Co. and the Aluminum Company of America (Alcoa). Perhaps the most ambitious suit filed during his tenure was against the General Motors Corp. (GM). The suit charged that GM, which sold 84 percent of all new buses in 1955, had conspired with four bus operating companies to maintain its monopoly. In June 1953, he pledged grand jury proceedings against several large international oil companies that allegedly formed a cartel to control distribution and prices. "The highest considerations of national security" was the explanation given for the dismissal.

In January 1956, the Justice Department signed a famous consent decree with the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. (AT&T). The original suit, filed by the Justice Department in 1949, had charged AT&T with monopolizing the telephone market via its control of the Western Electric Co., the leading manufacturer of telephone equipment, and called for the separation of the two companies. On taking office, Brownell met privately with AT&T's general counsel to discuss ways of ending the litigation without damaging AT&T. The settlement, reached in 1956, allowed AT&T to keep Western Electric and continue their previous arrangements. AT&T consented to license patents to all applicants at reasonable royalties. Brownell called the decree "a major victory" for the government, but Business Week commented that the "'major victory' turned out on second look to be hardly more than a slap on the wrist for the biggest corporation in the world."

Within the Eisenhower cabinet, Brownell was the most active proponent of expanding the role of the federal government in protecting civil rights. In December 1953, he filed an amicus curiae brief in Brown v. Board of Education, then before the Supreme Court. The brief supported the Court's authority to declare school segregation unconstitutional, as the Court eventually ruled in 1954. (The new chief justice, EARL WARREN, had been chosen by President Eisenhower upon Brownell's recommendation.)

Brownell was the key administration figure behind the conception and passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The proposed bill, put together by Justice Department lawyers early in 1956, would have created a Civil Rights Commission and a new civil rights division within the Justice Department. Its third section would have armed the government with injunctive power against civil rights violations and enabled the attorney general to join civil suits against individuals infringing on others' civil rights. A fourth section protected voting rights. Despite a lack of enthusiasm on the part of Eisenhower and much of the rest of the cabinet, Brownell won official backing for the proposals and defended them before the Judiciary Committees in Congress in the spring of 1956. The bill passed the House, but LYNDON JOHNSON, the majority leader in the Senate, killed the bill by consigning it to JAMES O. EASTLAND's Judiciary Committee. Johnson wanted no part of an issue that would divide the Democratic party in an election year.

Brownell played an active part in the Senate battle over the bill in the spring of 1957. He argued strongly against an amendment initiated by southern senators to require jury trials for persons charged with contempt of court for violating injunctions against interfering with individuals' voting rights. The administration's version left contempt decisions up to the discretion of a federal judge. It was widely assumed that southern juries would refuse to convict accused violators of civil rights laws. Brownell warned that the jury trial amendment guaranteed the "practical nullification" of the bill's effectiveness by "seriously weakening" the power of federal courts to enforce their orders. He pointed out that under "traditional rules of procedure" a "defendant is not entitled to jury trial in contempt proceedings" when the government sued for "preventive relief."

The Senate passed the jury trial amendment nevertheless, and also deleted the bill's controversial Part III. In the debates, southern senators attacked Brownell as the author of these allegedly punitive sections. The final bill retained the Civil Rights Commission, the new civil rights division for the Justice Department, and the voting rights section with the jury trial amendment.

Brownell also played a vital advisory role in the school integration crisis in Little Rock, Ark., in September 1957. Gov. ORVAL FAUBUS precipitated the crisis when he ordered the Arkansas National Guard to prevent black students from entering the city's Central High School as part of a court-ordered integration plan. Acting on Brownell's advice, President Eisenhower dispatched regular army paratroopers to Little Rock to enforce the federal court's integration order.

Perhaps Brownell's most significant contribution to civil rights as attorney general was his role in the appointment of liberal and moderate judges to the federal judiciary in the South. With Brownell's advice, Eisenhower appointed Sobeloff, CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH, and Herbert S. Borman to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. He appointed ELBERT P. TUTTLE, JOHN MINOR WISDOM, and John R. Brown to the Fifth Circuit. Southerners blocked the Sobeloff nomination for more than a year and held up Haynsworth's confirmation for nine months.

Brownell resigned as attorney general in 1957 and returned to Lord, Day & Lord, serving as senior partner until he stepped down in 1977. He was of counsel to the firm from 1977–89. Brownell was president of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York in 1963 and later served as an adviser to Mayor JOHN V. LINDSAY, who had been his executive assistant in the Justice Department. He died in New York City on May 1, 1996.

Bruce, David K(irkpatrick) E(ste)
(1898–1977) observer to the European Defense Community Interim Commission and special representative to the European Coal and Steel Community, ambassador to Germany

Born to a socially and politically prominent family in Baltimore, Md., on February 12, 1898, David Bruce was the son of William Cabell Bruce, a writer and author of a Pulitzer Prize-winning biography of Benjamin Franklin. William Bruce also served as U.S. senator from Maryland from 1923 to 1929. David Bruce attended Princeton University but left during his second year to join the National Guard. He was sent to France, but World War I ended before he saw combat. After attending law school at the Universities of Virginia and Maryland, Bruce began practicing law in Baltimore in 1921. He won election to Maryland's House of Delegates in 1924 and served a single term. In 1926, he became vice counsel in Rome but returned to the United States the following year to join the Bankers Trust Co. He continued a close association with the Mellon family and also worked for W. AVERELL HARRIMAN. Bruce helped the Mellons establish the National Gallery of Art in the late 1930s and served as president of the museum. He won election to the Virginia House of Delegates in 1939. The following year, with World War II under way in Europe, he became chief representative of the American Red Cross in London.

Bruce did not serve long with the Red Cross. William J. Donovan recruited him to help set up the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), an intelligence agency that became the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency. Given the rank of colonel in the U.S. Army Air Corps, Bruce commanded OSS operations in Europe from 1943 until the end of the war. In June 1947, he became assistant secretary of commerce under his friend and business associate, W. Averell Harriman. Bruce went to Paris to administer the Marshall Plan in 1948, and became ambassador to France one year later. In April 1952, Bruce was named undersecretary of state and also assumed the posts of alternate governor of the International Monetary Fund and governor of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank).

In February 1953, President Eisenhower appointed Bruce observer at the Interim Commission of the European Defense Community (EDC) and special representative to the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC). Bruce had long been a proponent of European integration and was an originator of the concept of a European army. In addition, he was well acquainted with European political leaders, particularly the French, whose consent was vital for the establishment of the EDC. Because he was a liberal and a leading financial contributor to the Democratic Party, conservative Republicans disapproved of the nomination, but the Senate easily confirmed him.

Based in Paris, Bruce's operation was established to convince Europeans of the merits of political, economic, and military integration. By the end of 1953, the six member-nations had created a single market for coal and steel. Despite early production difficulties and conflicts among the members, the economic union progressed, and in 1958 it gave way to the European Economic Community.

Bruce found the EDC negotiations more difficult. He traveled throughout Western Europe seeking support for a supranational army capable of resisting Soviet aggression without a heavy U.S. commitment. He concentrated most of his attention, however, on France. Although he had considerable popularity in that country, members of the French National Assembly criticized him for conducting a high-pressure lobbying campaign for the EDC. Opponents of EDC, including communists, Gaullist nationalists, and those fearful of German rearmament, combined to reject the EDC in the assembly in August 1954. The defeat of EDC was a personal setback for Bruce and effectively concluded his special role in Europe.

Bruce left the State Department in February 1955, but agreed to serve as a consultant. In August 1956, President Eisenhower named him to an eight-member board of consultants that periodically reviewed foreign intelligence activities. Six months later, he returned to full-time diplomatic work as ambassador to West Germany. Less popular in Germany than in France, Bruce nonetheless succeeded in cultivating an extremely close relationship with Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, although he neglected other West German politicians and trade union leaders.

Bruce resigned his diplomatic post in November 1959 to serve as a foreign policy adviser to the Democratic Party during the presidential election of 1960. In February 1961, President JOHN F. KENNEDY named him ambassador to Great Britain. Bruce thus became the first U.S. diplomat to hold the three most important European ambassadorships. He remained in London until February 1969. After a brief retirement, Bruce was appointed U.S. representative to the Vietnam peace talks in Paris in 1970, and in 1973 he went to Beijing as liaison officer to the People's Republic of China. President GERALD R. FORD appointed him ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in 1974. He retired again in January 1976 and died in Washington, D.C., on December 5, 1977.

Brucker, Wilber M(arion)

(1894–1968) secretary of the army

The son of a judge and Democratic congressman, Brucker was born in Saginaw, Mich., on June 23, 1894. He worked his way through the University of Michigan, from which he received a degree in law in 1916. He enlisted in the Michigan National Guard and served on the Mexican border from 1916 to 1917. After attending First Officers' Training Camp at Fort Sheridan, in Illinois, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Infantry. He served in France from 1917 to 1918. Upon leaving the service, he returned to Michigan and became assistant prosecuting attorney of Saginaw Co. in 1919, serving in that position until he became prosecuting attorney in 1923. He was assistant attorney general of Michigan from 1927 to 1928 and attorney general from 1928 to 1930. Brucker was elected governor and served a single term from 1930 to 1932. After losing his bid for reelection, he joined the Detroit law firm of Clark, Klein, Brucker, and Waples.

Brucker left private law practice upon his nomination as general counsel of the Defense Department in 1954. He gained publicity during the Army-McCarthy hearings of that year by laughing at Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) accusation that President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was conducting "a conspiracy of silence" about military security. However, Brucker called for legislation to keep subversives out of defense plants and supervised the development of a Pentagon program to screen and review all personnel in the Defense Department. In 1955, NORMAN THOMAS and other civil libertarians attacked the army's security program for issuing less than honorable discharges to military personnel based on preinduction activities.

Appointed secretary of the army in June 1955, Brucker initially supported the administration's "New Look" policy, which stressed nuclear deterrence as the nation's primary defense. However, by 1957, he joined Army Chief of Staff MAXWELL D. TAYLOR in opposing the budget reductions the policy entailed. During testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee, Brucker argued that the cutbacks would reduce troop strength, lower service standards, and limit research in biological and chemical warfare. Taking a vigorous stand in opposition to the emphasis on nuclear weapons, he stated that modern warfare would require the development of tactics to meet limited types of conflict. At the meeting of the Association of the U.S. Army in 1958, Brucker argued that, as nuclear stalemate was reached between the United States and the USSR, the possibilities of limited wars would be "most likely." A year later, he told members of Congress that the communists had been involved in 18 limited wars since 1945 and described the Soviet army as "modern, mobile and menacing." Before leaving office, Brucker initiated a reorganization plan for the army to enable it to adapt to either atomic or conventional war on any scale.

In 1957, after President Eisenhower issued an executive order placing the Arkansas National Guard under federal control and Secretary of Defense CHARLES E. WILSON ordered 1,000 troops into Little Rock, Ark., Brucker supervised the government's enforcement of the integration of Central High School. After the inauguration of JOHN F. KENNEDY in 1961, Brucker returned to Detroit and engaged in the private practice of law with Brucker and Brucker until his death at Grosse Pointe Farms, Mich., on October 28, 1968.

Brundage, Percival F(lack)

(1892–1979) director, Bureau of the Budget

The son of a Protestant minister, Brundage was born on April 2, 1892. He graduated from Harvard in 1914 with a B.A. in the classics. He then took a job as an office boy with an accounting firm in New York. Following a night course in accounting, he joined another firm, Price, Waterhouse & Co., in 1916. Brundage remained with Price, Waterhouse for the next 38 years, advancing from staff accountant to partner in 1930 and senior partner by 1944. He joined the Eisenhower administration in May 1954 as deputy director of the budget; in April 1956 he was sworn in as successor to director ROWLAND HUGHES.

As budget director, Brundage spearheaded the administration's drive to get the government out of competition with private industry. In May 1956, the Budget Bureau reported that the federal government was operating 19,321 commercial and industrial facilities. At the end of October, Brundage disclosed that 492 of those facilities had been dropped or curtailed on the principle that "the government has ordinarily no right to compete in a private enterprise economy," even if "the apparent cost" to the government would be increased by shifting to private production. Brundage also announced that the government had sold over $1 billion of the assets of the liquidated Reconstruction Finance Corp.

Throughout 1957, Brundage was at the center of a controversy over the budget for fiscal 1958, the first he prepared. Presented in January 1957, the 1958 budget placed estimated expenditures at $71.8 billion, the highest ever in peacetime. Over the next few months, Brundage was in the paradoxical position of defending the administration's budget while President Eisenhower and Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY were inviting Congress to make cuts.

In January, Brundage appeared before the Joint Economic Committee and characterized his budget as a "good budget and a fair compromise." In May, after months of congressional criticism, he said the budget had been "examined, analyzed and evaluated" and could be cut no further. However, some fiscal conservatives remained unsatisfied. Sen. HARRY BYRD (D-Va.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, called on President Eisenhower to replace Brundage with someone "dedicated to economy instead of . . . finding new ways to spend more money."

Brundage was also an adversary of congressional proposals for tax cuts, which he steadfastly opposed through 1957. In October, he argued that the projected surplus of $1.5 billion for fiscal 1958 was too small to allow for tax reductions. Ultimately, the recession of 1958 wiped out the expected surplus, and the 1958 budget instead ended up with a $2.8 billion deficit.

Brundage left the Budget Bureau in March 1958 and returned to Price, Waterhouse as a consultant. He died in Ridgewood, N.J., on July 16, 1979.

Buckley, William F(rank), Jr.(1925–2008) author

The sixth of 10 children, Buckley was born in New York City on November 24, 1925. His father, William Frank Buckley, Sr., was a wealthy lawyer and oil executive. William F. Buckley, Jr., moved with his family from Mexico to Sharon, Conn., and then began his formal education in Paris. He attended private schools in England and began high school at the Catholic Beaumont College in England. During World War II, Buckley returned to the United States, where he attended Millbrook School in Millbrook, N.Y., from which he graduated in 1943. Buckley adopted his father's strong Catholic faith and his conservative politics. He enrolled at the National Autonomous University of Mexico in 1943, and left the following year to enter the army. Upon completing Officer Candidate School in 1944, he was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army. At the end of the war, Buckley enrolled at Yale University, where he won distinction as a debater and served as editor in chief of the Yale Daily News. He graduated from Yale in 1950.

One year later, Buckley gained early prominence with the publication of his first book, God and Man at Yale, a full-throated attack against his alma mater and the ideas he considered dominant at the school. Buckley argued that the overwhelming majority of Yale professors denigrated religion, advocated atheism or agnosticism, and championed secularism. He also maintained that the university taught collectivism and attacked or dismissed individualism. For example, Buckley pointed out that the overwhelming majority of professors in the economics department taught from a Keynesian perspective and used Keynesian textbooks. In one of his more controversial positions, Buckley dismissed "the superstitions of academic freedom." "I believe it to be an indisputable fact," Buckley wrote, "that most colleges and universities, and certainly Yale, the protests and pretensions of their educators . . . notwithstanding, do not practice . . . academic freedom." He pointed out that Yale would not tolerate a sociologist who "revealed himself as a racist." Similarly, he found it "inconceivable" that Yale would long tolerate a political scientist who "openly scorned democracy" and advocated totalitarianism. Buckley then called upon Yale's conservative alumni to assert control over the institution and make sure that their values were inculcated in the university's students.

Buckley was a member of the Central Intelligence Agency from July 1951 to April 1952. In 1954, he stirred up another controversy with his second book, McCarthy and His Enemies, the most important defense of McCarthyism to appear in print during the period. Buckley and his coauthor, L. Brent Bozell, combined a spirited justification of the charges of the Wisconsin senator with sharp thrusts at the alleged inconsistencies and unfair tactics of his opponents. Although acknowledging that McCarthy had been guilty of blunders and misconduct, they endorsed his contention that there was widespread communist subversion of the U.S. government. The authors concluded that "on McCarthyism hangs the hopes of America for effective resistance to communist infiltration."

In 1955, Buckley founded the National Review, which before long became the leading intellectual organ of American conservatism. In the "Publisher's Statement" of its inaugural issue, Buckley declared, "National Review is out of place in the sense that the United Nations and the League of Women Voters and the New York Times and Henry Steele Commager are in place." It "stands athwart history, yelling Stop!" Among the magazine's editors and contributors, many of them ex-communists, were the luminaries of the intellectual Right: RUSSELL KIRK, JAMES BURNHAM, WILLMOORE KENDALL, MAX EASTMAN, and WHITTAKER CHAMBERS.

As editor in chief, Buckley orchestrated their weekly denunciations of the manifestations of modern liberalism: big government, social welfare programs, civil rights laws, unbalanced budgets, containment, foreign aid, and contemporary mores. Its contributors included libertarians, economic conservatives, and traditionalists, but all shared a fierce anticommunism and an abhorrence of the welfare state. Buckley himself emerged as the premier polemicist of American conservative politics. Moving across a broad field of issues, he used wit, mockery, and verbal refinement to prick the hides of liberal targets, both institutional, such as Social Security and the United Nations, and personal, such as ELEANOR ROOSEVELT and ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR.

In 1959, Buckley published the only substantial exposition of his credo, Up from Liberalism. He criticized the materialistic limits of liberal thought and registered alarm at the centralization of power in the state to accomplish liberalism's social ends. He deplored "liberalism's total appetite for power" and "the root assumptions of liberal economic theory . . . that, economically speaking, the people are merely gatherers of money which is the right and duty of a central intelligence to distribute." Buckley's prescription for social progress derived from classical economics: "It is to maintain and wherever possible enhance the freedom of the individual to acquire property and dispose of that property in ways he decides on."

Buckley reached a wider audience with his syndicated newspaper column, "On the Right." Beginning in 1962 and continuing until his death, he wrote some 5,600 columns. He also hosted Firing Line, a television program on which he interviewed and debated guests in his provocative and entertaining style, from 1966 to 1999. It was one of the longest running programs in the history of television. Buckley ran for mayor of New York City on the Conservative Party ticket in 1965 but garnered only 13.4 percent of the vote. Over the course of his career, he wrote over 50 books. Buckley stepped down as editor of the National Review in 1990 but stayed on as editor at large. In addition, he continued to write his column and to publish essays and books, including novels and an autobiography. A founder of modern conservatism, his greatest contribution was to make conservative ideas respectable at a time when liberalism dominated American political discourse. Buckley died at his home in Stamford, Conn., on February 27, 2008.

Bunche, Ralph J(ohnson)

(1904–1971) director, United Nations Department of Trusteeship; United Nations undersecretary

The son of a barber, Bunche was born in Detroit, Mich., on August 7, 1904. After his mother died and his father effectively abandoned the family, Bunche was raised by his maternal grandmother. Bunche moved with his family to New Mexico and then to Los Angeles, Calif. The intensely competitive

Bunche excelled in high school, where he played basketball and graduated valedictorian of his class at Jefferson High School. He attended the University of California, Southern Branch (later the University of California at Los Angeles), where he wrote for the campus newspaper, was president of the debating society, played football, starred at basketball, and graduated summa cum laude with a Phi Beta Kappa key in 1927. After receiving an M.A. from Harvard University in 1928, he began teaching political science at Howard University. Bunche continued to teach at Howard intermittently until 1950. He took a leave of absence from Howard in the fall of 1929 to begin work on his doctorate at Harvard. In 1934, he received his Ph.D. in government and international relations after completing a dissertation comparing French rule in Togoland and Dahomey. Bunche did postdoctoral work at Northwestern University, the London School of Economics, and Capetown University in South Africa. In 1936 he published a short book, A World View of Race. Two years later, he began working with Gunnar Myrdal, a Swedish sociologist commissioned by the Carnegie Corporation to undertake a massive study of African Americans. The study was published as An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy in 1944.

During World War II, Bunche was rejected for military service for physical reasons. He served in the Office of Strategic Services as senior social-science analyst and expert on Africa. Joining the State Department in 1944 as a colonial specialist, Bunche drew up the trusteeship section of the United Nations Charter at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1944. He attended the first UN conference at San Francisco in 1945. From 1945 to 1947, Bunche was associate chief of the State Department's Division of Dependent Area Affairs.

At the request of UN Secretary General Trygve Lie, Bunche became director of the UN's trusteeship division in 1947. That year, he sat on the Special Committee on Palestine, which recommended creation of a Jewish national state. After fighting broke out between Israel and its Arab neighbors in 1948, the UN appointed Count Folke Bernadotte of Sweden to mediate the conflict. Bunche accompanied Bernadotte as his chief aide. After the assassination of Bernadotte in September 1948, Bunche became the UN's chief mediator. Through 11 months of tireless negotiating, Bunche achieved an armistice between Israel and the Arab states. For his efforts, Bunche received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1950.

A forceful advocate for black civil rights in the United States, Bunche helped organize a conference in 1935 on "The Status of the Negro under the New Deal." At the conference, he criticized the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt and its policies toward African Americans. In 1949, he turned down the offer of a position as an assistant secretary of state, stating that he did not want to expose himself or his family to the discrimination they would face in segregated Washington, D.C. That same year, Bunche received the Spingarn Medal from the NAACP.

In response to growing rightist criticism of the American delegation at the UN, ambassador HENRY CABOT LODGE began a loyalty investigation of the personnel, including Bunche, in 1953. The plan had the full support of Secretary General Lie, who authorized non-American employees to provide information to the FBI. When Dag Hammarskjöld replaced Lie in April, he ordered the FBI off UN territory. In response, the Eisenhower administration created the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board to continue the probe. The board attempted to keep its efforts secret. Nevertheless, news leaked out in May 1954 that the board was investigating Bunche. Eisenhower opposed the probe and sent a presidential assistant, Maxwell Rabb, to warn Bunche about FBI reports and the board's queries and to offer his support. Bunche, however, decided to stand alone. At the hearing, he was confronted by two ex-communist witnesses on the payroll of the Justice Department, who charged him with communist connections. After two days of testimony, the board's chairman, Pierce J. Geraty, announced on May 28, 1954, that Bunche had been unanimously cleared of all charges.

Bunche was appointed undersecretary of the UN in August 1954, the highest post ever held by an American in the organization. Following the Israeli-Egyptian war in 1956, he organized the UN Emergency Force responsible for keeping the peace and served as a member of the three-man committee supervising the cease-fire. Bunche was criticized for siding with the Egyptians and denounced by Israeli Prime Minister David Ben Gurion.

In April 1958, Bunche headed a special commission that successfully settled an Israeli-Jordanian dispute over Israel's Mt. Scopus enclave in Jordanian Jerusalem. After meeting in May with officials from both countries, Bunche persuaded the Jordanian government to lift a blockade of Israeli convoys to the Jewish community. The following month, Bunche was promoted to undersecretary for special political affairs, serving as Hammarskjöld's principal troubleshooter.

Bunche played a major role in the Congo crisis of 1960. Four days after the declaration of Congolese independence in June 1960, President Joseph Kasavubu and Premier Patrice Lumumba, facing civil war with breakaway Katanga province, petitioned for UN troops to preserve order and prevent unilateral intervention by Belgium. On July 14, the UN voted to send a force, and Bunche was assigned to organize the effort. He then remained in the Congo as Hammarskjöld's personal representative.

In that capacity, Bunche helped negotiate the agreement, disclosed on July 18, for Belgian officials in the Congo to accept orders from UN Forces and to limit their troops' actions to "the security needs of Belgian nationals." At the beginning of August, Bunche met with Premier Moïse Tshombe, head of breakaway Katanga, to try to convince him to permit UN troops to enter the province to oust Belgian troops in the area. Bunche could not persuade Tshombe that the force would not be used as an advance guard for his rival, Lumumba. Bunche, therefore, advised Hammarskjöld against pressing the issue for fear of bloodshed.

During the summer, Bunche became embroiled in a dispute between the commanders of the UN Force, Gen. Henry Alexander (commander of Ghanaian UN troops) and Gen. Carl von Horn (UN force commander). In August, Alexander protested that von Horn was "unprepared to exercise any military authority at all, thus putting Ghanaian and other UN troops in an impossible position." Alexander's protest implied that Hammarskjöld and Bunche bore responsibility for the UN command's weakness. Bunche maintained that Alexander's criticisms were invalid because the general could not "comprehend the nature of an international peace force.” Nevertheless, Bunche was replaced as Hammarskjöld’s representative that month. UN officials denied that the move was connected with the dispute.

Bunche continued to advise Hammarskjöld on the Congo until the secretary general’s death in September 1961. That month, he became temporary head of the organization, serving until the installation of U Thant as secretary general in November. Bunche served as a UN troubleshooter in Yemen during 1963 and in Cyprus during 1964. He also lent his prestige to the American Civil Rights movement. During the mid-1960s, he opposed attempts to link the Civil Rights movement with opposition to the Vietnam War. Bunche died in New York City on December 9, 1971.

Burger, Warren Earl

(1907–1995) lawyer and federal judge

Born in Saint Paul, Minn., on September 17, 1907, Burger grew up in modest circumstances on a farm near Saint Paul and attended public schools. While working at a life insurance company, he attended night classes at the University of Minnesota for two years and at Saint Paul College of Law (now William Mitchell College of Law), from which he graduated in 1931. Burger practiced law with the firm of Boyesen, Otis & Faricy in Saint Paul from 1931 to 1953. During that time, he became active in Republican politics and worked on HAROLD STASSEN’s successful campaigns for governor. He also supported Stassen’s unsuccessful attempts to capture the Republican presidential nomination. Burger served as Stassen’s floor manager at the Republican conventions in 1948 and in 1952, when he attracted the attention of HERBERT BROWNELL, one of Eisenhower’s managers, who would later become attorney general in the Eisenhower administration.

After Eisenhower took office, Brownell appointed Burger as an assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department’s Claims (later the Civil) Division in 1953. In 1955, Burger became involved in the case of Dr. John Plunnet Peters, a senior professor of medicine at Yale University and a part-time consultant to the Public Health Service.

After the departmental loyalty board twice cleared Peters, the Loyalty Review Board, on its own initiative, reviewed the case and found that a reasonable doubt existed as to Peters’s loyalty. Peters went to court and, after he lost in federal district court, the firm of Arnold, Fortas & Porter agreed to represent him and took the case to the Supreme Court. When the case came before the solicitor general, SIMON E. SOBELOFF, he was uncomfortable with the fact that the names of informants against Peters had been withheld not only from Peters but from the Loyalty Review Board as well. Sobeloff proposed a confession of error. Ultimately Brownell decided to prosecute the case actively, and Sobeloff declined to argue the government’s case. At this point, Brownell asked Burger to argue the case before the Supreme Court. The government lost the case, but the Supreme Court ducked the larger constitutional issue and held improper the Loyalty Review Board’s procedure in reviewing a case that had not been appealed to it.

When Judge Harold Stephens of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia died, Eisenhower nominated Burger to fill the vacancy. The Senate approved him, and Burger joined the court in 1956. He quickly established a reputation as a moderate conservative for taking a hard line on matters relating to law and order and advocating a judicially conservative approach to reading statutes and the Constitution. On a deeply divided court, he led the wing that opposed the extension of rights to those accused of criminal acts. Rather, he preferred to give leeway to police, prosecutors, and trial judges. Burger frequently sparred with the court’s more liberal members, particularly DAVID L. BAZELON, and vigorously opposed Bazelon’s attempts to revise the legal standard of insanity in criminal cases.

In 1969, President RICHARD M. NIXON nominated Burger to be chief justice of the United States. The Senate overwhelmingly approved the nomination. Much to the disappointment of many conservatives, the Supreme Court during Burger’s tenure as chief justice consolidated many of the major rulings of the Warren Court. Moreover, under Burger the Court struck down state antiabortion laws in Roe v. Wade (1973), upheld the Court-ordered use of busing to desegregate schools in Swann v. Char- lotte-Mecklenburg (1971), and upheld affirmative action in Bakke v. Board of Regents (1978). In some regards, the Burger Court was at least as activist as its predecessor. It recognized new rights and created new constitutional doctrine regarding the right to privacy and gender as well as racial discrimination. Although uncomfortable with some of these trends, Burger wrote the opinions for the Court on decisions that validated busing to achieve desegregation and forced Nixon to turn over the White House tape recordings to Watergate investigators. Burger also wrote several significant opinions upholding First Amendment claims. In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart (1976), he held that, given the constitutional bias against prior restraint, trial judges should use gag orders only as a matter of last resort. Judges, he reasoned, could take other steps to ensure a fair trial, such as sequestering the jury or changing the venue. In addition, he wrote for the majority in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), which struck down a Florida law requiring newspapers that had attacked the character of a political candidate to give free space for a reply. Burger did not, however, believe that the First Amendment protected obscenity. He attempted to end the court's 15-year struggle to construct a legal definition of obscenity in Miller v. California (1973). Writing for the majority, Burger restricted the scope of material protected by the First Amendment under WILLIAM J. BRENNAN's opinion for the majority in Roth v. United States (1957). Burger defined obscenity as "works which, taken as a whole, appeal to the prurient interest in sex, which portray sexual conduct in a patently offensive way and which, taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." Further, Roth held that juries should apply "contemporary community standards" in determining whether a particular work met the definition of obscenity; while Brennan had looked to the standards of the nation as a whole, Burger held that the standards should be those of the local community. On another First Amendment matter, Burger wrote the majority opinion in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), a major decision involving separation of church and state. In order to pass constitutional muster, he wrote, a law conferring some benefit on religion first "must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; finally, the statute must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion." Burger also continued to oppose the extension of protections to those accused of a crime, and the Burger Court did narrow some Warren Court decisions in that area.

Although his opinions were, in general, somewhat better than contemporary critics allowed, Burger was not the intellectual leader of the Court that bore his name. Another Nixon appointee, William H. Rehnquist, exerted more influence on the Court's conservatives; Brennan played a comparable role for the liberals. Burger voted with the minority more frequently than influential chief justices such as Warren. His difficult personality strained relations with colleagues and hampered him in constructing majorities on specific cases.

Burger loved the ceremonial aspects of his office and was an able administrator. He modernized procedures at the Supreme Court and made it a more efficient body. He took his title (chief justice of the United States) seriously and regarded himself as steward of the nation's judicial system. He was influential in the creation of the National Center for State Courts, the Institute for Court Management, and the National Institute of Corrections. These organizations educated and trained participants in the judicial process.

Burger retired as chief justice in 1986, and became chair of the Bicentennial Commission on the U.S. Constitution. He died in Washington, D.C., of congestive heart failure on June 25, 1995.

Burke, Arleigh A(Ibert)

(1901–1996) chief of naval operations

Of Swedish and Pennsylvania Dutch ancestry, Burke was born in Boulder, Colo., on October 19, 1901, and raised on a farm near Boulder. Intent on a naval career, Burke entered the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis and graduated in 1923. He served five years sea duty and then returned to the United States to study ordnance engineering at Annapolis. He received his M.S. in engineering from the University of Michigan in 1931. During the 1930s, Burke continued his career as an ordnance officer.

He served in the Pacific during World War II, where he gained a reputation for the speed at which he carried squadrons into combat. For his service in the war, he received numerous decorations, including the Navy Distinguished Service Medal, the Legion of Merit, and the Silver Star.

Burke was head of the research and development division of the Bureau of Ordnance in 1945. Three years later, he was promoted to an assistant to the chief of naval operations in the organizational research and policy division. Burke participated in the so-called Revolt of the Admirals in 1949, opposing the emphasis on the B-36 air force bomber in the armed forces unification plan. Reportedly because of his part in the action, Capt. Burke's promotion to rear admiral was postponed until July 1950. He served in combat during the Korean war, and in the summer of 1951, Burke served as a member of the UN Military Armistice Commission in Korea. In July 1951, he was named director of strategic plans of naval operations, the second highest post in the navy hierarchy. After a brief stint as commander of the Atlantic Fleet from November 1954 to June 1955, he was appointed chief of naval operations. In choosing Burke, Eisenhower passed over 38 admirals with more seniority.

Burke initially supported Eisenhower's "New Look" defense policy. The New Look grew out of a desire to limit the defense budget and prevent debilitating ground wars such as those in Korea. The policy placed primary emphasis on "massive retaliation," the use of nuclear weapons delivered by air force strategic bombers or missiles as America's major deterrent against aggression. In testimony before a Senate appropriations subcommittee in 1957, Burke vigorously endorsed the president's budget for fiscal 1958, maintaining that it would "give us the maximum in naval power for every dollar requested."

The launching of the Soviet satellite Sputnik in the fall of 1957 opened a debate on defense strategy among different branches of the military and between the military and the administration. Burke joined Generals MAXWELL TAYLOR and JAMES GAVIN of the army in urging the administration to reorient its defense policies. They pointed out that with the two superpowers gradually reaching nuclear parity, general warfare would be replaced by limited wars. Burke cautioned that the Soviet Union was still bent on "engulfing the whole world," but because it had been thwarted by American nuclear power, it would not stage a large-scale attack. Instead it would adopt a "piecemeal approach to world domination." Burke opposed demands by the air force for an emphasis on missiles, and he pointed to the need to develop conventional forces such as the navy to meet the challenge of limited war. Anxious to preserve the twin roles of his service, he maintained that the navy could fight both limited and full-scale wars with the use of such weapons as aircraft carriers and submarines equipped with missiles.

Burke opposed the administration's defense budget and urged major increases to prepare the armed forces to fight both nuclear and limited wars. He alleged that the administration's continuous desire for budget reviews had forced the navy to submit smaller budget requests than needed.

Burke's call for a more varied defense strategy failed to carry much weight until the Kennedy administration, which emphasized "flexible response." Burke continued at his post until August 1961, when he retired from the navy. After his retirement, Burke served on the boards of several major corporations. He died in Bethesda, Md., on January 1, 1996.

Burnham, James

(1905–1987) journalist, writer

The son of a railroad executive, Burnham was born on November 22, 1905, in Chicago. He received his B.A. from Princeton University in 1927, and attended Oxford University, where he earned an M.A. in 1929. From 1930 to 1954, he was professor of philosophy at New York University. He coedited the left-wing literary and philosophical review, The Symposium, from 1930 to 1933. In the latter year, Burnham became a Trotskyist. The Depression seems to have convinced him that capitalism was doomed and that communism was the solution to the problems that caused the collapse of capitalism, but he hated Stalin. In 1934, he became coeditor of the New Internationalist, a journal of American Trotskyists. At the end of the 1930s, forced collectivization, Stalin's purges, and the Nazi-Soviet pact convinced Burnham to reject Trotsky's belief that the USSR was a “progressive workers” state, which must be defended despite Stalin’s actions. Quitting the New International in 1940, he forcefully broke away from Trotsky and renounced his former pro-Soviet sympathies.

Burnham was still viewed by many as a leftist, albeit anticommunist, when he wrote The Managerial Revolution in 1941. In that book, he argued that capitalism was entering a new phase, in which hired managers would wrest control of the means of production from the owners (shareholders). Capitalism was unable to marshal resources efficiently or fairly; therefore, resources had to be managed by a centralized authority. Thus, he predicted that Germany would defeat England and, after that, three superstates—one in Europe (Germany), one in Asia (Japan), and one in North and South America (the United States)—would emerge and engage in an endless struggle for world domination. For Burnham, the inevitable trend towards managerialism was manifested in the transfer of sovereignty from representative institutions to centralized administrative bodies. Burnham regarded the New Deal as an American, if incipient, version of managerialism.

With the emergence of the cold war, Burnham became intensely anticommunist. Initially, he joined with liberal anticommunists. In 1947, he published The Struggle for the World, which made a powerful case that communism’s implacable goal of world conquest made it the greatest threat to stability in the world. That threat was magnified by the USSR’s nuclear capability. He warned that the United States had to prepare for a struggle to the death with the Soviet Union. At the time he wrote The Struggle for the World, Burnham still considered himself on the left, but he was clearly moving rightward. He supported, with only minor reservations, aggressive attempts to root out communism at home. In foreign policy, he rejected containment and advocated liberation of communist nations by propaganda and subversion, which he called “polwar.”

In Containment or Liberation? (1953), Burnham brilliantly exposed flaws in the argument for containment, but he was somewhat vague with respect to how liberation might be achieved. He proposed recognition of governments in exile, recruiting and military training of refugees, propaganda, and the threat of force from noncommunist allies.

The following year, Burnham published The Web of Subversion, in which he maintained that communist infiltration of the American government, particularly the State Department, since the 1930s accounted for events such as the Soviet domination of Eastern Europe and the fall of mainland China to the Communists.

Burnham claimed to be without bias for or against Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), although he believed that McCarthy’s opponents were dupes of the communists. In November 1954, he did oppose efforts in the Senate to censure McCarthy. He believed, in retrospect, that McCarthyism had a larger significance than the question of communism in government. Burnham used the issue to introduce one of the major elements in postwar conservative thought. He wrote, “The issue was philosophical, metaphysical: what kind of community are we. And the Liberals were correct in labeling McCarthy The Enemy, and in destroying him. From the Liberal standpoint—secularist, egalitarian, relativist—the line is now drawn, Relativism must be Absolute.”

Burnham revised his advocacy of the liberation of Eastern Europe after the Hungarian uprising of 1956. He remained conspicuously silent while the United States watched the USSR crush the Hungarian rebels and only later claimed that a properly timed U.S. ultimatum would have dissuaded the Russians from intervening. To the disappointment of his conservative colleagues, he now suggested a mutual withdrawal of North Atlantic Treaty Organization and Warsaw Pact divisions from Europe and the neutralization of central Europe.

When WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR., began publishing the conservative National Review in 1955, Burnham became one of the original members of the editorial board. He soon emerged as Buckley’s second in command. Although liberals tended to dismiss Burnham as a right-wing crank, some of his fellow editors at the National Review regarded him as too pragmatic. Buckley, however, continued to support Burnham, who contributed a regular column to the magazine for two decades. In it, Burnham focused on matters of defense and foreign policy and maintained an uncompromising anticommunist stand. He became disillusioned with the foreign policy of JOHN FOSTER DULLES and DWIGHT EISENHOWER. Burnham was initially impressed with JOHN F. KENNEDY's policy of flexible response and his aggressive anticommunism. That enthusiasm quickly waned. Burnham supported the war in Vietnam but was highly critical of what he regarded as a no-win policy. He believed that the war could be won and called for more aggressive military action to achieve that end.

Burnham was also concerned about the expansion of federal power. This led him to oppose the Supreme Court's ruling, in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), that segregated schools violated the Constitution. Although he was not himself a bigot, his opposition to federal power led him to support southern opposition to the decision and to civil rights measures in general.

Despite his profound conservatism, he occasionally adopted quirky positions. For example, he applauded the Woodstock festival and supported the treaty negotiated by President Jimmy Carter to transfer the Panama Canal to Panama. Such stands, along with his support for NELSON ROCKEFELLER, made him suspect to his colleagues at the National Review. Buckley, nevertheless, continued to support Burnham, who remained with the magazine until a massive stroke disabled him in 1978. He died in Kent, Conn., on July 28, 1987.

Burns, Arthur F(rank)

(1904–1987) chairman, Council of Economic Advisers

Born in Stanislau, Austria, on April 27, 1904, Arthur Burns emigrated to the United States with his parents and grew up in Bayonne, N.J. He worked his way through Columbia University, earning a B.A., an M.A. in economics in 1925, and a Ph.D. in 1934. Burns began teaching at Rutgers University in 1927; by 1943, he had become a full professor. The following year, he joined the Columbia faculty as a full professor.

In addition to teaching, Burns produced studies for the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private organization engaged in statistical research on economic issues. Through his work with the National Bureau, of which he became director of research in 1948, he emerged as an acknowledged expert on business cycles.

During the mid- and late 1930s, American economists debated the theories of the British economist John Maynard Keynes, who advocated direct government intervention in the economy. Burns accepted some of Keynes's ideas but thought American Keynesians simplistic in their application of Keynes's theories. Burns maintained that each industry had its own cycle; when several turned downward at the same time, a depression resulted. Therefore, any intervention by the government, argued Burns, had to be highly selective. Among his studies were Production Trends in the United States Since 1870 (1934), his doctoral dissertation, and Measuring Business Cycles (1946), written in collaboration with Wesley Mitchell, who had been his doctor, adviser, and whom Burns regarded as the principal influence on his thought.

In 1946, Burns published a critique of Keynesian economics. In general, Burns's economics were moderately conservative; he favored a free market and increased competition but also recognized that government had a role to play in fostering economic stability and leveling business cycles. In 1951, he praised the existing distribution of income in America and said that any future redistribution should not come by transferring income from the rich to the poor but by increasing the productivity of those at the bottom through encouragement of increased competition and small business. Burns criticized the "free money" policies of the Truman administration.

In March 1953, President Eisenhower appointed Burns a member of the Council of Economic Advisers. That August, Burns became chairman of the council. At the outset of his tenure, he had to defend the very existence of the council against congressional Republicans who had grown hostile to the agency during the Truman years. Burns managed to maintain the council and its staff intact, and he exercised a key role in the making of economic policy during Eisenhower's first term.

According to presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS, "Arthur Burns turned out to be a pleasant surprise. He and Eisenhower got along fine. They shared the same outlook and philosophy. Far from being the abstract and impractical professor, Burns had his feet planted solidly on the ground and had no difficulty in more than holding his own in arguments at the cabinet table with such hard-headed protagonists as [GEORGE] HUMPHREY and [JOSEPH] DODGE.”

In 1953, Burns correctly predicted that the restrictive credit policies being pursued by the Treasury and the Federal Reserve would contribute to an economic slowdown. During the recession of 1953–54, Burns resisted a major recovery program. He thought that economic indicators pointed to a milder recession than most economists predicted. The administration subsequently applied the policies he recommended: liberalization of credit combined with tax cuts. The administration allowed the expiration of the excess profits tax and the Korean War increases in the personal income and excise rates. These reductions added $7.4 billion to disposable income and helped fuel the prosperity of 1954–55.

In general, Burns favored monetary over fiscal stimulation of the economy. “The more you can get out of monetary policy,” he said, “the less you need to get out of fiscal policy, with its headaches about deficits, the public debt, and the like.” Burns sought, with mixed success, to get the Federal Reserve to ease up on credit restrictions, particularly in the area of housing. He also backed a liberalization of the Federal Housing Authority’s lending rules in order to stimulate housing starts and home modernization. To guard against inflation, however, Burns sometimes favored credit restrictions, as in January 1956, when he unsuccessfully argued at a cabinet meeting in favor of controls on consumer credit.

Since the late 1940s, Burns held that maintaining employment was the primary objective of government. He also believed that inflation represented a serious problem that government had to address. On the whole, Burns was more willing than President Eisenhower’s more conservative advisers to resort to public works to promote economic expansion. He supported the idea of an ambitious highway-building program. In 1955, he helped prepare a plan to aid chronically depressed areas such as New England textile towns and the Appalachian coal country. The plan called for the formation of an area redevelopment agency within the Commerce Department to extend capital improvement loans to depressed communities. President Eisenhower originally favored the idea but withdrew his support when Democrats in Congress expanded the proposal. Area redevelopment legislation remained stymied throughout the 1950s.

Burns left the Eisenhower administration in November 1956, and returned to his work at Columbia University and the National Bureau of Economic Research. He continued to advise the administration, as in March 1960 when he warned Vice President RICHARD NIXON that the Republicans would lose the November election unless the administration cut taxes to combat the current recession. Nixon took Burns’s counsel to a cabinet meeting, but the president was reluctant to add to the already sizeable deficit and ruled out a tax reduction. The recession continued to the end of the year, and Nixon lost the presidential contest by a narrow margin to Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.).

Burns served on Kennedy’s Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy. During the Kennedy-Johnson years, he frequently spoke out on economic policy, often in opposition to the fiscal activism of Democratic economic policymakers. Burns’s version of economic stimulus called for a revision of progressive tax laws to lower rates on corporations and people with high incomes. He argued that this approach would provide more investment capital and generate more jobs. He steadily advocated less government spending to curb inflation and annual tax cuts to spur economic growth.

In January 1969, President Nixon named Burns counselor to the president and in October nominated him to succeed WILLIAM MCCHESENEY MARTIN as chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. Confirmed by the Senate in December, Burns took office on February 1, 1970. He served until the end of his term in 1978. President James Earl Carter, a Democrat, chose not to reappoint Burns, who took a position at the American Enterprise Institute. Burns served as ambassador to West Germany from 1981 to 1985. He died in Baltimore, Md., on June 6, 1987.

Burton, Harold H(itz)

(1888–1964) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court
Born on June 22, 1888, in Jamaica Plain, Mass., Harold H. Burton graduated from Bowdoin

College in 1909 and from Harvard Law School in 1912. After service in the army during World War I, he practiced law in Cleveland and became a member of the Ohio House of Representatives in 1929. Elected mayor of Cleveland in 1935 as a reform candidate, Burton won reelection twice by wide margins. A Republican, he ran successfully for the U.S. Senate in 1940, despite opposition from the state party leadership. In the Senate, Burton was an internationalist in foreign policy and a moderate on domestic issues. He served as a member of the Senate committee, headed by HARRY S. TRUMAN (D-Mo.), that investigated the defense effort in World War II. President Truman chose Burton as his first nominee to the Supreme Court in September 1945.

On the bench, Burton displayed a conservative orientation. He generally favored judicial restraint and usually voted to uphold government power, especially in loyalty-security cases. Burton did occasionally join the Court's more liberal justices to overturn some aspect of a government anticommunist program, but he based these decisions on narrow statutory or procedural grounds.

Burton adhered to this pattern during his years on the Warren Court. He dissented from a decision in 1956 upsetting state sedition laws and from a ruling in 1957 placing limits on state investigations of subversion. The justice also objected to a decision in 1958 that held the denial of passports to members of the Communist Party illegal. In the same month, Burton spoke for a five-man majority that upheld the dismissal of a public school teacher for incompetency after he had refused to tell school authorities whether he had once been an officer in a communist organization.

In 1953 Burton wrote the majority opinion in a case setting aside the perjury conviction of labor leader HARRY BRIDGES for allegedly having sworn falsely at his naturalization hearing in 1945 that he was not a communist. The justice based his decision on the ground that the statute of limitations had run out before Bridges was indicted. He concurred in a 1957 decision overturning the convictions of California Communist Party leaders under the Smith Act. However, he dissented from the majority opinion that the act did not outlaw the advocacy of the forcible overthrow of the government "as an abstract doctrine." That same year, Burton also took the narrow ground in a case in which the majority ruled that a federal criminal defendant was entitled to see statements government witnesses made to the FBI before trial. In a separate opinion, he said the trial judge should examine the statements before they were turned over to defense counsel and withhold those containing information pertaining to national security.

Burton also tended to uphold government power in criminal rights cases. He frequently voted to sustain convictions in which a defendant alleged that he had been denied the right to counsel or that his confession was coerced. Although Burton usually favored the government position in antitrust cases, he wrote the dissenting opinion when the majority held, in 1957, that the DuPont Co.'s acquisition of General Motors stock in 1917-19 violated the Clayton Antitrust Act. After his first term on the Court, Burton repeatedly voted to outlaw racial segregation and discrimination. In May 1954, he joined in the Court's Brown decision, which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

Burton retired from the Supreme Court in October 1958 because of ill health. Observers of the Court considered him to have been a largely conservative jurist but one with a certain flexibility and independence. A very conscientious and hard-working man, Burton had a reputation both on and off the Court for having a judicial temperament because of his capacity to keep an open mind on issues and to maintain an emotional distance from cases. Nonetheless, most legal scholars have ranked him a mediocre justice at best. Burton did not play a leading role on the Court; he was neither a great scholar nor an original thinker. Although his opinions improved during his years on the Court, they remained rather lackluster and tedious. Burton died in Washington, D.C., on October 28, 1964.

Bush, Prescott S(heldon)

(1895-1972) U.S. senator

Bush was born on May 15, 1895, in Columbus, Ohio, where his father was a steel manufacturer. He attended St. George's School and received a B.A. from Yale University in 1917. After service in World War I, Bush worked for a hardware firm in Saint Louis and the United States Rubber Co. He then became a vice president of W. A. Harriman and Co., a New York City investment firm, in 1926. When Brown Brothers merged with Harriman in 1930, Bush became a partner in the new firm.

From 1935 to 1952, Bush was the moderator of the Representative Town Meeting in Greenwich, Conn. During World War II, he served as campaign chairman for the United Service Organizations (USO) and the National War Fund, Inc. Because of his success as a fund-raiser, he was chosen chairman of the Connecticut Republican State Finance Committee in 1947. Three years later, Bush ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate.

In 1952, Bush opposed Rep. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF (D-Conn.) in a contest to fill the remainder of the term of the late Sen. Brien McMahon (D-Conn.). During the contest, Bush criticized Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), stating that there were "many, like myself, who approve heartily of his goals but hold reservations at times concerning his methods." He defeated Ribicoff in November by 30,000 votes. In 1956, Bush won a full term by defeating Rep. THOMAS J. DODD (D-Conn.) by 128,000 votes.

As a senator, Bush was a flexible conservative. In 1954, he defended the Dixon-Yates contract, stating that it was time for Congress to "contain" the Tennessee Valley Authority and prevent "this sprawling giant" from "groping its way across the country." In 1955, Bush attacked a public highway bill for, among other things, imposing new controls upon the states in the areas of highway construction and operation. In 1956, Bush opposed public power development at Niagara Falls. In 1958, Bush voted against an area redevelopment bill to aid economically distressed regions on the ground that "it would create a new channel into which to pour vast amounts of federal dollars in futile attempts" to cure unemployment.

On a number of issues, however, Bush broke with many of his conservative colleagues. In 1954, he offered a uniform code of committee behavior to prevent McCarthy's continued abuse of investigating committees; later that year he voted to condemn the senator from Wisconsin. In 1955, he expressed regret that a housing bill did not provide for a larger number of public housing units. Bush was a strong backer of President Eisenhower's civil rights bills. In 1957, he opposed an effort by southern senators to weaken a civil rights bill, proposed by the administration, by guaranteeing a jury trial to those accused of contempt for trying to prevent blacks from voting. Three years later, Bush and seven other Republicans joined northern Democrats in an unsuccessful effort to end a southern filibuster of a civil rights bill by invoking cloture. Bush also supported the nomination of Solicitor General SIMON E. SOBELOFF to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, a nomination vigorously opposed by southern segregationists.

During his years in Congress, Bush gained a reputation as an expert on government finance and the national economy. Because of his banking background, he was named to Eisenhower's Commission on Foreign Economic Policy in 1953. Bush concurred with most of the panel's recommendations, including those urging an early termination of economic aid in the form of grants, continuation of a vigorous technical assistance program without huge expenditures, encouragement of U.S. private investment abroad by reducing taxes on income from such investment, and extension of reciprocal trade legislation.

In 1954, as chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee's Subcommittee on Securities, Bush backed the panel's bill amending the Securities Exchange Act. Enacted in August, it permitted a wider dissemination of information about securities before their sale and simplified the procedures involved in the registration of securities issues with the Securities and Exchange Commission. In 1957, he succeeded in amending a Banking and Currency Committee bill to require disclosure of the names of only those persons owning at least 5 percent of the outstanding stock of banks. Three years later, Bush supported an administration bill to remove the statutory ceiling of 4¼ percent on government bond interest rates. When Democrats blocked the measure, Bush denounced them for playing politics with the nation's credit. He asserted that, while interest rates had declined somewhat because of a slight recession in business, rates would rise again as the economy picked up steam.

Bush served as chairman of the Republican National Platform Committee in 1956. Four years later, he chaired the subcommittee that wrote the planks on business, labor, and the economy in the national platform.

Bush generally opposed President JOHN F. KENNEDY's domestic policies. In 1962, he criticized the administration's Trade Expansion Act, which gave the president increased power to cut tariffs through reciprocal agreements. In May 1962, Bush announced that he would not seek reelection for health reasons. He returned to Brown Brothers, Harriman and Co. Bush died in New York City on October 8, 1972.

Bush, Vannevar

(1890–1974) president, Carnegie Institution of Washington; chairman, Massachusetts Institute of Technology Corporation

The son of a Universalist minister, Bush was born on March 11, 1890, in Everett, Mass. He earned both his B.S. and M.S. degrees from Tufts College in 1913, and received his Ph.D. in engineering jointly from Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in 1916. The following year, he worked in a special navy antisubmarine laboratory. Bush joined MIT's faculty in 1919 and became the institute's vice president and dean of its school of engineering in 1932. A prolific inventor, he designed a number of advanced mathematical analyzing instruments, including the differential analyzer, the forerunner of the computer. In 1939, he became the president of the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

In 1940, Bush served as chairman of the National Defense Research Committee (NDRC), formed at his suggestion to direct war-related scientific research. The following year, he became chairman of the Office of Scientific Research and Development (OSRD), which included the NDRC. Bush made no technical contribution to the war effort, but, as an administrator, he was responsible for the development of an array of new weapons, including radar, amphibious vehicles, and the atomic bomb. In June 1945, he advised President

HARRY S. TRUMAN to use the atomic bomb against Japan without prior warning.

After the war, Bush continued to serve on government policy committees. He prepared recommendations on ways in which wartime research could be applied to peace. The report, "Science, the Endless Frontier," urged massive government support for basic research. His recommendations resulted in the establishment of the National Science Foundation in 1950. Bush opposed the development of the hydrogen bomb and urged negotiations to end the arms race.

In the 1950s, Bush was a vocal critic of abuses in security investigations, which he thought had retarded weapons research by undermining scientists' morale. He was particularly alarmed by the Oppenheimer security hearings in 1954. J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER had directed the development of the atomic bomb and had served as chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) General Advisory Committee (GAC) in the early postwar period. Because of Oppenheimer's prewar involvement with leftist groups and his postwar reservations about the development of the hydrogen bomb, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER ordered his security clearance suspended in late 1953 pending a hearing. Bush objected to the charges and urged that they be "redrafted in such a way as to remove all implication that Oppenheimer was being tried for his opinions."

Following the AEC's decision to continue the suspension of Oppenheimer's clearance, Bush wrote in the New York Times, "... there should be no insistence that any individual cease his thinking at any time, or that he suppress his honest opinion in order slavishly to follow a policy abstractly laid down." In an address to the American Association for the Advancement of Science in December 1954, he declared that "useful men" were "denied the opportunity to contribute to our scientific efforts because of their youthful indiscretions." In an apparent reference to Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), he accused "ruthless, ambitious men" of using "our loyalty procedures for political purposes."

In 1957, Bush became chairman of the MIT Corporation and in 1959 its honorary chairman. He continued to write and lecture on national defense through the 1960s. In 1970, he and JAMES CONANT received the Atomic Pioneers Award from the AEC. After suffering a stroke, Bush died of pneumonia in Belmont, Mass., on June 28, 1974.

Butler, John Marshall

Born in Baltimore, Md., on July 21, 1897, Butler attended public schools and served in the army during World War I. After attending Johns Hopkins University in 1919 and 1921, he went to work in his father's real estate business. He graduated from the University of Maryland Law School in 1926. That same year, he commenced the practice of law with the firm of Venable, Baetjer & Howard in Baltimore, where he would remain for 20 years. After serving as a member of the City Service Commission (1947–49), he won election to the U.S. Senate in 1950. That election, in which Butler defeated Millard E. Tydings (a four-term Democratic incumbent), received national attention for the unethical tactics employed by Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY against Tydings, who had chaired the Senate committee that dismissed McCarthy's initial charges that communists worked in the State Department. The defeat of Tydings contributed to the myth of McCarthy's invincibility. After all, Franklin D. Roosevelt had attempted to purge Tydings in the Democratic primary of 1938 and failed. In fact, however, Tydings was more vulnerable than he appeared. A southern Democrat who was hostile to labor and civil rights, Tydings had the support of neither labor nor black voters. Moreover, although Maryland's voter registration was overwhelmingly Democratic, Democratic vote totals had been declining in recent elections. Further, the growth of the Washington suburbs changed the complexion of the Democratic vote; the government workers and professionals who lived in those suburbs tended to be New Deal Democrats and unsympathetic to Tydings. Perhaps most important, in an off-year election, the Democratic governor, W. Preston Lane, headed the party's ticket. Lane had signed into law the state's first sales tax, which had proved extremely unpopular, and had won renomination only after a bitter primary contest. Indeed, George P. Mahoney had gotten more votes in the primary election but lost because of the effect of the state's unit rule. In the general election, THEODORE ROOSEVELT MCKELDIN, the popular former mayor of Baltimore and a liberal Republican, handily defeated Lane. Even while going down to defeat, Tydings ran well ahead of Lane and every other Democrat on the state ticket.

Furious over McCarthy's campaign tactics, Tydings petitioned the Senate to disqualify Butler. The Senate convened a special election subcommittee to investigate the charges. The unanimous report found that Butler had used "despicable methods in unseating Tydings" and condemned McCarthy's activities in the campaign. It did not, however, recommend expulsion.

In the Senate, Butler compiled a generally conservative record. He supported attempts to return offshore oil lands to the states and voted for the Bricker amendment. He also introduced a bill that became the Communist Control Act of 1954. The McCarran Internal Security Act of 1950 required organizations designated as "communist action" and "communist front" by the Subversive Activities Control Board to register with the attorney general. Butler's bill proposed to mandate registration of a third group, "communist infiltrated" organizations. Liberals, led by HUBERT HUMPHREY, introduced an amendment that declared the communist party an "agency of a hostile foreign power" and therefore not entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities legal bodies enjoyed. The amendment passed, as did the entire bill. After the Senate voted to censure McCarthy, the senator from Wisconsin unleashed an attack on the president, in which he apologized to the American people for having urged them to vote for Eisenhower. Butler, who had voted against censure, quickly distanced himself from McCarthy's diatribe, as did most of those who had opposed the censure motion.

Butler was reelected in 1956, and served until January 2, 1963, after he chose not to be a candidate for reelection in 1962. He resided in Baltimore until his death from a heart attack in Rocky Mount, N.C., on March 14, 1978.

Butler, Paul M(ulholland)

(1905–1961) chairman, Democratic National Committee

Butler was born on June 15, 1905, in South Bend, Ind. He received an LL.B. degree from Notre Dame law school in 1927 and established a legal practice in South Bend. During the 1930s and 1940s, he gradually rose in the ranks of the state Democratic Party. In 1952 he ousted Frank McHale, a friend of President HARRY S. TRUMAN, as Democratic National Committeeman from Indiana. At the Democratic National Convention that year, Butler was one of the principal supporters of Gov. ADLAI E. STEVENSON of Illinois.

In 1954, Butler was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee over Truman's strenuous opposition. The committee's functions were normally limited to raising money, organizing presidential nominating conventions, and providing assistance in the management of campaigns. However, in the absence of a Democratic president, Butler sought to transform the panel into an instrument of national party leadership. To accomplish this, he advocated more aggressive political attacks on the Eisenhower administration and pushed for the adoption of a clear-cut, liberal national platform.

The day after his election as chairman, Butler directly attacked President Eisenhower for failing to unite the nation. Until then, most Democrats had criticized only the men around the president. In 1956, Butler urged the party to adopt a strong civil rights platform and to endorse the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision of 1954. His strong stand earned him the enmity of southern leaders, who accused him of having dared the South to bolt the party.

Immediately after the presidential election of 1956, Butler asserted that Senate Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) were too moderate and too conciliatory towards the administration. Butler charged that congressional Democrats had not played "the true role of an opposition party from 1952 up to the [1956] presidential campaign." On November 27, 1956, the National Committee voted to create the Democratic Advisory Council to enable Northern liberals to circumvent those leaders in the formulation of Democratic legislative programs. Johnson and Rayburn refused to join the council, although Stevenson and Truman participated in its efforts.

Under Butler's chairmanship, the National Committee took several other measures to centralize and unify the party under its direction. It appointed six regional representatives to coordinate state and national programs, created a program for training precinct workers, and inaugurated executive leadership conferences for state and county party officials.

In 1960, the uneasy truce between Truman and Butler was broken when the former president charged Butler with rigging the national convention in favor of Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). Truman resigned as a Missouri delegate before the gathering convened. Following Kennedy's nomination, Butler announced that he would not seek another term as committee chairman. At Kennedy's behest, the committee chose Sen. HENRY M. JACKSON (D-Wash.) to succeed Butler.

Butler retired from politics to practice law in Washington, D.C., where he died of a heart attack on December 30, 1961.

Byrd, Harry F(lood)

Born on June 10, 1887, in Martinsburg, W. Va., Harry Byrd was the scion of a Virginia line dating back to 1674. His father was a lawyer, newspaper publisher, and one-time speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates. Byrd left school at the age of 15 to restore his father's paper, the Winchester Star, to solvency. At the age of 20, he established his own newspaper in Martinsburg, W. Va., and in 1923 acquired the Harrisonburg (Va.) News-Record. Byrd also became involved in apple growing. His chain of orchards in the Shenandoah Valley grew to one of the largest in the world.

Byrd entered the Virginia State Senate in 1915 and within a decade became the dominant figure in Virginia politics. He remained so for the next 40 years. A master political technician, Byrd built a durable personal fiefdom out of the existing Democratic machine based on farmers, rural businessmen, county courthouse cliques, and the virtual disenfranchisement of most black citizens. He won prominence by his key role in the defeat of a bond issue for roads in 1923. The “pay-as-you-go” principle of government finance became the trademark of Byrd’s political career. He served as Virginia’s governor from 1926 to 1930, and his frugal regime was considered innovative and successful. Appointed to the Senate in 1933 at the urging of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Byrd ironically became one of the most bitter opponents of the New Deal. With his installment as chairman of the newly created Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures in 1941, he attained a forum for his sallies against unbalanced budgets and social welfare programs.

In the 1950s, Byrd was one of the Senate’s most influential members, possessing two decades of experience and senior positions on the powerful Armed Services Committee and the Finance Committee. (He became chairman of the latter in 1955.) In the presidential election of 1952, he refused to endorse the Democratic ticket headed by ADLAI STEVENSON. Virginia’s 12 electoral votes went to the Republican candidate, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Byrd’s unflagging pursuit of economy in government frequently placed him in opposition to the Eisenhower administration as well as his fellow Democrats. He often voted against public works bills, including the great public works projects of the decade, the Saint Lawrence Seaway and the national highway program. He consistently fought to eliminate all economic assistance from foreign-aid packages. In 1955, Byrd opposed a salary increase for members of Congress and a $20 tax cut for lower income families. In 1957, he called upon President Eisenhower to make $5 billion in budget cuts and to replace Budget Director PERCIVAL F. BRUNDAGE for not pruning aggressively enough. Byrd also worked to block enactment of his Democratic colleagues’ social measures. In 1960, he opposed federal aid to education, federal aid for areas beset by chronic unemployment, an increase in the minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 an hour, and Medicare.

In the wake of the Supreme Court’s ruling in 1954 that struck down school segregation, Byrd moved to the forefront of the southern crusade to maintain segregation and states rights. His call for “massive resistance” in February 1956 became a rallying cry for those determined to oppose even token desegregation. In March, he helped mobilize the signing of the “Southern Manifesto,” which denounced the Court’s decision in the school segregation cases and pledged to “use all lawful means” to bring about its reversal. One hundred and one southern members of Congress signed the document.

Within Virginia, the Byrd organization was the backbone of the legislative effort to frustrate school desegregation. In 1956, the Virginia legislature enacted laws requiring the governor to close a public school rather than allow it to be integrated and providing tuition grants to students attending segregated private schools in their place. In September 1958, Gov. J. LINDSAY ALMOND ordered the closing of several public schools. In January 1959, the courts invalidated Virginia’s massive resistance laws. Almond permitted the schools to reopen, but Byrd remained in adamant opposition.

A national symbol of unbudging resistance to integration, deficit-spending, and the welfare state, Byrd received demonstrations of support in the presidential elections of 1956 and 1960. Although not a declared candidate, he won 134,157 votes for president in 1956. In the election of 1960, he received the electoral votes of Mississippi, Alabama, and one Oklahoma Republican elector, for a total of 15.

The crumbling of massive resistance speeded the atrophy of the Byrd machine. The growth of the state’s urban areas and the decline in the state’s agricultural population gradually undermined its rural foundation, while legislative reapportionment and the repeal of the poll tax in the 1960s ended the systematic exclusion of potential contending groups that had aided the Byrd organization for half a century. Declining in influence and in failing health, Byrd resigned from the Senate in November 1965; his son, Harry F. Byrd, Jr., was appointed his successor. The elder Byrd died of a brain tumor on October 20, 1966, in Berryville, Va.

Byrd, Robert C(arlyle)

(1918–) U.S. congressman and senator

Born on January 15, 1918, in North Wilkesboro, N.C., and orphaned at the age of 10 months, Byrd was raised in West Virginia by his uncle, a poor coal miner. After graduating from high school, Byrd worked as a butcher. During World War II, he worked in shipyards in Maryland and Florida. In 1942, he was an active organizer for the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) but left the group after about a year. Byrd won a seat in the West Virginia House of Delegates in 1946 and was reelected in 1948. Two years later, he ran a successful campaign for the state Senate.

In 1952, Byrd sought a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives from his state's sixth congressional district, a coal mining region that included the city of Charleston. Byrd won the primary, but during the general election campaign, his opponent revealed that in 1946 Byrd had expressed a renewed interest in the Klan in a letter to its Imperial Wizard. Gov. Okey Patteson demanded that Byrd abandon the race, and the Democratic Party withdrew its backing. Byrd, however, renounced the KKK, continued his campaign, and defeated his Republican opponent with 55.6 percent of the vote.

As a representative, Byrd was most vocal in matters affecting coal miners and the coal industry, the major interest groups of his district. Having won election with labor's backing, he supported a proposal in the House to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act in 1953. Byrd also devoted considerable attention to protecting the coal industry against competition from alternative forms of energy. In 1953 and 1955, he unsuccessfully attempted to add oil import quotas to bills extending reciprocal trade laws. In June 1957, Byrd warned against importing natural gas from Canada, asserting that it "would create a serious impact upon the economy of the coal regions of West Virginia and neighboring states."

Byrd ran for the Senate in 1958. Making the recession the major issue in his campaign, he defeated the Republican incumbent, Sen. Chapman Rivercomb, with 59.2 percent of the vote. A moderate Democrat, Byrd voted with the upper chamber's southern Democratic-conservative Republican coalition on 42 percent of key roll calls in 1959 and 1960. In January 1959, he opposed a liberal effort to modify Senate Rule 22 to facilitate the invoking of cloture against southern filibusters. He voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1960 after opposing attempts to expand the scope of its coverage.

Byrd backed Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON's (D-Tex.) presidential bid in 1960, but when Johnson declined to enter the May West Virginia primary, he supported Sen. HUMBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.). Byrd denied the contention of some critics that his endorsement was influenced by Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY's (D-Mass.) Catholicism.

An energetic and tireless worker, Byrd moved up in the Senate Democratic hierarchy during the 1960s and early-1970s. In 1971, he became majority whip. Byrd succeed JOHN McCORMACK (D-Mass.) as majority leader in 1977. He is perhaps best known for his flowery oratorical style and his ability to bring pork barrel spending to his home state.

Byrnes, James F(rancis)

(1879–1972) governor of South Carolina

The son of Irish immigrants, Byrnes was born on May 2, 1879, in Charleston, S.C. He was apprenticed as a law clerk at the age of 14. Byrnes became a court stenographer at 21, studied law in his spare time, and was admitted to the South Carolina bar in 1903. That year, he bought the Aiken (S.C.) Journal and Review, which he edited until 1907. A Democrat, Byrnes was elected solicitor of the second judicial circuit in 1908, and two years later won election to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he served until 1925. He ran unsuccessfully for the Senate in 1924, but won a seat six years later.

Following Roosevelt's election in 1932, Byrnes served as one of the president's chief legislative tacticians and the de facto leader of congressional Democrats. After 1936, however, Byrnes joined the southern Democratic opposition to the New Deal. With the advent of World War II in 1939, he muted his differences with the president and helped to repeal the Neutrality Act and pass the lend-lease bill. In 1941, Roosevelt appointed Byrnes associate justice of the Supreme Court. He stepped down 16 months later to head the Office of Economic Stabilization. In 1943, Byrnes became director of the Office of War Mobilization, where he supervised the production of war and civilian goods. Roosevelt described him as "assistant president on the home front."

Byrnes accompanied Roosevelt to the Yalta Conference in 1945, and, after Roosevelt's death, became secretary of state. He was one of Truman's closest advisers, helping make the decision to drop the atomic bomb on Japan and formulating policy toward the Soviet Union. As secretary of state, Byrnes sought a postwar settlement that would prevent Soviet control over Eastern Europe and retain the American atomic monopoly. Byrnes resigned in 1947 in a disagreement over Truman's domestic program, particularly regarding civil rights. After a period of silence, he denounced Truman's domestic policies and the movement toward a strong, centralized government.

In January 1950, Byrnes was elected governor of South Carolina on a states' rights platform. While in office, he pushed through the legislature a school administration reorganization plan, an anti-masking bill aimed at the Ku Klux Klan, a right-to-work law forbidding compulsory union membership, and a statute increasing support for state colleges. He also obtained immediate approval for a new mental health bond issue.

Byrnes's primary focus was on the restoration of states' rights, particularly what he believed was their right to maintain segregation. The governor thought three things were necessary to restore those rights: increased state responsibility toward African Americans to give them equal facilities and services without integration; a determined stand by states to prevent further federal inroads, particularly in civil rights and school segregation; and cooperative action by southern states to prevent the continued growth of federal power.

After the NAACP filed suit against the segregated schools of Clarendon Co., Byrnes proposed and the legislature passed a 3 percent sales tax and a $75 million school bond issue to upgrade black facilities. As a former justice of the Supreme Court, he understood the direction of recent rulings and hoped that equalization of facilities would enable him to preserve segregation. While developing his school equalization program, Byrnes had the legislature enact measures to counter possible federal intervention to desegregate local schools. School boards were authorized to transfer their property to private hands. A pupil-assignment law required students switching schools to receive written permission from both institutions. Byrnes created the first group in the South to map out strategy to maintain segregation. Headed by state Sen. L. Marion Gressette, the so-called Gressette Committee suggested that South Carolina drop the state constitutional provision requiring free public schools. Byrnes approved the recommendation and called for action on the proposal in January 1952. The legislature responded, and voters ratified the amendment in the elections of November 1952.

Byrnes denounced the Supreme Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which declared segregated school facilities unconstitutional. The ruling directly affected South Carolina, because a challenge to the school system of Clarendon Co. had been one of the cases that the Court decided in Brown. The governor maintained that the validity of the Constitution was ageless and that previous decisions supporting segregation should not be overturned. That year, he supported segregationist Lt. Gov. GEORGE BELL TIMMERMAN for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. In 1957, when Eisenhower sent troops into Little Rock, Ark., to desegregate its Central High School, Byrnes denounced the action. Byrnes maintained that "sensible Negroes" "know that when integration occurs, there will cease to be education for either the white or colored child."

In response to his desire to revive regional unity, Byrnes urged the South to become independent of the Democratic Party. In major addresses before the Virginia and Georgia legislatures in 1952, he denounced the growth of federal power under Truman, particularly its intrusion into the area of civil rights, and called on the South to put principle before party. When Eisenhower won the Republican nomination, Byrnes openly supported him and was responsible for the general's stronger showing in the South than any Republican candidate since Reconstruction. In September 1953, National Democratic Chairman STEPHEN A. MITCHELL read Byrnes out of the party. In March 1956, Byrnes, Timmerman, and Sen. STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.) tried to force South Carolina to break with the national Democrats. When this movement collapsed in October, Byrnes endorsed Sen. HARRY F. BYRD (D-Va.) for president. Following Eisenhower's reelection, Byrnes accused Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL of persuading the president to support black demands in return for votes.

Unable to serve a second term under South Carolina law, Byrnes retired in 1955. Throughout the remainder of the 1950s, he lent prestige and dignity to the segregationist cause. He supported conservative Sen. BARRY M. GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) for president in 1964 and RICHARD NIXON in 1968. Byrnes died in Columbia, S.C., on April 9, 1972.

Byrnes, John W(illiam)

(1913–1985) U.S. congressman

John Byrnes was born on June 12, 1913, in Green Bay, Wis. He received his B.A. from the University of Wisconsin in 1936 and his law degree from the same institution two years later. After practicing law briefly, he was appointed special deputy commissioner of banking for Wisconsin in 1938. He stayed in that post until his election to the state senate as a Republican in 1940. In 1943, he became majority leader and the next year won election to the U.S. House of Representatives.

A fiscal conservative, Byrnes vocally opposed Democratic social welfare programs and deficit-spending. He also advocated economy in government. Named to the Ways and Means Committee in 1947, Byrnes gradually rose to prominence in the House as a Republican spokesman on tax and fiscal policy.

During the 1950s, Byrnes was a Republican Party loyalist and usually a faithful supporter of the Eisenhower administration. In February 1953, he was one of only four members of the Ways and Means Committee to vote against an income tax cut being pushed by the committee's chairman, Rep. DANIEL REED (R-N.Y.), but opposed by the Eisenhower administration.

Byrnes generally favored tax measures designed to benefit specific sectors of business, such as the oil depletion allowance and the credit for stock dividend income. In 1954, the House passed his motion to give working parents a tax deduction of up to $600 for child care expenses. Four years later, however, Byrnes opposed the Keogh plan, a proposal to allow self-employed individuals to set up tax-sheltered retirement plans. He said that it provided no relief for millions of other persons who contributed to the Social Security system and were not permitted to deduct their contributions from their taxable income.

Byrnes was often in the forefront of efforts to curb federal spending. When the Eisenhower administration requested a $5 billion increase in the national debt ceiling in January 1958, Byrnes put forth a proposal to limit the rise to $3 billion. The House rejected Byrnes's measure, 275-114. In April, he again led the economy bloc in a battle over a Democratic bill expanding unemployment benefits. His proposal to limit benefits to workers currently insured lost in the Ways and Means Committee, 14-7. In 1960, he opposed the Democrats' proposal for Medicare and opposed a 7½ percent pay increase for federal workers.

In 1959, Byrnes became chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee after helping Rep. CHARLES A. HALLECK (R-Ind.) depose Rep. JOSEPH W. MARTIN (R-Mass.) as House minority leader. Over the next decade, Byrnes led Republican opposition to social legislation supported by the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, while working closely with Ways and Means Committee chairman Rep. WILBUR MILLS (D-Ark.) to round up a bipartisan consensus on tax measures. Byrnes retired in 1973 and resided in Arlington, Va., until his death in Marshfield, Wisc., on January 12, 1985.

Cabot, John M(oors)

(1901–1981) assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, ambassador to Sweden, ambassador to Colombia, ambassador to Brazil

A member of the prominent Cabot family of Boston, John Moors Cabot was born in Cambridge, Mass., on December 11, 1901. He graduated magna cum laude from Harvard University in 1923 and took a degree in modern history at Oxford University two years later. Cabot began his diplomatic career in 1927 as vice-counsel in Callao, Peru. Thereafter, he was posted to the Dominican Republic and Mexico. As chargé d'affaires in Belgrade from 1946 to 1947, he observed and reported the split between Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union. He served as United States consul general in Shanghai until the victory of the Chinese Communists in 1949.

In February 1953, President Eisenhower named Cabot assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs. In his first month in office, Cabot led the U.S. delegation at the Inter-American Economic and Social Conference in Caracas, Venezuela. There Cabot outlined what all assumed was the official Eisenhower policy for the hemisphere. He recommended continued U.S. technical assistance, considerable movement of federal and particularly private funds to Latin America, and equitable trade relations. Speaking later in the United States, Cabot warned that import curbs on Latin American products damaged the ideals of Pan-Americanism and could serve only to abet communist subversion in the hemisphere. He argued that to deal effectively with the communists, the United States had to cut its ties with reactionary regimes and seize the leadership of social reform in Latin America.

Cabot failed to realize his designs. His efforts to make more use of the Export-Import Bank for long-term development loans were vetoed by Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY, who wanted to restrict the bank's role and favored loans for short-term purposes only. The administration also imposed import restrictions on many Latin American products. His conflicts with Humphrey led to Cabot's resignation in February 1954.

Cabot was immediately named ambassador to Sweden. He became ambassador to Colombia in April 1957 and remained there until May 1959, when he was transferred to Brazil.

Cabot arrived there at a period when Brazilian-American relations were strained by growing nationalist feelings and the belief that the United States was insensitive to Latin American needs. Although he frequently spoke before Brazilian student groups in an effort to reduce hostility toward the United States, he could not restrain the government's development of an independent foreign policy.

President JOHN F. KENNEDY asked Cabot to stay on in Brazil because of the ambassador's sympathy for his administration's Latin American policy. However, Cabot's difficulties with the new Brazilian president forced him to leave his post in August 1961. He served as ambassador to Poland from December 1961 to August 1965 and retired from the State Department in 1966. Subsequently, he taught at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University and the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University. He died in New York City on February 23, 1981.

Campbell, Joseph

(1900–1984) member, Atomic Energy Commission; U.S. controller general

Campbell was born on March 25, 1900, in New York City. He received an A.B. degree from Columbia University in 1924, and then began a career in accounting with the firm of Lingley, Baird and Dixon. He established his own firm nine years later. During the 1940s, he served as assistant treasurer of Columbia University and in 1949 was appointed treasurer and vice president.

President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Campbell to the five-man Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) in 1953. During his year on the panel, he was involved in two major controversies of the early Eisenhower administration: the decision to deny scientist J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER security clearance and the decision to approve the Dixon-Yates contract. In June 1954, Campbell voted with the four-man majority to deny Oppenheimer security clearance. The majority did not find him a security risk but nevertheless voted to deny clearance because of “fundamental defects” in character. It also found that “his association with . . . communists had extended far beyond the tolerable limits of prudence . . . expected of one holding high government position.”

Campbell joined the AEC’s chairman, LEWIS STRAUSS, in backing the Dixon-Yates contract in 1954. This agreement provided for a private utility to construct a hydroelectric plant near West Memphis, Ark. The company would then have sold power to AEC installations in the area, replacing the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) as the supplier. The contract aroused a storm of protest from advocates of public power, who opposed the replacement of power produced by the government-operated TVA. The contract was canceled in June 1955, after the Democrats had regained control of Congress and after revelations of possible improprieties in the negotiation of the contract.

In January 1955, Campbell was appointed to a 15-year term as controller general. A nonpolitical position involving no policymaking functions, the controller advised Congress on legislative matters, audited government programs, and offered recommendations designed to make government operations more efficient and effective. During the Eisenhower administration, Campbell testified against the president’s highway program of 1955, warning that the moral-obligation bonds Eisenhower intended to use to finance the project were illegal under existing laws. Several years later, he criticized the air force’s management of the $2-billion intercontinental ballistic missile program because the service had shifted responsibility for the project to private industry.

In December 1960, Campbell attempted to cut off funds to the State Department inspector general’s office for withholding from Congress information on U.S. aid to Latin America. The administration, terming the data confidential, supported the State Department. Eisenhower ordered Secretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER to ignore Campbell’s order.

Campbell resigned his post in 1965, before his term expired. He died in Sarasota, Fla., on June 21, 1984.

Cannon, Howard W(alter)

(1912–2002) U.S. senator

The son of a banker and rancher, Cannon was born on January 26, 1912, in Saint George, Utah. He received a law degree from the University of Arizona in 1937, and opened a practice in Utah the following year. After service in the army air corps during World War II, he became a partner in a Las Vegas legal firm. He was elected Las Vegas city attorney in 1949 and occupied that post for eight years. In 1956, he lost the Democratic primary for a U.S. House seat.

Two years later, Cannon entered the Nevada senatorial race against the Republican incumbent, George W. Malone. The campaign pitted Cannon, whose ties were with the new, growing industrial concerns of southern Nevada, against the conservative Malone, allied with the mining interests of the North and West. Attacking the Republican as an isolationist and conservative, Cannon won the race with 56 percent of the vote. Cannon benefitted from the nationwide Democratic trend, but equally important was the backing of organized labor and the strong support he received from Las Vegas. These provided Cannon's political base throughout his career.

During his first two years in the Senate, Cannon compiled a moderately liberal record. In 1959, he supported two housing bills vetoed by President Eisenhower, who contended that they were too expensive. The following year, Cannon voted to override a presidential veto of an area redevelopment bill providing federal aid to depressed regions. In June 1959, he joined a majority of senators in rejecting the nomination of former Atomic Energy Commission Chairman LEWIS L. STRAUSS as secretary of commerce on the ground that he had been excessively influenced by private business.

In 1959, Cannon opposed an effort by liberals to ease the Senate's filibuster rules. These required a two-thirds vote of the entire Senate to stop debate and provided that debate could not be shut off on proposals to consider changes in Senate rules. Liberals wanted to permit imposition of cloture by majority vote of the entire chamber and by 60 percent of those voting. Instead, Cannon backed a revision introduced by Senate Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) that would have permitted two-thirds of those voting to shut off debate on all measures, including rules changes.

A member of the Armed Services and Aeronautical and Space Committees, Cannon was a strong backer of military spending and the space program in the 1960s. He also supported President Johnson's Vietnam policies. Cannon served on the commerce committee for 24 years and played a role in deregulating the trucking and airline industries. He first received significant national attention in 1973 when, as chairman of the Rules and Administration Committee, he led its hearings on President RICHARD NIXON's nomination of Rep. GERALD FORD (R-Mich.) for vice president. During the fall of the following year, he chaired the panel's consideration of NELSON ROCKEFELLER for the vice presidency.

Cannon lost his bid for reelection in 1982. He died in Las Vegas on March 7, 2002.

Capehart, Homer E(arl)

(1897–1979) U.S. senator

The son of a tenant farmer, Capehart was born on June 6, 1897, in Algiers, Ind. He attended public schools and served in the army during World War I. After the war, he worked in farming and in the radio and phonograph business. In 1932, he began his own company, which developed the automatic record changer that made the jukebox possible. Ousted by the board of directors during the Great Depression, he took a job as vice president of the Rudolph Wurlitzer Corporation and head of its jukebox division. Capehart won election as a Republican to the U.S. Senate from Indiana in 1944 and quickly emerged as one of the chamber's more conservative and anticommunist members. He won reelection two times.

When Republicans took control of Congress in 1953, Capehart became chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. During the early weeks of the administration, Capehart opposed Eisenhower's plan for ending wage and price controls quickly and without provision for standby measures. Fearing a recurrence of the inflation that gripped the nation following the end of controls after World War II, Capehart immediately introduced a bill to set up emergency control machinery. The measure narrowly passed the Senate but died in the House.

Capehart was assigned to the Foreign Relations Committee in 1954. That February, he voted for the Bricker amendment, which limited the president's treaty-making powers. It was defeated by one vote. In 1955, Capehart attacked a resolution by Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) requiring Eisenhower to condition his participation in the Geneva summit conference on a Soviet agreement to put a discussion of Eastern Europe on the agenda. He also criticized Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and Sen. WALTER GEORGE (D-Ga.) for permitting the resolution to emerge from the Foreign Relations Committee. The measure was defeated on the floor of the Senate.

Following his reelection in 1956, Capehart became an increasingly strong supporter of administration policy. He backed the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which protected the voting rights of African Americans. The following year, he supported presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS in the face of conflict-of-interest charges. Capehart also supported the permanent establishment of the Small Business Administration and backed statehood for Alaska.

In 1959, a vice president of Wurlitzer Inc., testifying before the senate Committee on Improper Relations in the Labor or Management Field, charged that Capehart had been forced to deal with racketeers when he sold jukeboxes to that company in the 1930s. The Senator strongly refuted this. He joined other conservatives in voting down a national commission to deal with organized crime in 1960.

Capehart opposed most legislation proposed by the Kennedy administration. He gained national prominence in 1962, when he lambasted the administration's Cuban policy and warned of a Soviet buildup in the island. Capehart lost his bid for reelection that year to Democrat Birch Bayh. He returned to farming, manufacturing, and investment pursuits. He died in Indianapolis, Ind., on September 3, 1979.

Carey, James B(arron)

(1911–1973) president, International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers

The son of a civil servant, James Carey was born on August 12, 1911, in Philadelphia. He began working in a local factory at the age of 14. Following graduation from high school, he got a job at the Philco Radio Co. in Philadelphia. In 1933, Carey and a group of supporters took over a company union at Philco and led a successful strike of the plant's 3,800 employees. Shortly afterward, he left his job to become an organizer in the radio industry for the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Carey favored industrial unionism, however, and he soon came into conflict with the federation's policy of assigning workers to separate craft brotherhoods. In March 1936, he helped organize a meeting of 28 AFL locals representing 30,000 electrical workers, which formed an independent union, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE). Six months later, Carey led the UE into the new Committee for Industrial Organization (CIO). In 1938, he was elected national secretary of the CIO, and in 1942 he became its secretary-treasurer.

A liberal anticommunist, Carey nevertheless ran the UE after 1936 in cooperation with communists. Following the Stalin-Hitler Pact in 1939, he broke with these elements, and in 1941 he was ousted from the union presidency by a coalition of communists and more conservative members. Thereafter, Carey led the anticommunist opposition within the UE, and with WALTER REUTHER of the United Auto Workers, he spearheaded a drive to purge the CIO of communist influence.

After World War II, Carey worked with the State Department and various European labor leaders to create the anticommunist International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. In 1949, the UE was expelled from the CIO, and the CIO presented Carey with a charter for a new union, the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (IUE). A long period of jurisdictional warfare followed between the UE, the IUE, and several AFL craft unions. During that time, the IUE won collective bargaining rights in a majority of plants in the electrical equipment industry.

Carey was a member of the committee that negotiated the merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955. He was elected a vice president of the new organization and general secretary of its industrial union department. He often represented the AFL-CIO at international labor functions during the 1950s.

At the same time, however, continuing jurisdictional conflict and employer resistance steadily weakened Carey's own union. In 1955, the IUE struck the Westinghouse Corp. after the company attempted to extend a three-year contract, negotiated in the previous year, to five years. The strike, which lasted six months and eventually involved more than 70,000 workers throughout the country, was the longest and most bitterly contested dispute in a major industry since 1941. Clashes between striking and nonstriking employees and police intervention also marked the strike as a notable exception to the relatively peaceful pattern of labor-management relations established in mass-production industries after the war.

Throughout the 1950s, Carey complained that his union was the victim of unfair labor practices on the part of the General Electric Co. IUE members termed the company's bargaining policy "Boulwarism," after the name of a GE vice president (LEMUEL BOULWARE), or “bargaining by ultimatum,” since the company’s first offer was its last. In 1960, Carey called a strike against GE that proved disastrous for the union. IUE called off the strike after three weeks. Following that defeat, the IUE lost 10 important plant elections affecting several thousand workers.

In 1965, rank-and-file insurgents defeated Carey for the presidency of the IUE. Shortly afterward, he left the union to become a labor representative of the United Nations Association, a position that he held until his retirement in 1972. Carey died in Silver Spring, Md., on September 11, 1973.

Carlson, Frank

(1893–1987) U.S. senator

The son of Swedish immigrants, Carlson was born on January 23, 1893, in Concordia, Kans. He attended Kansas State College. After serving in the army during World War I, he returned to Concordia and bought a large wheat and livestock farm. He was elected to the state legislature as a Republican in 1929 and 1931. In 1935, Carlson won a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives from Kansas’s sixth district. During the 1930s, he backed high parity for farmers but generally opposed New Deal measures. He also opposed amending the neutrality laws. Carlson was elected governor of Kansas in 1946 and was reelected in 1948. Two years later, he won election to the U.S. Senate.

A moderate Republican, Carlson was an early supporter of Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952. After the Republican Convention, he acted as an intermediary between the Eisenhower forces and Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) in an effort to unite the party. Eisenhower appointed Carlson a special adviser during the campaign.

In August 1954, Carlson served on the committee of six “neutral” senators, known as the Select Committee to Study Censure, created to study charges of misconduct against Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). That November, he joined in its unanimous recommendation for censure. On November 12, during floor debate on the panel’s report, Carlson charged that McCarthy had violated Senate rules by his attacks on the committee’s conduct and motives.

In the Senate, Carlson was generally conservative on fiscal and welfare matters; however, typically for a farm-state Republican, he supported aid to farmers. First as chairman, and after 1955 as senior Republican, of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, Carlson attempted to limit the salaries, benefits, and promotions of federal civil service workers. During the summer of 1954, he succeeded in placing restrictions on the number of permanent employees, promotions, and transfers in the federal service. The following year, he unsuccessfully offered a floor amendment to reduce pay increases for classified employees from 10 percent, as provided by a committee bill, to 6 percent. In 1957, he opposed another pay raise, again without success, charging that it would require a supplemental appropriation of half a billion dollars.

A supporter of 100 percent of parity price supports for wheat farmers, Carlson in 1954 opposed the administration’s omnibus farm bill, which established flexible price supports. Two years later, he successfully introduced a proposal to give the secretary of agriculture discretionary authority to support wheat for domestic human consumption at 100 percent of parity. However, the president vetoed the bill to which the proviso was attached.

Carlson generally supported the administration’s positions. In 1955, as a member of the three-member Post Office and Civil Service Committee’s Government Employees Security Program Subcommittee, he defended President Eisenhower’s security program against charges that its procedures failed to adequately protect the rights of federal employees and job applicants. The following year, Carlson criticized the committee’s report, which recommended that the scope of the program’s coverage be reduced from 6 million to 1.5 million employees. He supported the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in 1955 and voted against a medical insurance system financed through Social Security in 1960. Although he won reelection in 1956 and 1962, he never became a significant force in the Senate.

Carlson opposed most New Frontier programs in the early 1960s but backed the Kennedy administration’s foreign policies. Subsequently, he voted against most of President Johnson's Great Society programs, but he supported the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Demonstration Cities plan in 1966. Carlson was not a critic of the Vietnam War. From time to time, however, he called for negotiations. In 1968, he decided not to seek reelection. Carlson was a favorite-son candidate at the Republican National Convention in August 1968. He returned to his farm in Concordia and died there on May 30, 1987.

Carr, Francis P.

(1917–1971) executive director, Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Senate Government Operations Committee

Born in Newport, R.I., in 1917, Carr graduated from Brown University and received a law degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1942. He then entered the FBI. As head of the New York field division's security matters section in the late-1940s, he directed the investigation of prominent leaders of the Communist Party. Carr resigned from the FBI in 1953 and was appointed executive director of the staff of the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, headed by Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.).

During 1954, Carr became embroiled in the dispute between the army and McCarthy. On March 15, 1954, Secretary of the Army ROBERT T. STEVENS charged that Carr, McCarthy, and subcommittee counsel ROY COHN had exerted pressure on the army to obtain special treatment for Pvt. G. DAVID SCHINE, a former aide to McCarthy.

On March 16, the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee voted to investigate the accusation. Carr was cleared of the charges in May on a straight party vote and was exempted from appearing before the panel. Democrats on the subcommittee opposed the action, maintaining it had been taken to help Carr avoid testifying.

On June 14, Carr voluntarily testified. He maintained that, in an effort to stop McCarthy's probe, Stevens had offered preferential treatment to Schine. Carr also testified that the secretary had been willing to reveal "some homosexuals" in the air force in return for information about McCarthy's next investigation.

The subcommittee issued its report in August. The Democrats denounced McCarthy's conduct, while the Republicans mildly criticized him. Democrats likewise rebuked Stevens more severely than Republicans for submitting to McCarthy's pressure. Members of both parties found no evidence of wrongdoing on Carr's part. In a dissenting opinion, Sen. CHARLES E. POTTER (D-Mich.) said he was not entirely blameless. After the hearings, Carr faded from public view. He died on June 16, 1971.

Carroll, John A(lbert)

(1901–1983) U.S. senator

Born in Denver, Colo., on July 30, 1901, Carroll attended public schools through eighth grade. He served in the army during World War I and later joined the Denver Police Department. He passed his high school equivalency exam and in 1929 received a law degree from Westminster Law College. As a young lawyer, he became involved in local Democratic politics and served as assistant U.S. district attorney for Denver from 1933 to 1934. He was district attorney of Denver from 1936 to 1940, when he lost a primary race for governor of Colorado. He practiced law until receiving an appointment as attorney for the Denver region of the Office of Price Administration. Carroll served in the army during World War II. He won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946 and was reelected two years later. In 1950, he ran against Republican incumbent EUGENE D. MILLIKIN for the Senate and lost. After this, he served briefly in the Truman White House and returned to the practice of law.

After losing a second race for a Senate seat in 1954, Carroll finally won election to the Senate in 1956. During his one term, Carroll supported education, medical, social, and civil rights legislation. Carroll voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and joined liberals in an unsuccessful attempt to strengthen the civil rights bill of 1960.

As a congressman from a Western state, Carroll was deeply concerned with resource development and conservation. He supported the controversial Hells Canyon Dam Project, which provided for federal construction and operation of a massive dam on the Snake River. In 1957, he sponsored a bill authorizing funds for the Fryingpan-Arkansas Project, a multiple-purpose reclamation effort designed to divert surplus water from the Colorado River Basin to the Arkansas River Basin. The project was vital to the development of southeastern Colorado. Carroll also supported unsuccessful efforts to limit billboards on highways.

In 1958, Carroll became a major defender of the Supreme Court, then under attack for its controversial decisions on civil liberties. During the mid-1950s, the Court had limited the power of both state and local government in subversion cases and strengthened the rights of individuals under arrest. In August 1958, Carroll opposed attempts to strip the Court of the power to review subversion cases. His motion to recommit killed an amendment declaring that "no act of Congress . . . should be construed by the Courts as nullifying state laws on the same subject unless Congress so specified or there was an unreconcilable difference between state and federal law." On a point of order, Carroll defeated a bill reversing the Mallory decision, which had invalidated the confession of a confessed rapist because of delays in his arraignment.

Carroll lost his bid for reelection in 1962 to Peter Dominik. He practiced law in Denver until 1968 and died in that city on August 30, 1983.

Case, Clifford P(hilip)

(1904–1982) U.S. congressman and senator

The son of a Dutch Reformed minister, Case was born in Franklin Park, N.J., on April 16, 1904. He graduated from Rutgers University in 1925 and received an LL.B. from Columbia University in 1928. He joined the Wall Street law firm of Simpson, Thacher and Bartlett the same year and was a member of the firm from 1939 to 1953. From 1938 to 1942, Case served on the Common Council of Rahway, N.J.

In 1944, Case was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. There he gained a reputation as a liberal Republican who frequently crossed party lines to support civil rights, education, and welfare legislation. He favored an anti-poll tax measure in 1945, opposed the establishment of a permanent Un-American Activities Committee in 1945, supported the creation of a Fair Employment Practices Commission in 1950, and voted against overriding President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto of the McCarran immigration bill in 1952. On the other hand, he voted to override the president's veto of the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947 and helped draft the communist-control bill in 1948. Dissatisfied with the lack of significant influence of all but the most senior members of the House, Case resigned his seat in August 1953. He became president of the Ford Foundation's Fund for the Republic, established to defend civil liberties against cold war pressures for conformity.

In March 1954, Case resigned that post to run for the U.S. Senate. During the campaign, he faced opposition from labor, Old Guard Republicans, and supporters of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), who labeled him a "left-wing socialist" and "darling of the Americans for Democratic Action." Stressing his opposition to McCarthy, Case narrowly defeated his liberal Democratic opponent in November.

As a senator, Case remained a member of the bloc of Northeastern liberal Republicans in Congress. In November 1956, he urged revision of the McCarran Immigration Act to eliminate "the senseless and serious discriminations against nationalities of Southern and Southeastern Europe." A strong supporter of civil rights, in 1957 Case opposed southern attempts to weaken the administration's civil rights bill by requiring a jury trial for contempt cases involving persons who had attempted to prevent blacks from voting. In March 1960, Case was one of eight Republicans who joined liberal Democrats in an unsuccessful effort to end a southern filibuster against another civil rights bill sponsored by the administration.

Case did not uniformly vote with the Senate's liberal Democrats. In 1959, he backed a $2.1-billion housing bill but declined to support an effort to override President Eisenhower's veto. The same year, he voted to confirm LEWIS STRAUSS as secretary of commerce, a choice opposed by many liberals on the ground that Strauss had been too close to private business interests as chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Case continued his liberal record during the 1960s, backing most civil rights and social welfare legislation. He was also a leading spokesman for financial disclosure legislation for all three branches of the federal government. Case opposed the growth of right-wing influence in the Republican Party, and in 1964, he fought the nomination of conservative Sen. BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) for president. During the later part of the decade, Case emerged as a critic of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's Vietnam policies. After failing to win the Republican nomination for his seat in 1978, he returned to the practice of law and was a lecturer at Rutgers University. He died in Washington, D.C., on March 5, 1982.

Celler, Emanuel

(1888–1981) U.S. congressman; chairman, Judiciary Committee

The son of a liquor distiller, Celler was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., on May 6, 1888. He graduated from Columbia University in 1910, and received his LL.B. there two years later. In 1922, he won election to Congress as a Democrat from New York's 10th congressional district, a predominately middle-class Jewish section of Brooklyn. In the House, Celler established a strong liberal record, introducing measures to curb the abuses of big business and advocating the liberalization of immigration laws. Celler was a fervent supporter of the New Deal and a strong defender of civil liberties. In 1945, he backed an unsuccessful anti-poll tax bill and opposed a measure making the Un-American Activities Committee a standing committee.

Celler maintained his liberal record during the Truman administration. He opposed the Taft-Hartley bill of 1947. Two years later, he became chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a position he held for the duration of his congressional tenure (except for 1953–55, when Republicans had a majority in the House). In 1949, Celler used his post as chairman of the Judiciary Committee to establish the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly. From 1949 to 1951, the panel conducted a series of well-publicized investigations into insurance companies, the steel industry, and monopoly practices in baseball. In 1950, Celler helped steer the Celler-Kefauver antimerger bill through Congress. Celler was also a vocal opponent of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) anticommunist crusade.

During the 1950s, Celler continued to be a leading congressional defender of civil liberties. He cast one of two votes against appropriations for the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1953 and 1954. In 1954, he opposed a bill, formulated as a tool in the anticommunist crusade, that allowed Congress to grant immunity to congressional witnesses under certain conditions. Critics maintained it had the effect of forcing witnesses to testify or face jail sentences. In a minority statement directed at McCarthy and his supporters, Celler and three other Democrats on the Judiciary Committee denounced the action. Despite his strong stand on the rights of witnesses in loyalty-security hearings, Celler did not oppose a 1954 bill banning the Communist Party. Although he described the measure as "palpably unconstitutional," he voted for it.

In May and June 1955, Celler's antitrust subcommittee held hearings on government policy toward mergers. The subcommittee's report maintained that the "third great merger movement" in U.S. history was already in progress and warned that previous periods of intensive merger activity had been followed by "devastating business collapse." Celler also opposed a proposal to grant antitrust immunity to companies involved in defense production. However, the bill was passed by both houses in August 1955.

Celler introduced a civil rights bill in 1956 that consisted of an antilynching provision and an omnibus civil rights bill. The Eisenhower administration sent a bill to Congress proposing the creation of a civil rights commission; the elevation of the Civil Rights Section of the Justice Department to the status of a division, headed by an assistant attorney general; authorization for the Justice Department to file civil suits to protect civil rights; and authorizing the Justice Department to file suits to protect voting rights. In a procedural maneuver, the administration's bill was substituted for Celler's. The bill passed the House, but LYNDON JOHNSON, the majority leader in the Senate, used procedural trickery to consign the bill to the deep freeze of JAMES O. EASTLAND's Judiciary Committee.

The following year, the Eisenhower administration sent the bill back to Congress. As it worked its way through the House, Celler criticized what he regarded as Eisenhower's lukewarm support for the measure. The House once again passed the bill, but the Senate removed Title III (the general civil rights provision) and added a jury trial provision to Title IV (voting rights). This amendment, offered by southerners, guaranteed a jury trial to those who violated court orders not to interfere with African Americans exercising their right to vote. Celler opposed the jury trial amendment, but it became part of the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

In 1959, Celler introduced the House version of a measure calling for financial aid for school desegregation and for authorization for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to develop desegregation plans. However, the proposals died in committee. He also failed to get those proposals included in the Civil Rights Act of 1960. Celler participated in the successful drive for a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic platform of 1960. The plank called for federal aid to desegregated school districts, federal authority to file civil suits to prevent any denial of civil rights, and a federal Fair Employment Practices Commission.

Celler continued to play an important role in civil rights legislation during the 1960s. He sponsored the Twenty-Fourth Amendment, ratified in 1964, which abolished the poll tax in federal elections, and was a principal author of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He also helped secure passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1965, and the Civil Rights Act of 1968. After 50 years in the House, Celler was defeated in the 1972 Democratic congressional primary by Elizabeth Holtzman, a young Brooklyn lawyer. He died in Brooklyn on January 15, 1981.

Chambers, (Jay) (Vivian) Whittaker

(1901–1961) journalist

The product of a vaguely bohemian and downwardly mobile family, Chambers was born in Philadelphia, on April 1, 1901, and grew up in Lynbrook, on the south shore of Long Island, N.Y. After attending Columbia University, Chambers joined the Communist Party in 1925. He wrote for the Daily Worker, the New Masses, and other communist publications from 1925 to 1929, when he resigned from the Daily Worker in the wake of factional wars within the Communist Party. After a brief period as a self-described "independent communist oppositionist," Chambers rejoined the party in 1931. He contributed short stories to the New Masses that won him acclaim as the "hottest literary Bolshevik" in New York. He became the editor of the New Masses in 1932. Beginning in 1928, Chambers also worked as a freelance translator. He translated Bambi, a children's novel by the Austrian writer Felix Salten, and a dozen other works, including novels by Heinrich Mann and Franz Werfel. In 1932, Chambers went underground as a Soviet spy.

The Soviet purges and show trials of 1937–38 caused Chambers to reconsider the cause he was serving. He left the Communist Party in 1938, joined Time magazine as an editor in 1939, and rose to senior editor in 1942.

Chambers appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee in August 1948 and gave testimony that implicated Alger Hiss, a former official in the State Department, as a communist conspirator. When Hiss sued Chambers for libel, Chambers produced government documents—including the so-called Pumpkin Papers—given him by Hiss when they both worked for the Communist Party. Chambers's evidence was later used to convict Hiss of perjury (the statute of limitations prohibited an indictment for espionage).

When the Hiss-Chambers controversy broke, Chambers resigned his staff position at Time. After the Hiss case, Chambers retired from the public arena to give occasional congressional testimony and work on his farm in Maryland. In 1952, he wrote Witness, an autobiography in which he ruminated on the communist threat to the West, the concurrent battle between atheism and religion, and the more insidious danger of secular liberalism. The book was immediately praised as a contemporary spiritual and political testament by the American Right.

Chambers served as a prominent conservative spokesman during the 1950s. He sympathized with Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) fight against communism but deplored the senator's style, and he refused to be aligned with McCarthy's faction. In a letter to WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, Chambers warned that "Senator McCarthy will one day make some irreparable blunder which will play directly into the hands of our common enemy and discredit the whole anticommunist effort for a long while to come." Later, Chambers's Witness was among those books removed from the State Department's overseas libraries under pressure from Sen. McCarthy.

In August 1957, Chambers joined the staff of National Review. He continued to write about the communist threat and attacked American liberals as spiritually bankrupt, "man-mind oriented, rather than God-soul trusting" theorists who destroyed Western civilization from within. At the same time, however, he argued that the right, and particularly the Republican Party, had not formed a cohesive philosophy that could either attract the populace or offer solutions for an "anti-conservative," technology-dominated Amer-capitalism. Many on the right respected Chambers as a brilliant martyr redeemed from communism.

Chambers made his final public pronouncement on the Hiss case in 1959. He supported Hiss's attempt to secure a passport but demanded that Hiss finally confess the truth. In Chambers's words, "Hiss's defiance perpetuates and keeps a fracture in the community as a whole."

In the fall of 1959, Chambers enrolled as an undergraduate at Western Maryland College, where he studied Romance languages, ancient Greek, Russian, economics, and biology. At the same time, he stopped contributing to the National Review. Chambers cited a lack of time, given his new role as a student. The real, if unstated, reason was his differences with the magazine. In the late 1950s, Chambers adopted positions and played with ideas antithetical to the National Review. For example, Chambers supported the Supreme Court's ruling that the State Department could not constitutionally deny a passport to a citizen on the basis of his or her political beliefs. He also exhibited an interest in the arguments of John Kenneth Galbraith's The Affluent Society. Nevertheless, Chambers and Buckley remained close friends.

Chambers died of a heart attack in Westminster, Md., on July 9, 1961. A collection of his writings, Cold Friday, was published posthumously in 1964.

Chandler, A(lbert) B(enjamin)

(1898–1991) governor of Kentucky

Born on July 14, 1898, in Corydon, Ky., and raised in rural poverty, Chandler worked in laundries and restaurants to earn his tuition for Transylvania College in Lexington. After taking his B.S. degree in 1921, he studied one year at Harvard Law School but left Cambridge and earned his LL.B. in 1924 from the University of Kentucky in Lexington. He then moved to Versailles, Ky., to practice law and play professional baseball. After terms as a state senator from 1929 to 1931 and lieutenant governor for the next four years, he was elected governor in 1935. Nicknamed "Happy" because of his ever-present smile, the gregarious, backslapping Chandler mixed a down-home campaign style with a brand of politics that vacillated between populist and archconservative. He brought about a much-needed reorganization of state government and eliminated a $20-million budget deficit. He also abolished the state sales tax, which he considered regressive. Some argued that his restrained fiscal policies prevented the rapid development of community welfare programs. Labor leaders criticized him for directing National Guardsmen to bring order to the Harlan Co. United Mine Workers' strikes of 1939.

After an unsuccessful attempt to win the Democratic nomination for a Senate seat in 1938, Chandler resigned the governorship in 1939 to have his successor appoint him to fill the Senate term of a deceased incumbent. He won election to a full term in 1942, but he resigned his seat to become the commissioner of baseball in 1945. He was commissioner when (with his consent) Jackie Robinson broke the color barrier in 1947. After receiving an insufficient vote of confidence from baseball owners, he resigned his post in 1951, and returned to Versailles to practice law; edit his newspaper, the Woodford Sun; and prepare for reentry into political life.

In 1955, Chandler geared up for a run for the governorship against a candidate supported by his longtime foe, Sen. Earle Clements, and by the state Democratic Party. A mixture of grassroots campaigning and Chandler's extensive alliances proved stronger than the party organization, and the ex-governor won the primary by a slim margin. In the general election, Chandler amassed the largest plurality ever for a Kentucky governor. His inauguration was marked by banners carrying such slogans as "Happy for President in 1956 if Mama Says Yes."

Chandler mounted a presidential campaign in early 1956, but it developed little momentum. His support for the Dixiecrat ticket in the election of 1948 and his clearly visible support for presidential aspirant Sen. RICHARD B. RUSSELL (D-Ga.) in 1952 found scant support in national Democratic Party ranks. The governor solicited the endorsement of ex-president HARRY S. TRUMAN but was refused. He entered the national convention with only his own state's 30 delegates and left it with 36½ votes.

Chandler, whose opponent in the Democratic gubernatorial primary of 1955 accused him of equivocating on school integration, clarified his stance to the nation during the presidential campaign. He stated that Kentucky would abide by the Supreme Court's desegregation decision. In the fall of 1956, when disorders interrupted the integration of schools in several Kentucky cities, Gov. Chandler sent out National Guardsmen to keep the peace. He committed the state to obedience to the law and threatened to declare martial law if further disturbances warranted it.

In his second term as governor, Chandler continued the Kentucky state government's tradition of blatant political patronage, contrary to his campaign promise to replace "buddy" employment practices with a merit system. In 1958, he refused to support proposed legislation establishing a merit system, arguing that state government was "not ready" for the change. He infuriated not only his enemies, but also many allies when, in 1956, he allegedly ordered 20,000 state employees to vote and work for him in state and county presidential conventions or be dismissed if they refused. Chandler faced accusations of corruption throughout his various political administrations. Political scientist Neal Peirce wrote that "major questions remain to this day [1975] as to how much Chandler benefited personally from his governorship."

Forbidden by Kentucky state law from running for a second consecutive term, Chandler retired from the statehouse and waited for the next election in four years. In the interim, however, he lost his charm with the voters, and he was defeated in the Democratic gubernatorial primaries of 1963, 1967, and 1971. After the last defeat, he declared his permanent retirement from politics. He died in Versailles on June 15, 1991.

Chavez, Dennis

(1888–1962) U.S. senator

One of eighth children, Chavez was born in Los Chavez, N.Mex., on April 8, 1888. He dropped out of school in the eighth grade and worked at menial jobs. He served as an interpreter for Sen. A. A. James (D-N.Mex.) during the election of 1916 and, as a result, was given a job as a clerk in the U.S. Senate. While working in the upper house, Chavez passed a special entrance examination to attend Georgetown University. He received his LL.B. in 1920 and returned to Albuquerque, N.Mex., to practice law. After serving in the New Mexico House of Representatives, he won a seat in the U.S. House. Appointed to fill a vacant seat in the Senate in May 1935, Chavez won election in his own right in 1936. He became the Senate's first Spanish-surnamed member.

In the Senate, Chavez supported New and Fair Deal programs. He actively promoted Franklin D. Roosevelt's Good Neighbor Policy and sought to improve conditions in Puerto Rico. Chavez frequently voiced support for civil rights and fair employment measures, and, in 1943, he cosponsored an amendment granting equal rights for women. He was one of 10 senators who voted against overriding President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto of the internal security bill of 1950.

Chavez's reelection in 1952 was contested by Patrick J. Hurley, who charged voting fraud. The following year, a Senate elections subcommittee recommended, by a two-to-one vote, that 20,000 votes cast for Chavez and 10,000 for Hurley be invalidated "for lack of secrecy" in voting places. The recommendation would have resulted in Chavez's defeat, but the Senate rejected the recommendation in March 1954.

During the Eisenhower administration, Chavez, as chairman of the Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, opposed attempts by the administration to reduce the military budget. In 1956, he recommended increasing Eisenhower's proposed budget for the air force by $1.6 billion to speed up production of B-52 long-range bombers. In 1960, Chavez emphasized that his subcommittee's first responsibility was to provide the money needed to "keep America strong" in the light of recent events, particularly the Soviet Union's satellite launchings. Remarking that economy was of secondary importance, the Senator implicitly criticized the administration's desire to put budgetary considerations over security needs. He asked Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Gen. NATHAN TWining to "tell us what you want" and his panel would not deprive him of "one dime if it is necessary for our national security."

Chavez had a mixed record of support for the administration on domestic issues. As chairman of the Public Works Committee, he initially opposed Eisenhower's plan for the construction of a highway system creating some 42,000 miles of controlled-access roads. The system was to be funded jointly by the state and federal government, with Washington paying 90 percent of the costs. The senator preferred Sen. ALBERT GORE's (D-Tenn.) more modest proposal, which would have been paid for from the general treasury funds, thus putting a lesser burden on the states. Nevertheless, Chavez agreed to cosponsor the Eisenhower measure, which became law in 1956.

The senator supported the Civil Rights Act of 1957. However, he voted against the administration's initial proposal, which would have given the attorney general broad powers to seek injunctions in any type of civil rights case with or without the consent of an alleged victim. As enacted, the law dealt only with voting rights.

Chavez favored statehood for Alaska and Hawaii. He enthusiastically supported the massive public housing bill of 1959 and the aid-to-depressed-areas bill of 1960. He voted to override Eisenhower's veto in each case.

Chavez supported most of the Kennedy administration's social welfare legislation, including Medicare. He died of cancer in Washington, D.C., on November 18, 1962.

Cherry, Francis

(1908–1965) governor of Arkansas; member, Subversive Activities Control Board

The youngest of five children of a poor railroad conductor, Francis Cherry was born on September 5, 1908, in Fort Worth, Tex. He graduated from Oklahoma Agricultural and Mechanical College in 1930. He then worked at odd jobs for three years to earn tuition money for the University of Arkansas law school, where he obtained his LL.B. in 1936. In 1937, Cherry entered private practice and a short time later became a commissioner for the Workman's Compensation Commission. Five years later, he was elected chancellor and probate judge of the 12th chancery district in northeast Arkansas. He was the youngest person ever to hold that post.

Waiving his judicial deferment, Cherry was commissioned in the navy in 1944 and served for two years. He returned to the bench in 1946, and won reelection to another six-year term in 1948. He ran for the Arkansas Democratic gubernatorial nomination in 1952. Cherry was given little chance of success against the incumbent, but through the use of radio he won the primary and the general election.

Upon taking office, Cherry promoted a legislative program designed to encourage the economic development of the state. He also supported a constitutional amendment for revision of the property tax system. In addition, he encouraged industrial development.

Following the Supreme Court's ruling in May 1954 that struck down school desegregation, Cherry announced that he would comply with the decision. He stated, "Obviously it will take a good deal of time to work it out. I only hope that what has happened does not set back the advances Negroes have made in Arkansas in the past several years." He planned to appoint a governor's committee on segregation as a first step toward compliance. Cherry, however, had little role in Arkansas's desegregation battles. In August 1954 he lost the Democratic primary to ORVAL FAUBUS.

The following year, Eisenhower appointed Cherry to the Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB). The SACB was established in 1950 to determine if organizations were communist-affiliated. Under the Internal Security Act of 1950, which established the board, communist groups were required to register with the SACB. The registration issue became hotly debated during the 1950s, as the Supreme Court limited the scope of anticommunist legislation. In 1958, Cherry supported continued registration.

In 1961, Cherry recommended that the International Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers be declared a communist-affiliated organization. The full board upheld the findings in 1962. Cherry was appointed chairman of the SACB in 1963, and died of a heart ailment in Washington, D.C., on July 15, 1965.

Chessman, Caryl W(hittier)

(1921–1960) convicted felon

Caryl Chessman was born in Michigan on May 17, 1921, but grew up in Los Angeles. After a childhood scarred by the crippling of his mother and two suicide attempts by his father, Chessman began stealing food at age 15. He later served two terms in prison for armed robbery. In January 1948, Chessman was arrested, charged with robbery, kidnapping, sexual abuses, and attempted rape. Serving as his own counsel and claiming mistaken identity, Chessman was convicted on 17 counts and sentenced to die for kidnapping.

Chessman appealed the verdict on the grounds that he had been deprived of counsel and that his trial record was faulty. Over the next 12 years, his case went to the Supreme Court 16 times. Eleven rehearings were held in state and federal courts. By 1960, Supreme Court Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS said, "The conclusion is irresistible that Chessman is playing a game with the courts." While on death row, Chessman wrote four books in the 1950s. The first, Cell 2455, Death Row, became a best seller.

Chessman's case generated worldwide attention from many who opposed the death penalty and saw the series of stays followed by proposed dates of execution as cruel. Pleas that his life be spared came from such diverse individuals as Albert Schweitzer, Pablo Casals, and Brigitte Bardot and from newspapers such as the Vatican's L'Osservatore Romano. The case also prompted anti-American demonstrations.

On February 1960, just 10 hours before he was to die, California Gov. EDMUND G. BROWN granted Chessman his eighth stay of execution. The governor announced he had taken the action because Assistant Secretary of State Roy R. Rubottom, Jr., in a telegram to Brown, had relayed a statement by the Uruguayan government warning of possible hostile demonstrations there during President Eisenhower's visit, should Chessman be executed. Brown, a foe of capital punishment, also wanted the state legislature to consider abolishing California's death penalty. Sen. CLAIR ENGLE (D-Calif.) protested Brown's decision on the ground that justice to an individual should be based on the facts of the case and not "rest on international reaction." The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.), denounced the State Department for interfering in the affairs of a sovereign state.

While crowds kept vigil outside San Quentin, Chessman was executed on May 2, 1960. In many high schools and colleges, students observed a minute of silence in his memory. Chessman denied his guilt to the end.

Chotiner, Murray M.

(1909–1974) Republican political adviser

Murray Chotiner was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 4, 1909. After a year as an undergraduate, he enrolled in Southwestern College of Law in Los Angeles. He completed his LL.B. at the age of 20, making him the youngest graduate in the school's history. Following his admission to the California bar in 1931, he became a prominent criminal lawyer and political public relations man. He worked for HERBERT HOOVER's presidential campaign in 1932 and EARL WARREN's campaign for governor in 1942. Warren found Chotiner's ruthless partisanship distasteful, and the two men eventually parted ways.

In 1946, RICHARD NIXON, making his first run for the House against Rep. Jerry Voorhis (D-Calif.), retained Chotiner as an adviser. Although Chotiner was primarily occupied with the management of WILLIAM KNOWLAND's senatorial campaign that year, he advised Nixon to attack Voorhis for taking money from the CIO's political action committee (PAC). In fact, Voorhis had taken money from CIO-PAC in 1944, but the organization had declined either to endorse or support him financially in 1946 because of Voorhis's increasingly firm stands on labor unrest and the Soviet Union. However, the National Citizens Political Action Committee (NCPAC), a nonunion counterpart to CIO-PAC, did endorse Voorhis. Nixon blurred the distinction and played on concerns (shared by Voorhis) that the CIO was controlled by communists. As the campaign progressed, Nixon linked votes Voorhis had cast in Congress and positions he had taken to left-wing and communist groups. The tactic helped Nixon win the election.

In 1950, Chotiner managed Nixon's campaign for the U.S. Senate against Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas (D-Calif.), who had waged a bitter campaign against the Democratic incumbent, Sheridan Downey, before the latter withdrew claiming poor health. Both Downey and Elias M. Boddy, who stepped in to challenge Douglas for the nomination, attacked her "left-wing" voting record and associations. In the general election, the Nixon campaign referred to Douglas as the "pink lady" and issued a flyer on pink paper comparing her votes to those of Vito Marcantonio of New York. Many regarded the abrasive and ruthless Chotiner as the inspiration for the attacks on Douglas. Nixon went on to an overwhelming victory in November.

Chotiner played an important role in the maneuvering that won Nixon the vice presidential nomination two years later, and Nixon asked Chotiner to manage his campaign for the vice presidency. When, in September 1952, Nixon was accused of improperly maintaining a "secret" political fund for his personal use, Chotiner aggressively defended him, both in public and behind the scenes.

Although independent investigation soon established that the fund was neither secret nor illegal, Republican presidential nominee Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER did not spring to Nixon's defense. Many senior Republicans wanted to drop Nixon from the ticket. Chotiner rejected such demands out of hand, and urged Nixon not to accept chastisement from Eisenhower. Chotiner advised his client to get his message across to the widest possible public and boosted Nixon's spirits by asserting that, if Nixon were forced off the ticket, he would call a press conference and identify those who had pressed Nixon to resign. The Republican National Committee (RNC) bought a half hour of time on television, and Nixon used it to give what became known as his "Checkers speech." In it, the candidate explained that the fund was not secret, that the money had been used for legitimate campaign expenses, and that an audit and a legal opinion by a leading firm in California supported these claims. He made a full financial disclosure and challenged his opponents to do the same. ADLAI STEVENSON, the Democratic nominee, had a similar fund, and Stevenson's running mate, JOHN SPARKMAN, had placed his wife on his Senate payroll. Nixon asked his audience to write or wire the Republican National Committee indicating whether they wanted him to remain on the ticket.

Nixon believed that he had "loused it up"; he had timed the speech poorly and neglected to give the RNC's address. Nevertheless, Chotiner and others assured him that the speech had been a success. Following the speech, Nixon's popularity rose, and Eisenhower publicly reaffirmed his support.

At the same time he was managing Nixon's campaign, Chotiner advised Knowland in his successful bid for reelection. Between 1952 and 1955, Chotiner worked with the RNC while continuing his law practice. During this time, he lectured to Republican "political schools" on campaign techniques. Chotiner advised candidates to attack their opponents from the outset. He also advised Nixon during the latter's barnstorming in the congressional elections of 1954.

Chotiner's aggressive campaigns and his penchant for playing at the boundaries of unethical practices made him many enemies. In 1956, the anti-Semitic press attacked Nixon for his association with “that Jew Chotiner,” an attack that Chotiner turned to his and Nixon’s advantage. That same year, as part of an inquiry into influence peddling in military procurement, the Senate Government Operations Committee’s Permanent Investigations Subcommittee began looking into some of Chotiner’s legal clients. On April 25, the subcommittee subpoenaed Chotiner, and Democrats on the subcommittee charged that he had used his ties to Nixon on behalf of his clients. Specifically, they alleged that Chotiner had asked officials to set aside the fraud conviction of two garment manufacturers accused of stealing government clothing material. Chotiner denied this but admitted that he had, “on one or two occasions,” asked White House aides Maxwell Rabb and Charles Willis to obtain information for him in an airlines case. Further, Chotiner denied ever using “the name of the Vice President in connection with . . . any client.” Eisenhower’s press secretary, JAMES HAGERTY, declared that Chotiner had done nothing wrong, although Nixon refused to comment. The subcommittee’s chair, Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), demanded that Chotiner produce a list of his clients since 1953, which Chotiner refused to do on the ground of attorney/client privilege. Ultimately, the subcommittee did not recommend that an indictment be brought in the matter. Nevertheless, RNC Chairman LEONARD HALL dispensed with Chotiner’s services in June.

Further light was cast on Chotiner’s role in the airlines intervention in February 1958. Testifying before the House Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, BERNARD SCHWARTZ charged that presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS had improperly intervened at the Civil Aeronautics Board in 1953 on behalf of Chotiner’s client, North American Airlines. In June, President Eisenhower said that, since the case had finally been decided against North American Airlines, no government influence was evident. Chotiner’s visible influence in the Eisenhower administration ended in 1958.

Chotiner continued to advise Nixon in subsequent campaigns, although he played a less central role than in 1946, 1950, or 1952. He worked for John Mitchell, Nixon’s campaign manager, in 1968 and was President-elect Nixon’s first choice as Republican National Chairman in 1969. When opposition to the appointment developed, Chotiner took an obscure job as government counsel for trade negotiations. He died as result of an automobile accident in Washington, D.C., on January 30, 1974.

Chotiner established a reputation as one of the early political merchandisers who emerged in the years after World War II. He was a talented, intensely partisan, and ruthless operative who constantly skirted the bounds of ethical behavior.

Church, Frank (Forrester)

(1924–1984) U.S. senator

The son of the owner of a sporting goods store, Frank Church was born in Boise, Idaho, on July 25, 1924. He attended public schools and was a champion debater in high school. He enrolled at Stanford University in 1942 but enlisted in the army the following year and served as a military intelligence officer in the China-Burma-India theater. Following his discharge in 1946, he returned to Stanford and graduated in 1947. The same year he graduated, Church married Bethine Clark, the daughter of Chase A. Clark, a former Democratic governor of Idaho. He also enrolled at Harvard Law School but, after a year, transferred to Stanford Law School. Upon graduating from law school in 1950, he returned to Boise to practice law. He also became active in the Democratic Party.

In 1956, Church became a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Senate seat occupied by HERMAN WELKER (R-Ida.). During the campaign, Church was bitterly opposed by the Idaho Power Co. and other private utility concerns for his vigorous advocacy of public power, a crucial issue throughout the Far West during the 1950s. Church promised to fight for federal construction of a single high dam at Hells Canyon near the Idaho-Oregon border to generate low-rate hydroelectric power for the entire area. Backed by the Eisenhower administration, Welker proposed instead that the Idaho Power Co. go through with its plans to build three smaller privately financed dams. Aided by substantial contributions from out-of-state liberal groups and from the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee, Church upset Welker by a margin of 14 percent, although the Republican ticket carried the state in the presidential election that year. Church was only 32 when he took his seat and the fourth-youngest senator in the history of the Senate.

In June 1957, Church cosponsored a bill authorizing the Hells Canyon dam that passed the Senate but was subsequently sidetracked in a House committee. The same bill had been defeated the year before in the upper house by a coalition of southern Democrats and pro-private power Republicans. Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) convinced Church to cosponsor a jury-trial amendment weakening the Civil Rights Act of 1957 in exchange for southern support for the Hells Canyon project. The provision, requiring jury trials under certain conditions, was expected to cripple the ability of the courts and the Justice Department to protect voting rights, since it was assumed that southern juries would not convict in contempt cases relating to the civil rights of African Americans. The upper chamber passed the amendment on August 2 by a vote of 51-42. Its passage represented a victory for southern senators who, aware that they did not have the votes to prevent passage of the bill itself, adopted a strategy aimed at modifying it as much as possible. In the meantime, the Hells Canyon bill passed, with the support of five southern senators, on June 21.

In 1959, Church again lined up with Johnson in opposing an attempt by northern liberals to overhaul the Senate filibuster rule substantially by permitting the imposition of cloture by majority vote. Instead, he supported a slight revision of the rule, sponsored by Johnson and a bipartisan leadership group, enabling two-thirds of the senators present and voting (rather than two-thirds of the entire Senate membership) to shut off debate. The following year, however, Church joined the liberal bloc in an unsuccessful effort to strengthen the Civil Rights Act of 1960 by empowering the attorney general to enter private suits for school desegregation. On most issues, Church voted as a liberal during his freshman term in the Senate.

A talented orator, Church was selected to give the keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in 1960. He condemned the slow rate of economic growth under President DWIGHT D.

EISENHOWER and called for increased military outlays so that the United States could negotiate with the USSR from a position of strength.

Church won reelection in 1962 and again in 1968 and 1974. During the 1960s, Church compiled a strong liberal record, voting for civil rights, school aid, minimum wage, and Medicare bills. As a member of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, he frequently supported conservation measures. Church emerged as one of the earliest and strongest Senate critics of President Lyndon B. Johnson's policies in Southeast Asia. In 1970, he coauthored a measure prohibiting President RICHARD M. NIXON from sending U.S. combat troops into Cambodia without the consent of Congress.

In 1975, Church headed a much publicized investigation of alleged abuse of power by the Central Intelligence Agency and the FBI. Partly on the strength of the publicity he gained as a result of these proceedings, he entered the presidential primaries in 1976.

Church won primaries in Nebraska, Idaho, Oregon, and Montana but fell far behind the eventual nominee, Jimmy Carter. Church ended his bid before the Democratic convention. Although generally liberal, he opposed gun control legislation and in 1979 disclosed the presence of Soviet combat troops in Cuba and demanded their withdrawal before the Senate ratified the SALT II treaty. Church also led the floor debate in support of the ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty in 1978. His support for the treaty returning the canal to Panama cost him dearly in his bid for reelection in 1980. Church narrowly lost his seat to Congressman Steve Symms (R-Idaho). After leaving the Senate, he practiced law with the firm of Whitman and Ransom in Bethesda, Md., until his death there on April 7, 1984.

Clark, Joseph S(ill), Jr.

(1901–1990) mayor of Philadelphia, U.S. senator

A member of a prominent and well-to-do Philadelphia family, Clark was born in Philadelphia on October 21, 1901. He attended the Middlesex School and Harvard, where he received a B.S. degree in 1923. Three years later, he obtained an LL.B. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1926 and began practicing law in Philadelphia.

In 1928, Clark broke with his family's long-standing Republican allegiance to endorse Al Smith for the presidency. Six years later, he made an unsuccessful race for the Philadelphia City Council. In 1934 and 1935, he was deputy attorney general of Pennsylvania. Clark served in the army air corps during World War II, rising to the rank of colonel.

During the postwar years, Clark and RICHARDSON DILWORTH led a Democratic reform movement, which sought to end the Republican machine's longtime dominance of Philadelphia government. Clark managed Dilworth's unsuccessful candidacy for mayor in 1947. After serving as chairman of the Philadelphia chapter of Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), Clark was elected city controller in 1949. In that post, he investigated official scandals and set the stage for a mayoral race in 1951. He won the election and became Philadelphia's first Democratic mayor in 67 years.

As mayor, Clark tried to bring professional, dedicated people into government without regard for party. His strict enforcement of civil service laws enabled many African Americans to get city jobs for the first time.

Clark focused much of his attention upon the revival of Philadelphia's economy, which had suffered as a result of corrupt government and the migration of textile manufacturers to the South. Under his administration, Philadelphia became a pioneer in planning designed to revive the decaying core city. Clark often used quasi-public corporations to achieve this goal. In February 1955, the nonprofit Food Distribution Center Corp., with both businessmen and city officials on its board, was chartered to erect a new food market. In 1958, another quasi-public corporation was formed to begin construction on an industrial park. The mayor also supported purely private attempts to revive the area. He backed the Pennsylvania Railroad's plan for an office building/shopping center complex on the site of its old station, and he worked, with limited success, to improve its design.

To facilitate economic growth, Clark established the Urban Traffic and Transportation Board (UTTB) to devise a plan for a balanced system of mass and highway transit. The UTTB's report, submitted in December 1955, stressed the need for mass transit and urged the establishment of a regional organization to develop an integrated transportation network. Clark's successor, Richardson Dilworth, implemented the plan.

Clark also initiated some low-income housing projects and established the post of housing coordinator. He unsuccessfully attempted to procure a state law permitting the city to use its own crews to correct housing violations. Clark added an economist to his staff to deal with unemployment and tried but failed to get federal funds for job training.

In 1956, Clark decided to run for the Senate. Campaigning on a liberal platform, he defeated the incumbent, Sen. James Duff (R-Pa.), by a slim margin. In the Senate, Clark was a leading advocate of civil rights legislation. He criticized the administration's housing programs, asserting in 1957 that the legislation of that year did not provide housing for those who really needed it.

A strong supporter of federal aid to education, he unsuccessfully sought to create a loan fund for the construction of college teaching facilities in 1960. During the same year, Clark and Sen. MIKE MONRONEY (D-Okla.) succeeded in amending a Senate bill to double the amount of aid provided to public schools. In January 1960, Clark joined 11 colleagues in the Senate Democratic Conference in an unsuccessful bid to take power away from Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and give the liberal Senate Democratic Policy Committee a greater role in formulating policy on legislation.

Clark was a floor manager for many of President JOHN F. KENNEDY's legislative proposals. He won reelection in 1962. During the mid-1960s, he sought to improve the efficiency of the Senate and promote ethics legislation for Congress. In the later part of the decade, he became an outspoken critic of the Johnson administration's policies in Vietnam. Clark was defeated in his bid for reelection in 1968. Between 1969 and 1971, he was president of the United World Federalists, U.S.A., and after 1969, he served as chairman of the Coalition on National Priorities and Military Policy. He continued to reside in Philadelphia until his death in that city on January 12, 1990.

Clark, Mark W(ayne)

(1896–1984) commander in chief, U.S. Army Forces in the Far East and UN Command in Korea

The son of an Army colonel, Mark Clark was born on May 1, 1896, at Madison Barracks, N.Y. He received a B.S. from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in 1917. After more than a decade of further military education and minor army posts, he was promoted to lieutenant colonel in 1940. Clark rose to chief of staff of the army ground forces in May 1942 and commanded all U.S. infantry in Europe for the remainder of World War II. Following the war, Clark headed occupation forces in Austria. He was named deputy secretary of state in 1947.

This dual military and diplomatic experience prepared Clark for his appointment as commander of U.S. and UN forces in Korea in April 1952. When President-elect DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER flew to Korea in December 1952, he received a briefing from Clark, who favored a decisive victory over North Korea. The UN commander advanced three proposals: bombarding the enemy with air and artillery without advancing; destroying Chinese supply bases in Manchuria; or simultaneously using air power against Manchuria while advancing ground forces to the Chinese border.

Anxious to end the war, Eisenhower followed none of these plans. He relied instead on diplomatic effort coupled with threats of massive American intervention and nuclear warfare. Clark served as the conduit for the diplomatic advances and threats. When North Korea stalled the peace talks at Panmunjom in May 1953, Clark, acting on instructions, proposed that, in the future, the peace commission decide disputes by majority vote. This plan proposed giving the neutral Indian delegate the decisive voice. If North Korea rejected this, he was prepared to terminate negotiations and resume the war “in new ways never yet tried in Korea.” North Korea accepted, and the following month, Clark informed Washington that an armistice was near.

The intense anticommunist nationalism of South Korea’s President Syngman Rhee was an obstruction to a final agreement. In June, Rhee threatened to reject the truce and attack North Korea without UN support. Clark convinced him of the futility of such an action. At the same time, he guaranteed Rhee’s adherence to truce terms in a letter to North Korea. SEN. RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) denounced Clark for this action, but Rhee capitulated. The Korean armistice was signed in July 1953.

Clark retired from the military the following month and advocated the use of nuclear weapons if North Korea broke the truce. Testifying before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee one year later, Clark recommended that diplomatic relations with Russia be severed and that the USSR and its satellites be ousted from the UN. Eisenhower disavowed this position.

The inability of the United States to anticipate the Korean conflict in 1950 was widely regarded as an intelligence failure. After the war, amidst allegations of communist infiltration and gross inefficiency within the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), Congress called for a full investigation. In July 1954, former President HERBERT HOOVER announced that Clark would head a Hoover Commission task force studying the “structure and administration” of the CIA. This headed off an independent investigation threatened by SEN. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Clark said he would search out subversives but that he was primarily concerned with improving the agency’s operating procedures.

In June 1955, his task force’s findings were presented to the president and Congress in the Hoover Commission’s Report. Clark expressed concern about the lack of adequate intelligence data from behind the Iron Curtain but dismissed charges of communist infiltration. Instead he accused the State Department of “timidity” in gathering intelligence. To correct “administrative flaws” within the CIA and insure that the agency operated within democratic limits, Clark proposed creating a permanent watchdog commission made up of U.S. senators, representatives, and presidential appointees. By implication, he criticized excessive reliance on spying and other covert action and called on the agency to strengthen its intelligence-gathering functions. The Clark report was the most critical evaluation made of the CIA until the 1970s. The Hoover Commission weakened Clark’s proposal for a watchdog committee in its final report. President Eisenhower joined the CIA in opposing it in any form, and the proposal died.

Clark served as president of the Citadel Military College from 1954 to 1965. He died in Charleston, S.C., on April 17, 1984.

Clark, Tom C(ampbell)

(1889–1977) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court
Tom Clark was born in Dallas, Tex., on September 23, 1889. He grew up in a family of lawyers, served in the military during World War I, and graduated from the University of Texas in 1921 and its law school in 1922. After graduation, he worked in his father's law firm in Dallas and served as civil district attorney of Dallas from 1927 to 1933. Clark went to work for the Justice Department in 1937. During World War II, he coordinated the relocation of Japanese Americans and became an assistant attorney general in 1943, heading first the antitrust and later the criminal divisions. He worked with Sen. HARRY S. TRUMAN'S (D-Mo.) investigation of the defense effort in an official capacity, and he supported Truman for the vice presidency in 1944. Shortly after the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt, President Truman appointed Clark attorney general.

In his four years as attorney general, Clark instituted over 160 antitrust suits and had a major part in the development of the administration's anticommunist campaign. He urged the establishment of loyalty programs both in and out of government, drafted the first attorney general's list of subversive political organizations, and initiated the prosecution of the leaders of the American Communist Party in 1948. When Truman nominated Clark to the Supreme Court in July 1949, there was considerable liberal opposition to the appointment, but the Senate soon confirmed him. Clark's accession to the bench helped create a five-member conservative bloc, which dominated the Court for the next four years.

Clark generally placed the needs of government ahead of individual liberties, especially in loyalty-security cases. In the mid-1950s, Clark entered strong objections when the Court began placing limits on government anticommunist efforts. Clark dissented vigorously when the Court handed down several decisions in June 1957 restricting the government's anticommunist activities. In Watkins v. U.S., the justices overturned the conviction of a man charged with contempt for refusing to answer questions before the House Un-American Activities Committee. The majority held that the First Amendment limited the investigative powers of Congress and that questions asked by congressional investigators had to be related to a legitimate legislative purpose. Clark alone dissented. He found himself alone in dissent again when, in Yates v. U.S., the Court overturned the convictions of second-tier leaders of the Communist Party and narrowed the scope of the Smith Act. Clark also took the government's side in the case of Clinton E. Jencks, a labor union official who had filed a noncommunist affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board. Seeking to prove the affidavit false, the government used the testimony of paid FBI informers, which it refused to make available to the trial judge. The majority reversed the conviction, and, in yet another solo dissent, Clark openly called for Congress to pass a law overturning the Court's ruling. In addition, Clark dissented from the Court's decision that a federal employee could be summarily dismissed as a security risk only if he had a sensitive job.

In June 1959, Clark finally spoke for the majority in sustaining the contempt conviction of a minister who had refused to turn over to New Hampshire's attorney general the guest list of a summer camp suspected of being a communist meeting place. The justice ruled that the state's interest in discovering the presence of possible subversives outweighed any individual rights of privacy or association involved. Later that month, Clark once again dissented when the Court overturned a government industrial security program on the ground that neither the president nor Congress had authorized certain of the procedures used in the program.

In criminal rights cases, Clark also tended to uphold government power against claims of individual rights. In February 1954, for example, he voted to sustain a state gambling conviction based on illegally seized evidence. He joined the majority in two cases in March 1959, ruling that persons tried for the same offense in both federal and state courts had not been subjected to double jeopardy. Clark, however, was more flexible in this area than in loyalty-security matters and sometimes voted in support of defendants' rights. In April 1956, he was part of a five-justice majority that held that states must, under certain circumstances, supply indigent defendants with free trial transcripts on appeal.

Clark joined in the major Supreme Court decisions outlawing racial segregation, including the landmark Brown ruling of May 1954. He was one of six justices who voted to strike down Truman's decision to seize the nation's steel mills during the Korean War (Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer; 1952). In addition, he wrote a large number of opinions in the field of antitrust law.

During the 1960s, Clark took a liberal position in several important cases involving criminal rights. For example, he wrote the majority opinion in Mapp v. Ohio (1961), which excluded the use of evidence obtained through unreasonable searches and seizures in state criminal trials. In other matters, Clark wrote for the majority in Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), which banned recitation of the Lord's Prayer and Bible reading in public schools, and in a case sustaining the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

When he resigned from the Court in 1967, Clark was generally rated as, at best, an average jurist who had nonetheless grown during his 18 years on the bench and had become a productive member of the Court. He died on June 13, 1977, in New York City.

Clay, Lucius D(ubignon)

(1897–1978) presidential adviser

The son of a politically prominent family, Clay was born in Marietta, Ga., on April 23, 1897. He attended West Point and, following his graduation in 1918, served as an army engineer. During World War II, he was promoted to brigadier general and coordinated the production and procurement of supplies for the army as director of material. In 1944, Clay was appointed deputy director for war programs and general administrator in the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Upon Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's recommendation, Clay became deputy military governor of occupied Germany in April 1945. At that post, he helped establish the four occupation zones and undertook the reconstruction of the American sector. In January 1947, Clay became military governor of the American zone and commanding general of U.S. forces in Europe. During the Soviet blockade of Berlin in 1948, Clay oversaw the airlift that supplied the city for over a year. He also supervised German currency reform and the drafting of the West German constitution. Clay retired from the army in 1949, and a year later became chairman of the board and chief officer of the Continental Can Co. Under his leadership, the company prospered, becoming the largest manufacturer of containers in the United States.

An old friend of Eisenhower, Clay played an important role in the general's campaign for the presidency in 1952. In 1951, when Eisenhower was still commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Clay sought to convince him to run for the Republican presidential nomination. Clay then acted as liaison between the general and professional politicians campaigning for him in the United States. Following Eisenhower's nomination, Clay backed the choice of RICHARD NIXON as the vice presidential candidate. He urged the general to steer a middle course during the race to attract independent voters.

In the postelection period, Clay was one of the advisers, along with HERBERT BROWNELL and SHERMAN ADAMS, who aided Eisenhower in searching out and screening people for high executive positions. Among his recommendations were the appointments of JOHN FOSTER DULLES as secretary of state, GEORGE HUMPHREY as secretary of the treasury, and JOSEPH DODGE as director of the budget. During this period, he also helped organize the meetings between Commerce Secretary-designate SINCLAIR WEEKS and financial leaders that led to the decision to remove wage and price controls.

Clay continued to serve as a presidential adviser during the Eisenhower administration. In late 1954 and early 1955, he headed a presidential commission formed to plan a national highway program. The panel's report, issued in January 1955, called for a 42,000-mile interstate highway network to be built at a cost of $101 billion. The system was to be constructed in cooperation with the states but would rely heavily on federal funding. The report formed the basis for Eisenhower's legislative proposals, adopted in modified form as the Federal Highways Aid Act of 1956.

During the Kennedy administration, Clay served as a presidential adviser on Berlin. In 1962, he headed a committee formed to study U.S. foreign aid policy. In the late 1960s, Clay was a supporter of LYNDON JOHNSON's Vietnam policy. He retired as chairman of the board of Continental Can in 1970 and died in Chatham, Mass., on April 16, 1978.

Clement, Frank G(oad)

(1920–1969) governor of Tennessee

The son of a lawyer, Clement was born in Dickson, Tenn., on June 2, 1920. He attended Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tenn., and received his LL.B. degree from Vanderbilt University in 1942. After spending a year in Chicago as a special agent for the FBI, he joined the army in 1943 and served within the United States throughout the war. In 1946, Clement was appointed general counsel for the Tennessee Railroad and Public Utilities Commission, where he earned a reputation as an outstanding attorney and a “champion of the people.” He became involved in Democratic politics and, in 1952, was elected governor of Tennessee.

During the campaign, Clement's Bible-thumping, evangelical style of political oratory won him a degree of national attention. As governor, he strove primarily to enact educational reform. By March 1953, Clement had gained legislative approval of a $5 million bond issue to provide public-school children with free textbooks. He won reelection in 1954 under a new law granting the governor a four-year term (with the condition that he not seek immediate reelection). During his second term, Clement pushed through the legislature an annual appropriation of $20 million for increased aid to education. He also won legislative approval of a comprehensive public power policy, a new retirement system for state employees, and major reforms in mental health services. To pay for these programs, Clement had the state sales tax increased from 2 to 3 percent.

Much of Clement's tenure was devoted to the issue of school desegregation. After the Supreme Court's decision outlawing segregated schools in 1954, Clement made no secret of his own segregationist attitudes but swore to uphold the law. Thus, in 1955, he vetoed two segregation bills passed by the state legislature. When riots broke out in Clinton, Tenn., in the fall of 1956 over the admission of blacks to previously all-white schools, he responded by calling out the National Guard. Clement declared, “I am not doing this to promote integration or segregation. I am doing this to . . . preserve the peace.” His willingness to uphold the law established his reputation as one of the southern governors least hostile to the Brown decision. In 1957, however, he recommended a five-point anti-integration program. The legislature passed the five bills and three additional measures; Clement signed all eight. Nevertheless, he helped to defeat an interposition resolution and vetoed a bill repealing the state's compulsory attendance law. His attempt to split the difference on the issue of desegregation may have been motivated, at least in part, by his own national political ambitions.

Clement delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 1956. In it, he attacked the Republicans for fostering economic recession and favoring big business over the rights of the common man. The speech was most memorable, however, for its portrayal of Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES as “the greatest unguided missile in the history of American diplomacy” and its characterization of the Eisenhower-Nixon administration as “the vice-hatchet man slinging slander and spreading half-truths while the top man peers down the green fairways of indifference.”

After his term as governor expired in 1959, Clement turned over the office to Buford Ellington, his handpicked successor. In 1962, Clement was elected to another term as governor. His national ambitions were finally destroyed when he ran unsuccessfully for the Senate in 1964 and again in 1966. He died in a car accident in Nashville on November 4, 1969.

Cohn, Roy M(arcus)

(1927–1986) chief counsel, Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Senate Government Operations Committee

The son of a New York State Supreme Court judge and protégé of the boss of the Bronx Co. Democratic machine, Cohn was born on February 20, 1927, in New York City. He attended the Fieldston School, managed by the Ethical Culture Society. By the age of 20, he had graduated from Columbia College and Columbia Law School (in 1947). He had to wait until the next year, when he turned 21, to be admitted to the bar. With the help of his father's political connections, he was immediately hired as an assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York. Over the next four years, Cohn specialized in the prosecution of subversive activities, working as a staff lawyer in the perjury trial of William Remington in 1950–51 and the espionage trial of JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG in 1951.

In 1952, Cohn was transferred to Washington, D.C., where he served for four months as a special assistant to Attorney General James McGranery. Cohn drew up the perjury indictment of Owen Lattimore, whom Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) had charged in 1950 with heading a subversive ring in the State Department. Cohn also conducted a grand jury probe of subversion among employees of the United Nations Secretariat. This probe brought him to the attention of Sen. McCarthy, chairman of the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, who hired him as chief counsel of the panel in January 1953.

Cohn's role in the subcommittee's sensational investigations of communist influence in government agencies was second only to that of McCarthy himself. A brash young man, he was known to pay little attention to the wishes of anyone on the subcommittee except McCarthy. The two worked closely together in coordinating publicity, scheduling hearings, and interrogating witnesses. The Wisconsin senator once remarked that Cohn was "as indispensable as I am."

Energetic and forceful, Cohn was a shrewd strategist with a sharp, retentive mind and a photographic memory. His interrogation of witnesses was relentless and often scornful. Many critics of McCarthy found the chief counsel at least as distasteful as the senator himself and regarded him as an arrogant thug with little or no regard for the ethics of his profession.

In April 1953, Cohn and the subcommittee's chief consultant, G. DAVID SCHINE, went on a 17-day, seven-country tour of Europe in search of pro-communist literature in the State Department's overseas libraries. The trip received extensive publicity in both the American and European press. At the library in Vienna they asked that The American Legion Magazine be placed on the shelves. Then, after finding the works of Mark Twain at the Soviet Culture Center, they went back to the State Department library to see if it had the same books. In Munich, reporters overheard one of them telling a hotel clerk that they wanted separate rooms, since they did not work for the State Department, an allusion to alleged homosexuality among State Department employees. Critics of McCarthy's subcommittee charged the two men with distasteful, childish, and farcical behavior deleterious to America's reputation abroad. The tour prompted President Eisenhower to issue a warning against "book burners" in a commencement address at Dartmouth College in June 1953.

In the fall of 1953, McCarthy and Cohn began hearings on communist infiltration in the army. Meanwhile, the senator and his chief counsel, learning that Schine was to be drafted, tried unsuccessfully to procure a commission for him. After Schine was inducted into the army in November 1953 as a private, Cohn frequently contacted high-level army figures to obtain passes and easy assignments for Schine. McCarthy seemed to have little personal interest in Schine's fortunes, and his participation in or tolerance of these activities indicated the extent of Cohn's influence upon the senator.

On March 11, 1954, after McCarthy had escalated his attack on the army for allegedly tolerating the presence of subversive elements within its ranks, the army released a chronology of the efforts of McCarthy, Cohn, and other members of the subcommittee's staff on Schine's behalf. According to this account, Cohn had threatened to discredit the army through the subcommittee's investigation unless Schine received special treatment. McCarthy quickly counterattacked by alleging that the army was holding Schine as a "hostage" to block the congressional probe.

In April 1954, the Investigations Subcommittee began the so-called Army-McCarthy hearings to examine the charges and countercharges. Since Cohn was a principal in the investigation, he temporarily withdrew as the panel's counsel. During the hearings, Cohn was heard to threaten to “get” a minority member of the subcommittee, Sen. HENRY M. JACKSON (D-Wash.), for attacking McCarthy. On June 14, near the end of the investigation, Cohn unsuccessfully tried to prevent McCarthy from mentioning the fact that a member of Army Counsel JOSEPH WELCH’s law firm had once belonged to a pro-communist group. (Cohn and McCarthy’s lawyer, Edward Bennett Williams, had agreed not to raise the matter.) Welch turned the incident into a confrontation between himself and McCarthy, which severely damaged the senator’s cause.

In August, the subcommittee’s Republican majority issued a report stating that Cohn had been “unduly aggressive and insistent” in the Schine matter. The Democratic minority went further, insisting that he had “misused and abused the powers of his office and brought disrepute to the committee.” In the meantime, Cohn, under strong pressure from Senate Republicans, resigned his position with the subcommittee on July 19.

Cohn joined the New York City law firm that became Saxe, Bacon & Bolan. His family’s influence and his own considerable legal skills brought to the firm an impressive list of clients. Even Cohn’s greatest detractors could not help but admire his technique in the courtroom. At the same time, he played close to the edge of ethical behavior and received several judicial reprimands for unethical conduct. In 1957, he became a professor of law at the New York Law School.

In order to avoid taxes, Cohn took a relatively small salary of $100,000 a year from his law firm. However, he received lavish perquisites such as a rent-free apartment in Manhattan, the use of a chauffeured Rolls-Royce, and a seemingly limitless expense account.

Cohn was tried in federal court on charges including fraud, conspiracy, and corporate manipulation in 1964, 1969, and 1971. All three trials ended in acquittal. He was also in constant trouble with the Internal Revenue Service. On June 23, 1986, not long before his death, he was disbarred. A five-judge panel of the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court found his conduct in four matters “unprofessional” and “unethical.” The panel found his behavior in one of the cases “particularly reprehensible.”

Cohn died on August 2, 1986, in Bethesda, Md. The reported cause of death was HTLV-3 virus, which would later be called HIV and recognized as the cause of AIDS.

Cohn was the author of McCarthy (1968), a defense of the senator from Wisconsin.

Coleman, James P(lemmon)

(1914–1991) governor of Mississippi

Born on a red-dirt farm in Ackerman, Miss., on January 9, 1914, James P. Coleman worked his way through the University of Mississippi and George Washington University law school. He received his LL.B. in 1939. While in Washington, D.C., Coleman worked as secretary to Rep. Aaron L. Ford (D-Miss.) and became friends with Rep. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.). Coleman returned to Mississippi and served first as a district attorney and then a circuit judge between 1939 and 1950. In October 1950, he was elected state attorney general. Coleman served as Democratic national committeeman in 1952 and kept the Mississippi delegation from bolting the Democratic National Convention over a proposed requirement that delegates promise to support the convention’s ticket regardless of its stand on civil rights.

When the Supreme Court struck down segregated public schools in May 1954, Coleman, a staunch defender of segregation, asked for restraint. He cautioned against adoption of a strategy of “massive resistance,” which called for the interposition of state power to prevent enforcement of the decision. Coleman avoided race-baiting and worked to restore stability after the murder of EMMETT TILL in August 1955. On September 1, U.S. Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL announced an inquiry into alleged intimidation of black voters in Mississippi. Coleman denied any violations. In the tense atmosphere following Till’s murder and Brownell’s inquiry, Coleman’s approach was cool and legalistic. He told a meeting of the White Citizens’ Council that eliminating segregation through court action would take the government 2,000 years.

In 1955, Coleman ran for governor on a platform pledging continued segregation by legal means. He ran unopposed in the November election. Soon after he took office in 1956, Coleman announced that he regarded the school desegregation decisions “unconstitutional” and promised that Mississippi would “resist enforcement by every legal and constitutional means available.” Nevertheless, he described the movement to nullify the Court’s decision as “legal poppycock.” In the face of an increasing rightward trend, however, the governor adopted a more segregationist position.

He endorsed interposition in January 1956 at a conference convened by Virginia’s Gov. THOMAS STANLEY but refused to join a call for nullification. The following month, Coleman obtained legislative approval for a $78 million school budget—the largest in state history—to upgrade black schools and silence Northern critics. He also urged a bill giving businesses the right to choose their customers and providing segregated waiting rooms in intrastate travel.

The segregation laws failed to allay fears of integration, and, in 1956, the governor faced a restive state party divided over political strategy in the upcoming presidential election. In May, the Association of Citizens’ Councils, a group of white supremacist organizations, formulated a resolution demanding that the state delegation to the Democratic National Convention accept only a presidential candidate who supported interposition. Coleman offered an alternative strategy he called “friendly persuasion.” He maintained that southern leaders should focus on an acceptable compromise on issues relating to segregation and that they should do so within the privacy of committees. Inflammatory public rhetoric, Coleman argued, would only provoke Northern delegates into rigid positions. He further contended that political realities would force Northern party leaders to accommodate southern views. Supported by Sen. JOHN STENNIS (D-Miss.), Coleman’s plea for an unpledged delegation prevailed. At the Democratic National Convention, southern delegates employed Coleman’s strategy and won the adoption of a moderate civil rights plank in the platform.

Coleman attempted to conduct his and Mississippi’s opposition to Brown in as orderly and dignified a manner as possible. Toward that end, he proposed a State Sovereignty Commission in June 1956. Coleman intended that the commission would impede desegregation but at the same time calm racial tensions, erode support for the citizens’ councils, and avoid negative publicity in the national media. The legislature, however, saw the commission as a means of stamping out any opposition to segregation and granted the commission extraordinary authority “to do and perform any and all acts . . . necessary and proper to protect the sovereignty of the State of Mississippi.” Under Coleman’s successor, Ross Barnett, the commission became a means of imposing racial orthodoxy.

The kind of moderation Coleman advocated garnered little political support. He prevented the White Citizens’ Councils from obtaining tax money and in April 1959 called in the FBI after the lynching of Mack Parker. When he supported a new constitution that did not mention race, the legislature defeated it. Although Coleman could not succeed himself, voters effectively repudiated him in 1960 by electing Barnett, a die-hard segregationist whom Coleman opposed. That same year, Coleman supported the candidacy of Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) for the presidency.

Coleman won election to the state legislature in 1960 and served through 1964. He ran for governor in 1963 as a racial moderate but lost in the Democratic primary to Paul B. Johnson, Jr., Barnett’s lieutenant governor. In 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson, at the behest of Sen. JAMES O. EASTLAND (D-Miss.), appointed Coleman to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Coleman later became chief judge and served in that capacity until his retirement in 1981. He died in Ackerman, Miss., on September 28, 1991.

Coleman, John S(trader)

The son of a hardware merchant, John S. Coleman was born in Charleston, W.Va., on October 12, 1897. He attended Washington, D.C.’s, Emerson Institute and worked at the Guaranty Trust Corp. of New York before World War I. He served in the army during the war. Coleman joined the sales staff of the Burroughs Adding Machine Corp.

in 1920, while studying law at night at Georgetown University. He received his LL.B. from that institution in 1924. After obtaining a million-dollar contract with the government for Burroughs, he rose rapidly through the company hierarchy, eventually becoming president in 1946. He greatly improved efficiency at Burroughs, doubling the number of workers and increasing production. Under Coleman's leadership, Burroughs Adding Corp. smoothly made the transition from adding machine production to more diversified operations and did pioneering work in the construction of computers.

A political conservative, who advocated less government regulation and interference in business affairs, he nevertheless urged greater cooperation between labor, management and government. Burroughs attempted to apply "human engineering" to his organization, maintaining that "the function of management is to operate a successful organization both economically and humanly . . . [and] to give every man a sense of function."

Coleman was an ardent advocate of free trade. During the 1940s, he directed a 10-year study for the Detroit Board of Commerce, which concluded in November 1952 that all U.S. tariffs should be abolished. However, he modified his position at the Chicago World Trade Conference in February 1953, calling instead for a gradual reduction of duties. Coleman saw the election of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in 1952 as an opportunity for business to exercise its responsibility to the world by cooperating with the president to prevent another depression.

In March 1956, Coleman was elected president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce; the following year, he became chairman of the board. During his two years in office, Coleman served as spokesman for the organization's pro-business philosophy. In a statement in February 1957, he proposed cuts in the federal budget, maintaining that $5 billion could be eliminated by reducing federal aid to education, college housing loans, funds to fight juvenile delinquency, and welfare grants. He charged that Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare MARION FOLSOM had overestimated the national classroom shortage. Coleman contended that, given the present rate of school construction, the problem would be solved by 1960 and claimed that the federal government sought to provide aid as a way of controlling public schools. His position was backed by the National Association of Manufacturers, which represented smaller businessmen. Coleman also demanded that foreign aid and farm programs be scaled down.

Coleman died of a heart attack on April 13, 1958, in Detroit, Mich.

Collins, J(oseph) Lawton

(1896–1987) U.S. special representative in Vietnam

The son of Irish-Catholic parents, J. Lawton Collins was born in New Orleans on May 1, 1896. After graduating from the United States Military Academy in 1917, Collins commanded a battalion of the occupation forces in Germany during 1919. Collins served in various military capacities in the 1920s and 1930s, and, by the outbreak of World War II, he had achieved the rank of brigadier general. During World War II, he saw active duty in the Pacific, where he helped reorganize American defenses on Hawaii. He also commanded the 25th Division on Guadalcanal, where his aggressive tactics earned him the nickname "Lightning Joe." In June 1944, as commander of VII Corps, he led the breakout from the Normandy beachhead. Collins went on to command a number of successful operations in France and Germany and was promoted to lieutenant general in April 1945. After the war, he was assigned to the Pentagon and from 1948 to 1953 served as army chief of staff. In 1953, President Eisenhower appointed him U.S. representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

Following the partition of Vietnam in 1954, Collins became prominently involved in the policy debate over U.S. support of South Vietnam's Premier, Ngo Dinh Diem. On November 3, 1954, Eisenhower appointed Collins special United States representative to Vietnam with the "personal rank of Ambassador." From his arrival in Vietnam, Collins expressed doubts about Diem. Other American officials, including the principal American intelligence officer in Vietnam, Col. EDWARD LANSDALE, supported Diem. Whatever his misgivings, Collins initiated a program aiding Diem in establishing security, in training the South Vietnamese Army, and in laying the groundwork for agrarian reform. He also helped Diem to engineer the effective exile of a major rival, Gen. Nguyen Van Hinh. Despite these efforts, Collins never established a working relationship with Diem. The Vietnamese leader refused to heed Collins's military and political advice.

By March 1955, Collins and other U.S. officials in both Saigon and Washington, distressed by Diem's refusal to institute suggested reforms, began to reconsider U.S. support for the premier. The immediate issue was the premier's refusal to reorganize the government to include representatives from South Vietnam's powerful political-religious sects. When Diem turned down the sects' demands for a coalition government in late March 1955, fighting broke out in the streets of Saigon between government forces and the sects, principally the Binh Xuyen.

Collins recommended that the United States consider alternatives to Diem, and in an exchange of messages with Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES argued forcefully for replacing Diem. Dulles and his advisers in the State Department were inclined to continue support for Diem, or at least not to discard him abruptly or completely. Eisenhower, who had confidence in both Dulles and Collins, allowed each to make his case and reserved judgment.

In mid-April, Collins was recalled to Washington for consultation. The general held to his position that continued support for Diem would be a "major error." He persuaded Eisenhower, and the State Department could do "nothing more than arrange a face-saving compromise" that would retain Diem as president in a largely titular role while real power passed to Dr. Phan Huy Quat of the Dai Viet party. At this point, however, fighting broke out in Saigon between the Binh Xuyen forces and the Vietnamese National Army, during which the VNA quickly gained the advantage. Diem's supporters, including senators MIKE MANSFIELD (D-Mont.) and WILLIAM KNOWLAND (D-Calif.) as well as Dulles, lobbied hard for Diem, and American policy reverted to support for the Vietnamese premier. Diem proceeded to crush the sects. Collins remained skeptical; he believed that Diem would become more unlikely to heed American advice to broaden the base of his government.

With the shift in American policy, Collins was replaced. He returned to Washington in May 1955, and shortly thereafter resumed his duties as U.S. representative to NATO.

Retiring from government service in 1957, he served until 1969 as a director of Charles Pfizer and Co., and as vice president of Pfizer International Subsidiaries until 1972. Throughout these years, Collins remained skeptical about U.S. policy in Vietnam and, as one of a small group of "dovish generals," opposed the continual escalation of American involvement in Southeast Asia.

He died of a heart attack on September 12, 1987, in Washington, D.C.

Collins, (Thomas) LeRoy (1909–1991) governor of Florida

A grocer's son, LeRoy Collins was born on March 10, 1909, in Tallahassee, Fla. He remained in Tallahassee until he graduated from high school in 1927. After high school, he studied at the Eastman School of Business in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and spent a year at the Cumberland Law School in Lebanon, Tenn. After gaining admission to the Florida bar, Collins started his own practice in Tallahassee and clerked part-time for the Works Progress Administration. He won election as a Democrat to the Florida House of Representatives in 1934 and to the state senate in 1940. Except for two years in the navy during World War II, Collins served continuously in the legislature until 1954. In the state senate, he earned a reputation for moderate progressivism. A poll of Florida journalists twice named him the state's "most valuable senator."

Beginning in 1952, Collins's own political future became linked with that of Democratic Gov. Dan McCarty, who led a reform coalition of urban voters and minority groups supporting improvements in state services and the continuation of diversified economic development. Following McCarty's death in September 1953, Collins assumed the leadership of the faction.

In 1954, Collins ran for election to fill out the remaining two years of McCarty's term. In the Democratic primary, he defeated Gov. Charley E. Johns, who had been appointed to fill the remainder of McCarty's term and was commonly identified with the party's powerful, archconservative wing. Although Collins condemned Johns's failure to support an anti-Ku Klux Klan bill while he had been a state legislator in 1951, race relations were only a minor issue in the campaign. Collins won election in November without Republican opposition.

As governor, Collins fit the image-conscious, growth-oriented mold of what historians of the modern South term "business progressivism." He improved state services, upgraded Florida's educational systems, and reduced patronage through the extension of the civil service system. He also attempted to reapportion the state to give the growing urban centers more equitable representation, but his efforts failed.

Much of Collins's time was devoted to the issue of civil rights. When the Supreme Court struck down segregated public schools in the Brown decision (1954), Collins reacted cautiously. Although he said he favored segregated schools, he warned against "hysteria and political demagoguery." In April 1955, he told the legislature that no new laws were needed to protect segregation. Instead, he suggested that the legislators throw the state's weight behind orderly efforts to reverse the decision. Ignoring the governor, the legislature passed three segregationist measures, which Collins criticized but signed. They provided for the assignment of students to schools on the basis of health, safety, and education and not race.

During the gubernatorial campaign of 1956, in which the governor was opposed by a militant segregationist, Sumter Lowry, Collins became a more vocal advocate of the status quo, but he urged that it be maintained by lawful and peaceful means. He announced that he refused to "have the state torn asunder by rioting and disorder and violence and the sort of thing that [Lowry] is seeking to invite." Collins won the election handily. However, Florida's Democratic Party became even more fragmented. Collins's strength declined in his native northern Florida while it grew in urban and black districts.

Following the Supreme Court's ruling in May 1955 that local school authorities had the duty to implement desegregation, Collins called the legislature into session to enact a program to counter the decision. It passed a pupil placement law permitting appeals from decisions of local school boards and gave the governor emergency power to call out the militia to prevent or suppress violence. The legislature also adopted a resolution condemning the Supreme Court and asserting the state's right to regulate education. However, Collins opposed more radical antisegregation legislation. He criticized a joint legislative resolution passed in 1957 that nullified recent antisegregation Supreme Court edicts, announcing "it is anarchy and rebellion against the nation which must remain 'indivisible under God' if it is to survive. I decry it as an evil thing, whipped up by the demagogues and carried in the hot and erratic words of passion, prejudice and hysteria." Collins also lobbied against other extreme measures and in June 1957 vetoed a law providing for a local option on whether or not to close schools facing desegregation. During the crisis involving desegregation in Little Rock, Ark., in 1957, Collins pleaded for moderation in settling the issue. Before the Southern Governors Conference in late September, he asked that southerners consider Supreme Court rulings "the law of the land and insist that ours must be a land of the law." The southerner, he said, "must not sanction violence, defiance and disorder and, above all, he must abhor hate." The speech earned him widespread praise and contributed to his image as a leading southern moderate.

In his last years as governor, Collins acted increasingly like a national, rather than sectional, leader. He headed the National Governors Conference in May 1958, visited with Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev in July 1959, and became the first southern governor since the Civil War to serve as permanent chairman at the Democratic National Convention in July 1960. A few observers considered him a possibility for national office in 1960. Yet Collins's professed aspirations for national office were hurt by Florida's still slow adjustment to desegregation. Indeed, critics pointed out that, while Collins had talked about leading his people into compliance with the Court's decision, Florida had made less progress toward desegregation than Virginia, which pursued a policy of massive resistance.

Collins's career as an elected public official ended with his second term. Between 1961 and 1964, Collins was president of the National Association of Broadcasters. In 1964, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Collins to be the first head of the Community Relations Service, created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to promote peaceful compliance with the law. In that capacity, Collins played a central role in defusing the civil rights crisis at Selma in 1965. Later that year, Collins was appointed under-secretary of commerce.

Collins returned to Florida in 1966 to practice law, and when Sen. GEORGE SMATHERS (D-Fla.) decided not to seek reelection in 1968, Collins ran for the vacant senate seat. After narrowly defeating a conservative in the primary, he lost in the general election. Collins returned to Tallahassee, joined a prestigious law firm, wrote a book (Forerunners Courageous: Stories of Frontier Florida, 1971), and served on several government commissions. He died in Tallahassee on March 12, 1991.

Conant, James B(ryant)

(1893–1978) high commissioner for West Germany, ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany

Born in Dorchester, Mass., on March 26, 1893, Conant graduated from Harvard in 1913 and received his Ph.D. in chemistry there in 1916. During World War I, he supervised the production of poisonous gas for the Chemical Warfare Service. Conant joined the faculty at Harvard in 1919 and won recognition for his research in organic chemistry as well as for his influence as an educator. He became president of Harvard in 1933, a post he retained until 1953. During his tenure, Conant emphasized the need for general education for undergraduates and reformed the system of faculty promotion.

As chairman of the National Defense Research Committee in 1940 and, from 1941 to 1946, as deputy director of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, Conant coordinated war-related scientific research, particularly that involving the development of the atomic bomb. In 1945, he served on the presidential advisory committee that recommended deploying the atomic bomb against Japan without prior warning.

Between 1947 and 1950, Conant served on the General Advisory Committee (GAC) of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC). During the period, he emerged as the panel's strongest, most outspoken opponent of the development of the hydrogen bomb. With the majority of committee members, he signed a statement denouncing the weapon for strategic as well as political reasons, saying that it could only be a "weapon of genocide."

Conant served as U.S. high commissioner for Germany from 1953 to 1955. His major tasks were to prepare West Germany for full independence, begin steps for its inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and protect U.S. claims of free access to the Russian sector, particularly in Berlin. Following the formal establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany in 1955, Conant was named U.S. ambassador there. He resigned the post in January 1957 and declined an offer to become ambassador to India.

During the early 1950s, Conant had frequently criticized anticommunist investigations in schools and government. In his final report as president of Harvard, he warned that the damage done by such investigations was "far greater than any conceivable harm" a communist teacher might do. He was particularly alarmed about the possible ramifications of the security hearing involving J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER in 1954. The director of the wartime atomic bomb project, Oppenheimer had had his security clearance suspended in late 1953 because of his prewar left-wing politics and his postwar ambivalence about the development of the hydrogen bomb. During the security hearing, Conant testified that Oppenheimer had been "thoroughly loyal," and he pointed out that he, too, had opposed the bomb's development. However, the AEC voted to maintain the suspension.

During the late-1950s, Conant devoted himself to educational projects. In March 1957, he received a Carnegie Corp. grant to make a thorough study of U.S. secondary education. His report, released in 1960 as The American High School Today, affirmed the basic soundness of U.S. schools while stressing the need to study "solid" academic subjects, including languages. It further recommended consolidating small schools into larger, presumably more efficient, ones and creating a curriculum consisting of several levels that would serve the various intellectual abilities and future plans of students. In February 1960, Eisenhower appointed Conant to the Commission on National Goals. The Commission report, issued that November, concluded that to respond to the “Sino-Soviet threat” and the dangers of the nuclear age, the United States should strengthen itself domestically by ensuring individual freedoms. The report called on the federal government to “stimulate changes in attitude” concerning race and act against discriminatory voting practices.

Conant continued to write and lecture on education and foreign policy through the 1960s. In 1964, he wrote Slums and Suburbs, which described inner city schools as “social dynamite.” Conant returned to Berlin as an advisor on education for 18 months beginning in 1964.

He eventually retired to New York City but continued to comment on national affairs. Conant was a vocal supporter of the Johnson administration’s conduct of the war in Vietnam. He died on February 11, 1978, in Hanover, N.H.

Cooper, (Leon) Jere

(1893–1957) U.S. congressman; chairman, Ways and Means Committee

Cooper was born on a farm in Dyer County, Tenn., on July 20, 1893. After receiving an LL.B. degree from Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tenn., in 1914, he was admitted to the state bar the same year and began practicing law in Dyersburg. After service in the army in World War I, Cooper won election to the Dyersburg City Council and in 1920 was appointed the town’s attorney.

Cooper won a seat as a Democrat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1928 and subsequently backed most New Deal and Fair Deal measures. He was also one of the leading congressional supporters of Secretary of State Cordell Hull’s reciprocal trade program. He became a member of the Ways and Means Committee in 1932 and seven years later became chairman of the panel’s subcommittee on taxation. Cooper developed a reputation as an expert on tax matters and played a key role in establishing the system of withholding taxes.

As the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee during the first two years of the Eisenhower administration, Cooper was a leading critic of the president’s tax bill in 1954. With many other Democrats, he denounced it for giving more relief to the wealthy than to the poor. On the floor of the House, he attacked the bill’s dividend tax relief provision, stating that he “objected to the principle of providing more favorable treatment for unearned income than for earned income.” Democratic efforts, backed by Cooper, to replace the dividend relief provision with a personal exemption increase were defeated in both houses.

In 1955, Cooper became chairman of the Ways and Means Committee as well as chairman of the Joint Internal Revenue Taxation Committee. Under his leadership, the Ways and Means panel appended to a corporate and excise tax extension measure a $20 income tax reduction for all persons entitled to a personal exemption. The Senate rejected the proposal. Cooper led the House delegation in a joint House-Senate conference on the bill and demanded reinstatement of the reduction. However, because of what he termed the government’s need for revenue from corporate and excise taxes, he reluctantly struck the tax credit.

Cooper strongly backed the administration’s request in 1953 for extension of reciprocal trade legislation. Representing a largely rural constituency, he asserted that “if there should be a decline in the exports of farm products so as to increase the supply available to our domestic market by only 7 or 8 percent, farm prices would fall as much as one-third.”

Congress voted to renew the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for one year in 1953 and again in 1954. In 1955, Cooper, then the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced and helped to oversee passage of legislation to extend the reciprocal trade law for three years and to grant the president authority to cut tariffs by 5 percent during each of the three years.

Cooper died of a heart attack in Bethesda, Md., on December 18, 1957.

Cooper, John S(herman)

(1901–1991) U.S. senator, ambassador to India and Nepal

Born in Somerset, Ky., on August 23, 1901, Cooper graduated from Yale in 1923 and attended Harvard Law School from 1923 to 1925. He then returned to Kentucky, where he was admitted to the bar in 1928. That same year, he won election as a Republican to the state legislature. He sat as a county judge from 1930 until 1938. Cooper served in the army during World War II, and, in the immediate postwar period, he helped reorganize the German judicial system in Bavaria.

In 1945, Cooper won election as a circuit judge in Kentucky; he resigned in November 1946, having won a special election to fill the Senate seat vacated by the resignation of ALBERT B. CHANDLER. After failing to win reelection in 1948, Cooper briefly resumed the practice of law. He was a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN General Assembly from 1949 to 1951 and during that time also served as a consultant to Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON. Upon the death of Senator Virgil M. Chapman, Cooper won a special election to fill the remainder of his term. Cooper entered the Senate for the second time in November 1952, but in 1954 he once again failed to win reelection. President Eisenhower appointed him ambassador to India and Nepal in 1955. The following year, Cooper won a Senate seat in yet another special election, this one occasioned by the death of Alben W. Barkley. Cooper won reelection to a full term in 1960 and again in 1966.

Cooper early on established himself as one of the Senate's most liberal and independent Republicans. A critic of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's anti-communist campaign, Cooper was among the first Republicans to endorse McCarthy's censure.

During the 1950s, Cooper spoke frequently on international affairs and opposed the vehement anticommunist position of many of his colleagues as dangerously extreme. In January 1953, he was the only Republican who voted against the unsuccessful Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president's treaty-making powers. Two months later, Cooper opposed Sen. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND's (R-Calif.) proposal that the U.S. blockade the coast of China and have the Soviet Union condemned in the United Nations as a "supporter of aggression in the Far East." In July 1958, he protested Eisenhower's decision to land U.S. troops in Lebanon.

Cooper was one of the few Republican defenders of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), and he advocated its expansion. In July 1954, he cast the sole Republican vote against Eisenhower's omnibus atomic energy bill, which included the Dixon-Yates contract providing for a private utility to replace the TVA as the Atomic Energy Commission's chief energy supplier in the Memphis, Tenn., region. Cooper also voted for a Democratic area redevelopment bill introduced in March 1959. The measure, which called for federal funds to stimulate business in economically depressed areas, was vetoed by Eisenhower, who sent Cooper a letter suggesting other methods of developing the region. However, Cooper maintained his original position and supported an unsuccessful attempt to override the veto in May 1960.

The senator was among the strongest Republican supporters of civil rights legislation. In January 1957, he voted for a proposal to ease cloture proceedings, an unsuccessful effort by advocates of civil rights to skirt the filibuster used by southern opponents of civil rights. Cooper opposed a southern attempt to weaken the Civil Rights Act of 1957 by guaranteeing a jury trial to persons accused of obstructing the voting rights of others. An amendment he proposed in July 1957 to let the attorney general decide whether or not to grant a jury trial in such cases was rejected by the Senate, 81-8. He also favored expansion of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and 1960 to include school desegregation provisions, although the provision failed to make the final version of either act.

Republican liberals nominated Cooper for Senate Republican leader in December 1958, but he was defeated by Sen. EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.). In 1960, Cooper joined seven other Republican senators in offering a voluntary federal-state health insurance program for all Americans over 65. Under the plan, the state would have contracted with private firms for the coverage, and subscribers would have made payments based on income, with the federal and state governments sharing the remaining costs. Cooper's proposal was more liberal than the administration's plan, which limited aid to single elderly persons with adjusted gross incomes of up to $2,500 a year and married couples with annual incomes up to $3,800. The plan finally adopted in August contained most of the basic features of Cooper's proposal. However, it required a means test and permitted each state to determine the type and extent of medical assistance provided.

During the 1960s, Cooper continued to support civil rights legislation. He became a leading Republican critic of the Johnson administration's conduct of the Vietnam War and in 1970 cosponsored an amendment prohibiting the use of U.S. troops in Cambodia. Cooper did not stand for reelection in 1972.

After leaving the Senate, he served as ambassador to the German Democratic Republic from 1974 to 1976, after which he resumed the practice of law in Washington, D.C. He died in Washington on February 21, 1991.

Corsi, Edward

(1896–1964) special assistant to the State

Department for Refugee and Immigration Problems

Born in Abruzzi, Italy, on December 29, 1896, Corsi immigrated to the U.S. at the age of seven. His family settled on New York's Lower East Side, and Corsi attended both public and parochial schools. He also became active in Haarlem House, a settlement house in New York's Little Italy. Corsi worked his way through Fordham University School of Law, from which he graduated in 1922. He then began a career as a journalist for Outlook magazine and the New York World. President HERBERT HOOVER appointed him immigration commissioner at Ellis Island in 1931, where he improved and humanized procedures for handling immigrants. He served in that post until 1934, when New York's mayor, Fiorello La Guardia, appointed him director of emergency relief. The next year, Corsi became deputy city welfare director. Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY appointed him state industrial commissioner in 1943. A lifelong Republican, Corsi ran unsuccessfully for a U.S. Senate seat in 1938 and for mayor of New York City in 1950.

In December 1954, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES appointed Corsi a State Department consultant to help increase immigration under the Refugee Relief Act of 1953. Corsi was to work with SCOTT McLEOD, the State Department's security director, to process the entry of 214,000 over-quota refugees into the United States in three years. McLeod and Corsi repeatedly clashed over the administration of the program. The security director insisted on a thorough security check of all entrants, thus slowing down arrivals. Corsi, on the other hand, had elaborate plans to recruit refugees, facilitate the entry process, and shortcut the act's delaying provisions. In addition, the two men fought over authority; Corsi refused to be McLeod's assistant.

On February 28, Rep. FRANCIS E. WALTER (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Immigration Subcommittee, charged that Corsi had been associated with two allegedly left-wing organizations: the National Lawyers Guild and the American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born. Corsi denied the charges. On March 1, Walter admitted his error with respect to the Lawyers Guild but maintained his position on the other charge. Walter supported McLeod on his clash with Corsi and in a letter to Dulles demanded Corsi's ouster "forthwith." On March 16, McLeod offered Corsi the choice of being his deputy or heading an insignificant project surveying immigration in Latin America, Corsi did not respond.

At the beginning of April, Dulles notified Corsi that his appointment had been a 90-day assignment and would not be renewed. The secretary stressed that he did not question Corsi's loyalty and, in token of this, again offered him the job in Latin America. Corsi refused it, charging that his dismissal had been the result of pressure from Walter and McLeod.

Congressional liberals denounced Corsi's ouster and demanded an investigation of the incident. In press conferences and in testimony before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee, Dulles and McLeod defended their action. They maintained that Corsi had tried to bypass some provisions of the Refugee Relief Act and was incapable of administering the program. McLeod denied that he had known of Walter's demand when he made Corsi the Latin America job offer. Corsi, in turn, charged that the administration of the act was a national scandal. The law's administration was "wholly dominated by the psychology of security," Corsi declared. He said "refugees are investigated to death" because "the police job is the thing, not the admission of the refugees—that is just incidental."

New York's governor, AVERELL HARRIMAN, appointed Corsi to the New York State Unemployment Insurance Board in 1958. Corsi also served as director of the New York World's Fair. He practiced law in New York until his death in an automobile accident in Kensington, N.Y., on December 13, 1964.

Costello, Frank

(1891–1973) organized crime figure

Born Francesco Castiglia in Cosenza, Italy, on January 26, 1891, Frank Costello came to the United States in 1896 and settled in predominantly Italian East Harlem. He became aware early of ethnic power politics in Tammany Hall and changed his name to the Irish Costello in 1914. He was arrested twice by the age of 21, and in 1915 he received a one-year prison sentence for carrying a gun.

Costello became prominent as a bootlegger and controller of New York City slot machines during the early 1920s. Although a close friend of such rising organized crime figures as ALBERT ANASTASIA and Lucky Luciano, unlike these two, he preferred manipulation to violence. During the 1930s and 1940s, he cultivated Democratic leaders in Tammany Hall. Costello's rackets encountered little official opposition except during the administration of Mayor Fiorello La Guardia, who drove slot machines out of New York in 1935. Costello then moved his machines to New Orleans at the invitation of Sen. Huey P. Long (D-La.), who promised to legalize them. In 1936, after Luciano went to prison and Mafia leader VITO GENOVESE fled to Italy, Costello found himself head of the New York syndicate. He controlled Manhattan's organized crime for the next 10 years. In 1939, federal authorities tried Costello in New Orleans for tax evasion but lost the case because of lack of evidence.

The Senate Crime Investigating Committee's probe of organized crime in 1951 exposed the extent of Costello's racketeering and political influence. For eight days in February and March, Costello testified before the panel, led by Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.), on his role in New York City politics. Kefauver made public wiretaps documenting Costello's role in the Democratic nomination of Thomas Aurelio for the State Supreme Court in 1943. Costello's influence over Tammany leaders also enabled William O'Dwyer to win the nomination and election for mayor in 1945.

No formal charges were brought against Costello because much of the evidence had been gained by wiretaps, legally inadmissible in court. However, when Costello walked out of the hearing room on March 15, on the ground that he had a sore throat, the committee cited him for contempt of Congress. Kefauver concluded that Costello was part of a national axis of crime including racketeers Meyer Lansky and Joe Adonis. In 1952, Costello was convicted on the contempt charge and sentenced to 18 months in prison and a $5,000 fine. He went free pending appeal. Later that year, the federal government began proceedings to revoke his citizenship on the ground that he had lied about his occupation on naturalization papers.

In 1953, Costello was indicted, and in May 1954 was convicted of evading $73,714 in income taxes. He received a five-year sentence and a $2,000 fine but was freed on bail in 1957. Publicity, time spent in prison, and legal appeals weakened Costello within the Mafia. Vying for leadership, Vito Genovese attempted to have him assassinated in May 1957, but Costello survived. After the killing of Anastasia in October, Costello retired. In February 1961, the Supreme Court upheld the revocation of his citizenship.

Costello was released from prison in June 1961. During the remaining years of his life, he stayed out of the public eye. According to the New York Times, however, Costello came out of retirement after the death of Vito Genovese in 1969 to lead the New York underworld. He was involved in long-range planning and mediation of disputes rather than day-to-day operations. Costello died of natural causes in New York City on February 1, 1973.

Cotton, Norris

(1900–1989) U.S. congressman and senator

Born in Warren, N.H., on May 11, 1900, Cotton graduated from Wesleyan University in 1923 and was elected as a Republican to the New Hampshire House of Representatives the following year. From 1924 to 1928, he served as secretary to U.S. Sen. George H. Moses (R-N.H.) while attending George Washington University Law School. Cotton was admitted to the New Hampshire bar in 1928 and commenced the practice of law in Lebanon. From 1933 to 1939, he was district attorney for Grafton Co., and from 1939 to 1944 he sat as a justice in the municipal court of Lebanon. He again served in the state house of representatives in 1943 and 1945. Cotton was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946. There he compiled a conservative record, voting to override President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto of the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947, to support the subversive activities control bill in 1948, and to oppose the administration's long-term housing bill in 1949.

Cotton won a special election to fill a vacant Senate seat in 1952. He continued his conservative voting pattern in the upper house, fighting measures extending the power of the federal government. In April 1955, he opposed a federal highway program financed through general treasury funds on the grounds that it would increase taxes and the public debt and would impose federal controls in areas previously left to the states. The proposal, passed by the Senate but rejected by the House, was a substitute for the Eisenhower administration's plan to finance highway construction through a federal bond issue.

In 1956, Cotton opposed a public power project at Niagara Falls, stating that "it is simply a question of private versus government enterprise, and I believe in private enterprise." He also voted against the area redevelopment bill of 1958.

Cotton supported the Eisenhower administration's federal employee security program. In June 1956, the Supreme Court ruled that, under a law passed in 1950, the president's executive order of April 1953, which permitted the dismissal of any federal employee for doubtful loyalty, could apply only to persons in sensitive positions. Following the decision, Cotton and Senators KARL E. MUNDT (R-S. Dak.), EDWARD MARTIN (R-Pa.), and WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) introduced a bill amending the act to extend the program to all government employees regardless of position. The measure was not reported to the Senate floor.

In June 1958, the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee's Legislative Oversight Subcommittee began an investigation into the relationship between Boston industrialist BERNARD GOLDFINE and presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS, a probe that culminated in Adams's resignation. The following month, Goldfine acknowledged that he had paid hotel bills for Cotton and Sens. Frederick Payne (R-Me.) and STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.).

Cotton consistently opposed the domestic legislation of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. A militant anticommunist, he backed American involvement in Vietnam throughout the 1960s. During the early 1970s, however, he became disenchanted with the war. He opposed U.S. military intervention in Cambodia and American support for the regime in Vietnam. Cotton served as chairman of the Republican Conference from 1973 to 1975. He declined to run for reelection in 1974, but returned to the Senate briefly when, on August 8, 1975, he was appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the contested election of November 5, 1974. He served until September 18, 1975. Cotton died in Lebanon, N.H., on February 24, 1989.

Cousins, Norman

(1915–1990) editor, Saturday Review

Cousins was born in Union City, N.J., on June 24, 1915. He graduated from Teachers College at Columbia University in 1933, and the following year he was hired as an editor on the New York Post. After subsequently working as a book critic for Current History, he became the editor of the Saturday Review of Literature (later the Saturday Review), a liberal literary weekly, in 1942. Cousins expanded the magazine's format to include feature articles on current events and his own editorials on political and cultural problems, in addition to book reviews.

Although a supporter of American involvement in World War II, Cousins became a peace activist as a result of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima. On the night of August 6, 1945, the day the bomb was dropped, he composed a famous editorial for the Review titled "Modern Man Is Obsolete," in which he declared that human survival had become absolutely dependent on man's ability to avoid a new war. Believing that nuclear destruction could be averted only by the establishment of a new international order, Cousins helped found the United World Federalists in 1947, an organization that advocated transforming the United Nations into a world government with the authority to enforce disarmament.

During the late-1950s, Cousins played an important role in the protest against the atmospheric testing of nuclear bombs. In 1957, he helped organize the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE), a coalition of pacifists and nonpacifists that called for the immediate cessation of nuclear testing. With Cousins as cochairman, SANE began by publicizing the threat of genetic damage and contamination of the food supply from atomic fallout. After the United States and the Soviet Union both suspended testing in 1958, the organization, which had grown to about 25,000 members, broadened its aims to include general disarmament. At the same time, SANE continued to work for a permanent test ban treaty, organizing mass demonstrations in support of his proposal throughout the country in 1959 and 1960.

In May 1960, one week after it held a rally that packed New York's Madison Square Garden, Sen. THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.) charged that SANE was infiltrated by communists. Cousins responded by suspending the organizer of the rally, whom Dodd had named as one of the "infiltrators," and proposing a resolution, adopted by SANE's national board, restricting membership in the organization to those "whose support is not qualified by adherence to communist or other totalitarian doctrine." Dodd later claimed that Cousins had agreed to supply his Senate Internal Security Subcommittee with the names of alleged communists in SANE, but Cousins denied having offered to cooperate with the investigation. Several leading peace activists condemned Cousins's actions as a capitulation to McCarthyism, and many resigned from SANE in protest.

In the following years, Cousins continued to work for a nuclear test ban treaty and to advocate disarmament through a world rule of law. During the late 1960s, he was active in the campaign for a negotiated settlement of the Vietnam War. In November 1971, Cousins resigned his post at the Saturday Review because of an editorial dispute with its new owners. The following year, he founded World magazine. In 1973, Cousins bought the then-bankrupt Saturday Review and combined it with his new publication to form Saturday Review/World.

After recovering from a life-threatening form of arthritis, he became convinced of the importance of a positive attitude in the process of healing. He advanced this view in Anatomy of an Illness (1979), The Healing Heart (1983), and Head First: The Biology of Hope (1989). He died of a heart attack on November 30, 1990, in Los Angeles.

Cross, Hugh

(1896–1972) member and chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission

The son of early Illinois pioneers, Cross was born on August 24, 1896, in Jerseyville, Ill. He received his law degree from the University of Illinois in 1921, and began legal practice in Jerseyville. In 1932, he won election as a Republican to the Illinois General Assembly, where he served four successive two-year terms. He was elected Speaker of the House in 1939. Cross was lieutenant governor from 1940 to 1948. In April 1949, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him to serve out an unexpired term on the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC). He was reappointed to a full seven-year term in December 1950. The commission rotated its chairmanship, and on the basis of his seniority, Cross became chairman in July 1955.

In November 1955, the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee began closed hearings on possible conflict of interest involving Cross. Testimony revealed that Cross had contacted the heads of three railroads in an effort to secure for Railroad Transfer Service, Inc. a contract to haul passengers and baggage between Chicago's eight rail terminals. John Keeshin, a longtime friend of Cross, owned Railroad Transfer.

Paul E. Feucht, president of one of the lines, told the panel that Cross had telephoned him saying he was "very much interested in seeing that J. L. Keeshin got the new contract with the railroad." Even more damaging was the testimony of two other presidents who reported having heard rumors that Cross was unhappy in Washington and would resign his post to head Railroad Transfer if the company were awarded the contract. Keeshin told the subcommittee that he had discussed business with Cross but denied that he had offered the commissioner a job. Cross, too, denied charges that Keeshin had promised him a job in return for his favors. The subcommittee concluded that, although there was no evidence that Cross had acted corruptly or illegally, he had "behaved in an unwise manner involving impropriety." Both Democratic and Republican members of the panel agreed not to pursue the investigation if Cross resigned. On November 23, 1955, he sent a letter of resignation to President Eisenhower. Cross stated that he would have liked to defend himself "against the baseless charges" but was resigning effective immediately to protect the reputation of the ICC and because of his own and his wife's poor health. Eisenhower accepted the resignation. Although JAMES HAGERTY, Eisenhower's press secretary, and others denied it, rumors persisted that Cross had resigned under pressure from the administration.

Neither Congress nor the Justice Department showed any inclination to pursue the matter after Cross's resignation. After leaving Washington, Cross returned to Jerseyville, where he owned a farm. He was president of the Jersey County Abstract and Title Company from 1957 to 1962. Cross died in Jerseyville on October 15, 1972.

Curran, Joseph E(dwain)

(1906–1981) president, National Maritime Union

The son of a cook, Joseph Curran was born in New York City on March 1, 1906. He went to sea at the age of 16. In 1935, he joined the International Seamen's Union (ISU) and sailed on the S.S. California. Discovering that West Coast seamen's wages and conditions were better than those on the East Coast, Curran led the crew of the California in a wildcat strike to obtain pay parity. Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins assured Curran that if the strike were ended, the crew's grievances would be heard. Instead, 64 seamen were fired. Curran then led a major strike. He refused to accept a settlement negotiated by the ISU. Instead, he broke away from the union to form the National Maritime Union (NMU), taking 35,000 ISU members with him. The new organization became part of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). The 31-year old Curran was elected the first president of the NMU in 1937.

During World War II, Curran worked closely with Communist Party members in leading the union, although he himself was not a member of the party. In 1946, he joined a group of radicals, recently expelled from the Communist Party, in a successful drive to oust communists from the NMU. He then turned against his former supporters. In a bitter struggle, which culminated in violence, the followers of his rival, David Drummond, were expelled from the union.

Although the NMU joined the combined AFL-CIO in 1955, Curran was often at odds with the organization's president, GEORGE MEANY. In 1956, Curran voted to endorse the Democratic presidential ticket despite Meany's desire to have the organization remain neutral in the election. That year, he also gave his support to the International Longshoremen's Association's (ILA) organizing drive, despite the ILA's expulsion from the AFL because of corruption and the AFL's creation of a rival group, the International Brotherhood of Longshoremen. Curran also refused to support the expulsion of the Teamsters Union from the merged AFL-CIO and repeatedly attempted to have it reinstated. In 1958, despite Meany's objections, Curran joined the Teamsters and the ILA in sponsoring a Conference on Transportation Unity under the chairmanship of JAMES HOFFA. Curran did, however, agree to abide by an order of the AFL-CIO Executive Council not to enter into any formal or informal agreements with the Teamsters.

Curran was one of the American labor leaders who met Premier Nikita Khrushchev during the Soviet leader's visit to the United States in 1959. While most labor leaders denounced both Khrushchev personally and the communist system, Curran refused to condemn the premier. In 1960, he visited the Soviet Union and had an apparently cordial interview with the Soviet leader.

In 1960, the Department of Labor challenged Curran's reelection as president of the NMU on the grounds of election irregularities. These included illegal disqualification of candidates, electioneering at the polls, promotion of candidacies with union funds, and failure to provide secret ballots. The suit was a major test of the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. The case was later dropped in return for Curran's admission of guilt on some charges and an agreement to conduct future elections according to the provisions of the law.

During the 1950s and 1960s, the NMU was threatened by a decline in jobs caused by ships registering under foreign flags. Curran responded by attempting to gain increased government subsidies for the shipping industry. Although he managed to gain higher wages and better working conditions for union members, he failed to win increased government subsidies.

In the late-1960s, a growing opposition movement within the union challenged his authority, and charges of irregularities in the union election of 1966 forced a rerun of that election three years later. Nevertheless, Curran remained in office until his retirement in 1973. He died of cancer in Boca Raton, Fla., on August 14, 1981.

Curtice, Harlow H(erbert)

(1893–1962) president, General Motors Corporation
Curtice was born in Eaton Rapids, Mich., on August 15, 1893. He began working at General Motors in 1914 as a bookkeeper for the AC Spark Plug Division. Within a year, he was named comptroller. By 1930, he had risen to president of the division. Transferring to the Buick Motor Division in 1933 as its president and general manager, he led the ailing section to produce GM's fourth largest-selling car in the prewar years. He became a vice president of the General Motors Corp. in 1940 and left Buick to become executive vice president in 1948.

When GM's president, CHARLES WILSON, went to Washington in 1953 as Secretary of Defense, Curtice succeeded him. During his tenure, Curtice maintained GM's position as the leading manufacturer in the automotive industry. By announcing a $1-billion expansion program early in 1954, he increased the company's postwar capital investment to $3 billion. In the middle of 1955, GM announced another $500-million expansion, bringing postwar investment to $4 billion. Predicting "another record year for business generally," in January 1956 Curtice announced a further $1-billion growth expenditure.

GM's dominant position in the automobile industry attracted attention from Congress. Curtice testified before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in March 1955, during its probe of rising stock market prices. Chairman J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.) wanted to know whether GM could force competitors out of business by lowering prices. Curtice responded that the automotive industry "is even more competitive today than at any time." The hearings were recessed indefinitely on March 23.

In December 1955, the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee investigated charges that GM engaged in monopolistic practices and coerced dealers. GM dealers specifically charged that the company used "almost diabolical pressure" to increase sales, including threats of eviction upon expiration of their short-term leases. Curtice responded by offering dealers a five-year franchise instead of the existing one-year contracts.

Two bills resulted from these hearings. One measure allowed car dealers to sue in federal court to recover damages from companies not acting in good faith in carrying out the terms of contracts with dealers. President Eisenhower signed it into law in August 1956. The other bill, which would have authorized Federal Trade Commission regulation of unfair trade practices in the automobile distributing industry, died in the Senate.

In July 1956, Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL accused GM and four bus companies of conspiracy to monopolize bus sales. Curtice denied the charge.

In 1957, Curtice opposed the request of Michigan's governor, G. MENNEN WILLIAMS, for increased taxes on corporation profits in the state. Curtice warned that GM already had located several new plants outside of Michigan because of tax considerations. After being criticized for his statement, Curtice denied that it had been intended as a threat to remove GM from Michigan.

Disputes between the auto industry and the president of the United Auto Workers, WALTER P. REUTHER, raged during contract negotiations in 1957 and 1958. The Big Three auto companies—General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler—rejected outright a proposal made in August 1957 by Reuther to reduce prices in 1958 as an anti-inflationary measure. Of the three company heads, Curtice particularly was opposed to Reuther's later suggestion of profit sharing to counter a recession. Curtice called it "a radical scheme . . . foreign to the concepts of the American free enterprise system." The contract disputes continued after Curtice's retirement.

Curtice resigned as GM's president and chief executive on September 1, 1958, at the age of 65, under the company's automatic retirement plan. He died of heart failure in Flint, Mich., on November 3, 1962.

Curtis, Carl T(homas)

(1905–2000) U.S. congressman and senator

A descendant of early settlers and farmers in Nebraska, Curtis was born in Kearney Co., Neb., on March 15, 1905. He attended the University of Nebraska and Nebraska Wesleyan University. After briefly teaching public school in Minden, Neb., Curtis studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1930. He began the practice of law in Minden and served as county attorney for Kearney from 1931 to 1934. He ran successfully for the House of Representatives in 1938. A Republican from the most Republican state in the nation, Curtis compiled one of the most conservative records in Congress. Except on civil rights, he voted with southern Democrats on most economic and social issues.

During his years in the House, Curtis became increasingly interested in the problems of the Social Security system, and in 1947 he called for the "blanketing in" of all aged persons not receiving benefits, especially self-employed professionals, business owners, and employees of state and local governments. In 1953, as chairman of a special subcommittee on Social Security of the Ways and Means Committee, he helped draw up legislation embodying the new administration's proposals to extend old-age insurance coverage to 10 million additional persons. The Curtis plan, modeled on one put forward by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, proposed replacing the insurance principle of the system, by which each worker built up a retirement fund for his old age, with a pay-as-you-go policy, by which currently employed persons would support the aged with their payroll taxes. Opponents such as Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare OVETA C. HOBBY described the plan as a "criminal raid on the Social Security Trust Fund" built up by contributions from individual earnings. The bill, passed in August 1954, was modified at the suggestion of the president to provide for greater coverage without drastically reforming the system.

After his election to the Senate in 1954, Curtis focused on what he viewed as the coercive role of labor unions in American society. As a member of the Rules and Administration Committee's Subcommittee on Elections, he participated in the drive to close loopholes in the campaign spending laws that permitted unions to use dues and manpower for partisan purposes under the guise of "education and information" programs. In May 1957, he replaced the deceased Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.) on the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. Eight months later, the AFL-CIO singled out Curtis and Senators BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) and KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) as having "demonstrated their anti-labor bias and . . . forfeiting any claim . . . of conducting themselves in a spirit of fairness or objectivity." Curtis and Mundt constantly pressed the committee to investigate the crime and violence associated with United Auto Workers (UAW) strikes. In August 1959, they finally succeeded in holding hearings on the UAW over the protest of the committee's counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY. When the committee issued its final report in 1960, Curtis joined other Republicans in denouncing the probe. They criticized its failure to investigate cases deeply, to fix responsibility for criminal action, or to recommend reform. The senators attributed this inaction to what they termed a close alliance between UAW President WALTER REUTHER and the Democratic Party.

Curtis won reelection in 1960, 1966, and 1972. In 1963, Curtis sat on five legislative committees—more than any other senator. He opposed most of the social welfare programs of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and was one of President RICHARD NIXON's staunchest supporters during the Watergate scandal. Curtis did not run for reelection in 1978. He returned to Lincoln, Neb., where he practiced law until his death there on January 21, 2000.

Curtis, Thomas B(radford)

(1911–1993) U.S. congressman

The son and grandson of lawyers, Curtis was born in Saint Louis, Mo., on May 10, 1911. He earned his B.A. from Dartmouth College in 1932 and his LL.B. from Washington University in 1935. Upon graduation from law school, he joined his father's firm. After briefly serving on the Board of Election of Saint Louis County in 1942, Curtis served in the navy from 1942 to 1945. He ran unsuccessfully for several offices before winning election to Congress as a Republican from Saint Louis County. In the House, Curtis emerged as a fiscal conservative who favored ending price controls and cutting military spending and foreign aid.

With the opening of the Republican-controlled 83rd Congress in 1953, Curtis was assigned to the powerful House Ways and Means Committee. During the Eisenhower administration, he gradually established himself as a leading Republican spokesman on economic policy and revenue matters. A resolute foe of social welfare and defense measures that he believed contributed to an unbalanced budget, Curtis was often a lone dissenter on appropriations votes. Occasionally, his opposition to federal spending led him to take positions that other fiscal conservatives considered extreme. For example, in 1953, he suggested that Social Security be turned over to private industry. Curtis strongly supported civil rights legislation. He voted for the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

Curtis attracted attention in 1958 when he came to the defense of presidential assistant SHERMAN ADAMS, who was charged with securing favored treatment from federal regulatory agencies for Boston industrialist BERNARD GOLDFINE. Curtis declared that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee's Legislative Oversight Subcommittee, which was investigating the matter, had taken defamatory testimony. He moved that the subcommittee be censured. This motion was ruled out of order by Speaker SAM RAYBURN. Later Curtis was one of only eight representatives who voted against citing Goldfine for contempt of Congress for his refusal to answer questions before the subcommittee.

As the senior Republican on the Joint Economic Committee and the second-ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, Curtis maintained his record of fiscal conservatism during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. He was particularly active in fighting tax increases and Medicare.

Curtis left the House in 1969 after an unsuccessful bid for a Senate seat. He was vice president and general counsel for the Encyclopædia Britannica from 1969 to 1973. In 1972, President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him chairman of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, a board set up to control the allocation of federal funds to public radio and television stations. He served as chairman of the Federal Election Commission from April 1975 to May 1976. He died in Allegan, Mich., on January 19, 1993.

Daley, Richard J(oseph)
(1902–1976) mayor of Chicago

The grandson of Irish immigrants and son of a sheet-metal worker, Daley was born in Chicago on May 15, 1902, and grew up in the predominantly Irish Bridgeport section of Chicago's South Side. He graduated from the Christian Brothers' De La Salle Institute, a commercial high school, in 1919. Later, he studied in the evening at DePaul University and received a law degree in 1934.

At the age of 21, Daley became a precinct captain in the city's Democratic organization. After the Democrats won the municipal elections in 1923, he got a job as a clerk for the city council. During the same period, Daley became president of the Hamburg Social and Athletic Club, a sometimes violent neighborhood gang that was politically influential in his ward. When the ward boss was elected treasurer of Cook Co. (which included Chicago and its suburbs) in 1931, Daley became a clerk in the treasurer's office. He was elected to the Illinois House of Representatives in 1936 and ran successful races for the state senate in 1938 and 1942. Daley lost a race for county sheriff in 1946.

Following ADLAI E. STEVENSON's election as governor in 1948, Daley was appointed state director of revenue and served as the governor's representative to the legislature. During these years, he received significant press coverage, gaining a reputation as a young, reformist Democrat of the Stevenson type. In 1950, he left his post and ran a successful campaign for Cook Co. clerk.

Daley assumed the leadership of the Chicago party organization in July 1953, when he became chairman of the Cook Co. Democratic Central Committee. The party's electoral strength was based upon the work of precinct captains and their assistants in the wards. In exchange for their services, these party workers received patronage positions from their ward leaders. As county chairman, Daley controlled these leaders by personally determining the patronage each would receive. To preserve his patronage power, Daley minimized the number of civil service officeholders chosen by merit. He did this by making many temporary appointments. Daley also selected the party's candidates for local offices.

As chairman of the Democratic Committee, Daley had little difficulty in securing the organization's endorsement for mayor in December 1954. In the local Democratic primary held in February 1955, he defeated the incumbent Democratic mayor, Martin Kennelly, who had offended many party leaders by his efforts to combat municipal corruption. Two months later, Daley easily won the general election.

Daley's major goal during his first term was to revitalize Chicago's downtown business area through the construction of expressways, parking garages, and docking facilities as well as by enlarging O'Hare Airport to accommodate commercial traffic. He also attempted to stem the middle- and upper-class exodus to the suburbs by encouraging the construction of high-rise luxury apartments along the lakefront. Daley was able to fund his projects through the use of bonds and by procuring greater taxing authority for the city from the state legislature in the summer of 1955.

The mayor's critics contended that corruption was rampant under his administration and that he was doing little to alleviate the plight of slum dwellers or to halt the declining quality of the schools and the public transportation system. They also noted that his construction plans failed to stop the exodus to the suburbs. However, backed by his machine and with the support of the downtown business community and organized labor, he won reelection in the spring of 1959 with 71.4 percent of the vote.

Later that year, the city government was tarnished by scandals involving corruption in the traffic and municipal courts. In January 1960, these were overshadowed by revelations that policemen were participating in burglaries. Daley moved dramatically to repair the image of the city government. He fired the police commissioner and replaced him in February with Orlando W. Wilson, a professional criminologist from California. Daley granted Wilson far greater independence from City Hall than police commissioners traditionally had possessed, and the new chief began a major reorganization of his department.

Daley emerged as a major figure in national Democratic politics during his first six years as mayor. At the party's convention in 1956, he received his first national publicity by rounding up support in the Illinois delegation for Stevenson, who had backed Daley's bid for the mayoralty the previous year. In the general election, however, the combined efforts of Stevenson and Daley could not prevent the state from going to Eisenhower. In 1960, Daley rejected Stevenson's appeal for support in his third bid for the party's nomination. At the convention, Daley, who controlled about three-quarters of the state delegation, delivered the bulk of the votes from Illinois for Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) to help him win a first-ballot victory.

In November 1960, a heavily Democratic Cook Co. vote overcame the traditional downstate Republican majority and enabled Kennedy to carry Illinois's crucial electoral votes by a narrow margin of 10,000 ballots. Many observers believed that Daley's machine, through widespread electoral fraud, had stolen the White House from the Republican candidate, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. Over 600 polling-place workers and Democratic precinct captains were charged with allowing ineligible voters to cast ballots in the name of deceased persons, permitting individuals to vote more than once, and other offenses. Most of the charges were eventually dropped. Mike Royko, in Boss: Richard J. Daley of Chicago, attributed the dismissal of charges to the fact that the judge in the case was a loyal organization Democrat. A recount in the 900 Cook Co. precincts using paper ballots significantly reduced the margins of defeat for some state and local Republican candidates, particularly in the case of Benjamin Adamowski, the Republican state's attorney who was seeking reelection. Adamowski had initiated investigations of corruption in the Chicago city government, and Royko contended that capturing his post and other state and local offices were Daley's primary goals. The recount did not substantially affect the presidential tally, and the Republicans did not press for further retabulations. None of the election results, including Adamowski's defeat, were overturned.

Expanded federal aid to cities during the 1960s enabled Daley to strengthen his political base, and he continued to win reelection easily. He dispensed urban renewal contracts to friendly builders and used antipoverty programs as an additional source of patronage. Daley had supporters among business leaders and Democratic liberals. Even as other major cities struggled to provide essential services, Daley made Chicago work. However, Daley largely ignored the growing problems of the black community in Chicago, which had become one of the most segregated cities in the country. Those issues commanded national attention when, during the summer of 1966, demonstrations for open housing in ethnic areas met with violence. Two years later, during the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, the city's police savagely attacked protesters in the streets. Although many, particularly liberal Democrats, criticized Daley, he continued to receive strong support from most Chicagoans. The mayor suffered a major political setback in 1976, when his handpicked gubernatorial candidate was soundly defeated by a Republican who, as a U.S. attorney, had successfully prosecuted a number of the mayor's political allies. Daley died of a heart attack in Chicago on December 20, 1976.

Daniel, (Marion) Price

(1910–1988) U.S. senator, governor of Texas

Born in Dayton, Tex., on October 10, 1910, Price Daniel attended public schools and, after graduation, went to work as a reporter. He graduated from Baylor University in 1931 and from Baylor's law school in 1932. Upon receiving his degree, he began a law practice in Liberty, Tex., and became a member of the speakers' bureau of the Democratic national campaign. In 1938, Daniel won election to the Texas House of Representatives as a moderate New Deal Democrat. He served as Speaker in 1943. Daniel joined the army in 1943, serving in the Pacific theater and in Japan. Upon his discharge in 1946, he returned to Texas and won election as attorney general that year without opposition. While in office, Daniel established a reputation as a rackets-buster and champion of state claims to offshore oil. In 1952, he ran for the U.S. Senate on a platform supporting Texas's oil claims and opposing President HARRY S. TRUMAN's position on civil rights. He won 72 percent of the votes in the Democratic primary in July and won election without opposition in November. In the national election, Daniel joined Gov. ALLAN SHIVERS in supporting DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency.

In the Senate, Daniel emerged as a moderate conservative who opposed government expansion and control of the economy except in agriculture. He voted against the Saint Lawrence Seaway Project in 1954 and the administration's highway bill in 1956. Daniel supported the Bricker amendment in 1954, which would have limited the president's treaty-making powers. The senator backed Eisenhower's proposal to deregulate the price of natural gas and voted against congressional salary increases in 1955.

A states' rights advocate and supporter of segregation, Daniel opposed the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregation in public schools, but he refused to take an extreme stand on the issue. He was instrumental in rewriting and moderating the "Southern Manifesto" of 1956. Early drafts of the document, as originally conceived by Sen. STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.), contained passages branding the ruling unconstitutional and approving interposition—the use of state power to nullify the decision. Several legislators refused to accept these drafts, and a committee was formed to modify it. The five-member panel, which included Thurmond, Senators RICHARD RUSSELL (D-Ga.), JOHN STENNIS (D-Miss.), WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.), and Daniel, drew up a far less dramatic document than the original. It denounced "the unwarranted decision of the Supreme Court" as a substitution of "naked power for established law" and backed the states "which have declared their intention to resist forced integration by any lawful means."

Daniel emerged as one of the leaders of the centrist wing of the Texas Democratic Party. Although conservative, this group refused to follow Gov. Allan Shivers's call to split the state Democrats from the national party. Daniel supported ADLAI STEVENSON for president in 1956 and, in September, joined centrists at the state convention in blocking both "Shivercrats" and liberals from positions of power. That year, he ran for governor. After narrowly winning a runoff in the Democratic primary against a liberal opponent, Ralph Yarborough, Daniel won election in November.

During his tenure, Daniel attempted to maintain his moderate stand on segregation. Texas refused to comply with the desegregation decision but also opposed joining the interposition crusade. In late 1956, a committee Shivers appointed to study segregation submitted a hard-line report, including proposals for the state to return to a completely segregated school system. The panel also recommended a pupil placement bill, an interposition resolution, and a referendum prohibiting desegregation unless 20 percent of the voters petitioned for it and a majority approved it. Daniel was not enthusiastic about the report, but legislative pressure and majority support for a return to white supremacy eventually forced him to support portions of it. When the legislature passed the pupil assignment and referendum bills in 1957, Daniel signed both. Four interposition resolutions remained stalled in the legislature. The two laws stemmed the progress of desegregation, which until that time had proceeded more rapidly in Texas than in any other southern state.

Daniel won reelection in 1958 and 1960. In 1962, John Connally defeated Daniel in the Democratic primary. Price Daniel retired from government in 1962 and resumed his private law practice. In 1967, LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Daniel to be director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness and assistant to the president for Federal-State Relations. Daniel also served on the National Security Council under Johnson and later served eight years on the Texas Supreme Court, after which he returned to the practice of law. He died in Liberty on August 25, 1988.

Davies, John Paton, Jr.

(1908–1999) Foreign Service officer

The son of Baptist missionaries, Davies was born in Leshan (Kiating), China, on April 6, 1908. He spent his early years in China and studied at the University of Wisconsin and Yenching University before receiving his degree from Columbia in 1931. He then entered the Foreign Service. Davies served as a consul in a number of Chinese cities and, during the late-1930s and early-1940s, was adviser to Col. Joseph Stilwell.

As one of the highest ranking Foreign Service officials in China, Davies issued frequent reports and policy recommendations on the Chinese civil war. He described Chiang kai-shek's (Jiang Jieshi's) corruption and decadence and predicted that, because of his refusal to reform, the Communists would defeat him. Davies rejected the recommendations of Roosevelt's representative, Gen. Patrick Hurley, that the United States give unqualified support to the Nationalists. Davies believed that Hurley's statements weakened the American position. He recommended that the United States ignore ideology and deal with the Communists, not only because it would prevent the formation of a Sino-Soviet bloc but also because the United States would eventually have no other choice.

In 1945, Davies was appointed first secretary of the embassy in Moscow; from 1947 to 1951, he was a member of the State Department's policy planning staff. He then served with the U.S. High Commission in Germany and was director of political affairs at the U.S. mission from 1951 to 1953. In 1953–54, he was a counselor and chargé d'affaires in Lima, Peru.

During the late-1940s and early-1950s, Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) frequently attacked Davies because of his views on foreign policy. The senator from Wisconsin denounced him as a pro-communist and charged him with the responsibility for "losing China." As a result of these and subsequent charges, Davies underwent eight security investigations from 1948 to 1953. He was cleared in each case.

In 1953, McCarthy resumed his attacks on Davies. In response, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES suspended the diplomat and ordered a special security board to review his case. At the hearing, Gen. Hurley testified that Davies was one of the men who had sabotaged a Nationalist Chinese victory. The board recommended Davies's removal in August.

Four months later, Dulles dismissed Davies on the grounds that he lacked "judgment, discretion and reliability." Dulles stated that neither he nor the board had found Davies disloyal but that, under Eisenhower's security orders, "complete and unswerving loyalty was not enough. He must be reliable, trustworthy, of good character and conduct."

The secretary said that the board had recommended Davies's ouster because "his observation and evaluation of the facts [in reporting to superiors], his policy recommendations, his attitude with respect to existing policy and his disregard of proper forbearance and caution in making known his dissents . . . were not in accordance with the standard required of Foreign Service officers." Dulles later let it be known that he would furnish Davies a character reference if needed.

Following the dismissal, Davies and his family remained in Lima, where he opened a furniture business. In 1964, Davies returned to Washington and requested a review of his case. His name was cleared by the Johnson administration in November 1968.

Davies's dismissal was one of a series that purged many China experts from the State Department, including Oliver Edmund Clubb, JOHN CARTER VINCENT, and JOHN STEWART SERVICE.

Critics such as GEORGE KENNAN charged that the firings had a long-range detrimental effect on the department. In his opinion, they dissuaded talented individuals from entering the State Department because of the threat of dismissal at any time for disloyalty. Those men and women who remained became more cautious. Some observers would later attribute American problems in Southeast Asia, at least in part, to the dismissal of the “old China hands.”

Upon Davies’s return to Washington, he published Foreign and Other Affairs (1964), a book on the United States involvement in Vietnam. He also published Dragon by the Tail: American, British, Japanese, and Russian Encounters with China and One Another (1972). Davies lived in Spain in the 1970s and wrote newspaper articles and lectured. He died at his home in Asheville, N.C., on December 23, 1999.

Davis, Jimmie H(ouston)

(1904–2000) governor of Louisiana

The son of a poor sharecropper, Jimmie Davis was born in Jackson Parish, La., on September 11, 1904. He worked his way through college and graduate school singing and composing country-western music. After earning a B.A. from Louisiana College and an M.A. from Louisiana State University, he taught history at Dodd College. Davis entered politics in his home city of Shreveport, La., and made his way up the political ladder by winning friends and generating good will. He almost never took a determined stand on issues, preferring, as he put it, to “live and let live.” In 1938, he won the race for safety commissioner, after a campaign in which he said nothing against his opponent but sang songs that he had composed. He was elected the Democratic governor of Louisiana in 1944. Again he did not run on issues, but rather he sang his compositions during the campaign. By the time of his campaign, they included such national hits as “You Are My Sunshine,” “Bed Bug Blues,” “Bear Cat Poppa,” “High Powered Mama” and “Get Yourself a Car.”

Davis accomplished little as governor. He preferred to put decisions off as long as possible. When forced to make a decision, he would often leave the state for long periods of time, occasionally going to Hollywood to work in movies. Louisiana law prohibited the governor from succeeding himself, and after his term expired, he resumed his singing career.

Davis tried to make a political comeback in the Democratic gubernatorial primary of December 1959. His leading opponent, DELESSEPS MORRISON, ran on his record as an efficient mayor of New Orleans. In contrast, Davis once again sang songs and campaigned on platitudes. Another candidate, State Sen. Willie Rainach, ran on a pro-segregationist platform. Morrison won the primary but was forced to face Davis in a runoff in January 1960. With Rainach out of the race, Davis attempted to appeal to the pro-segregationist vote. He charged Morrison with being soft on integration and labeled him an “NAACP candidate.” Davis also took advantage of Morrison’s sophisticated appearance to win the state’s rural vote. He once said that Morrison “looks right taking Zsa Zsa Gabor to tea [but] looks all wrong to those Rednecks up in hill country.” Davis won the runoff and went on to win the election.

In May 1960, a federal judge, J. SKELLY WRIGHT, ended years of delay by ordering New Orleans to desegregate its schools at the beginning of the fall term. The following month, the New Orleans School Board asked the governor to “interpose state sovereignty” between the judiciary and the school system to prevent integration. At first Davis refused, but as a result of pressure from staunch segregationists, he took action. Terming the order an unwarranted intrusion of the federal government in intrastate affairs, Davis pledged to resist the order, even at the risk of going to jail. He then worked with the legislature to pass a series of anti-integration laws. These included bills barring the use of state funds for integrated schools, permitting the governor to close integrated schools, and allowing the governor to close schools to prevent violence.

On August 17, Davis assumed administration of New Orleans schools and appointed his own superintendent. Ten days later, the federal court issued a temporary restraining order blocking Davis’s action. It also struck down the segregation laws. This act strengthened the moderate faction on the New Orleans School Board, which acknowledged the inevitability of integration and was willing to accept gradual and limited desegregation. Judge Wright then granted this group their request to postpone desegregation until November. On November 4, four black students entered previously all-white schools amid jeering mobs. Four days later, the state legislature once again gave Gov. Davis the right to close the schools. However, Judge Wright struck down the law. By the spring of 1961, the resistance had broken down, as the schools resumed normal operations. Davis continued to back segregation, calling it “the most noble cause that had ever arisen during the lifetime of any man living in the world to date.

After Davis left office, he resumed his singing and business career. He tried a political comeback in November 1971, running for governor in the crowded Louisiana primary, but he did poorly in the race. He died on November 5, 2000, in Baton Rouge, La.

Davis, John (William)

(1873–1955) attorney

Born in Clarksburg, W.Va., on April 13, 1873, Davis attended private schools. He received a B.A. from Washington and Lee University in 1892. After graduating, he taught school and apprenticed in his father's law office before returning to Washington and Lee to earn a law degree in 1895. Following admission to the bar, he entered practice with his father in Clarksburg. Davis served a term in the West Virginia House of Delegates in 1899 and ran successfully as a Democrat for the U.S. House of Representatives in 1910. President Woodrow Wilson appointed him solicitor general in 1913. During the next five years, Davis frequently defended progressive legislation before the Supreme Court, earning a reputation as one of America's greatest solicitors general. In 1918, he was named ambassador to Great Britain and served as an adviser to Wilson at Versailles.

Davis became head of the Wall Street firm of Stetson, Jennings and Russell in 1921. The firm became known as Stetson, Jennings, Russell & Davis, then Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Gardiner & Reed, still later Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Sunderland & Kiendl, and finally Davis, Polk & Wardwell.

Over the next few decades, he achieved prominence as a corporation counsel who argued against the expansion of government power into the commercial sector. From 1922 to 1924, he served as president of the American Bar Association. In 1924, the deadlocked Democratic National Convention made Davis its presidential nominee on the 103rd ballot. He was badly defeated by Calvin Coolidge in November, winning only 136 electoral votes, all from the South.

Although he supported Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, Davis soon became disenchanted with the expansion of federal power under the New Deal and helped organize the anti-New Deal Liberty League in 1934. As a member of the Lawyers Vigilance Committee, he argued against the constitutionality of much New Deal legislation in the higher courts.

Davis believed deeply in states' rights and the strict construction of the Constitution. He was also a strong civil libertarian. During the 1940s and 1950s, he argued many important cases in the interest of his conservative principles. He battled for the rights of conscientious objectors during World War II and supported Alger Hiss in the postwar period. In 1952, he successfully argued before the Supreme Court against the constitutionality of President Truman's seizure of the steel mills (Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer; 1952).

During 1952–53, Davis defended South Carolina's school segregation in one of the cases known collectively as Brown v. Board of Education. He rejected THURGOOD MARSHALL's premise that the Fourteenth Amendment had outlawed segregation and that separate schools were not equal because they produced a sense of inferiority in black children. Davis maintained that the framers of the amendment had never intended it to be used to support integrated public schools. The same Congress that passed the Fourteenth Amendment, he pointed out, appropriated funds for segregated public schools in Washington, D.C. Davis maintained that if segregation were to be outlawed, it had to be done either by an act of Congress or by amending the Constitution. To undo state laws by judicial fiat, Davis insisted, would destroy the separation of powers established by the Constitution and would be an unconstitutional intrusion by the federal government into the affairs of the states.

Davis then challenged Marshall's contention that segregation produced feelings of inferiority in black children. He raised the question of whether having "three white children with 27 blacks would prevent the psychological distress segregation was charged with doing." Concluding, the elderly lawyer said that South Carolina "is convinced that the happiness, the progress, and the welfare of these children is best promoted in segregated schools." In May 1954, the Supreme Court unanimously ruled that segregated schools were unconstitutional. Davis remarked that the decision was "unworthy of the Supreme Court" and predicted that turmoil would result in the South following the decision.

In 1954, Davis defended J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER against charges that he was a security risk. When the Atomic Energy Commission review board refused to clear Oppenheimer, Davis called the ruling not simply "unjust" but "silly."

During the course of his long legal career, Davis appeared before the Supreme Court more than any other 20th-century lawyer. Legal experts commonly ranked him as one of the finest advocates of the era. Davis died in Charleston, S.C., on March 24, 1955.

Dawson, William L(evi)

(1886–1970) U.S. congressman; chairman, Government Operations Committee; chairman, Committee on Executive Expenditures

Dawson was born in Albany, Ga., on April 26, 1886. After graduating magna cum laude from Fisk University in 1909, he attended Kent College and Northwestern University law school. Following service in the army during World War I, he began practicing law in Chicago. In 1928, Dawson ran unsuccessfully as a Republican candidate for the U.S. House of Representatives. From 1933 to 1939, he served as alderman from Chicago's South Side. He became a Democrat in 1939, in part because his largely black constituency had switched its allegiance to the party of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Dawson used his position to build a political machine that controlled politics in the black ghetto. In 1942, he defied the wishes of Chicago's Democratic mayor, Edward Kelly, who had aided his political career, and ran for a seat in Congress. Using his ward position, Dawson won the race and continued to win election from the first congressional district until the time of his death. In Chicago's black ghetto, Dawson was the man to see for patronage jobs; he chose or appointed the aldermen of six wards.

Dawson could often determine the fate of white as well as black office holders. Angered by alleged police brutality and attempts to arrest petty gamblers, he determined to oppose Mayor Martin Kennelly's reelection in 1953. However, because he could find no alternative candidate, he did not openly break with the mayor. In 1955, he threw his support to RICHARD J. DALEY. With Dawson's support, Daley defeated Kennelly in the primary and went on to win the general election. In three of Dawson's pocket wards, Daley won by an almost 4 to 1 margin, and in the black 24th ward, he won by 18 to 1. Dawson's support proved to be a crucial element in Daley's victory.

In Congress, Dawson was a strong supporter of New and Fair Deal legislation and during the 1940s worked to outlaw the poll tax and segregation in the armed forces. During the 1950s, however, he became increasingly alienated from the emerging Civil Rights movement. He provided only lukewarm backing for civil rights legislation and refused to actively support an antilynching bill. In 1956, Dawson opposed an amendment by Rep. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.), to an aid-to-education bill denying federal funds to segregated schools. The congressman believed that the amendment would kill the proposal, a prediction confirmed when the measure went down to defeat in July.

Dawson's apathy toward civil rights measures earned him the anger of the president of the local branch of the NAACP, Willoughby Abner, who called him "soft" on civil rights. In reaction, Dawson used his patronage power to gain control of the NAACP chapter. In 1957, his handpicked candidate, Theodore Jones, took the presidency from Abner in an election dominated by the new "Dawson members."

During the Kennedy and Johnson years, Dawson joined other Northern urban Democrats in support of the administrations' social welfare legislation. Throughout the decade, young blacks, dissatisfied with Dawson's civil rights stand, attempted to unseat him, but he defeated all primary challengers by margins of at least two to one. He remained unbeaten until his death in Chicago, on November 9, 1970.

Dean, Arthur H(obson)

(1898–1987) State Department negotiator

Born in Ithaca, N.Y., on October 16, 1898, Dean worked his way through Cornell University and, following service in the Army during World War I, received his law degree there in 1923. That same year, he joined the law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, in which JOHN FOSTER DULLES was a senior partner. Dean worked on cases involving American and British banking interests and became a partner in 1930. During World War II, Dean served as a coast guard instructor in navigation and piloting. After the war, Dean returned to Sullivan and Cromwell and became head of the firm in 1949, when Dulles resigned to become a U.S. senator. Dean was a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations in the early 1950s but resigned in 1952 after a Senate subcommittee report said that the effect of the institute's activities on public opinion had "served communist interests."

At the behest of Secretary of State Dulles, Dean went to Korea in October 1953 as chief allied negotiator in the peace talks with the North Koreans and the Chinese Communists. Dean opposed North Korean and Chinese suggestions that nations not involved in the war, including the USSR, be represented. Reiterating the UN's resolution of August 1953, he stressed that the peace conference should be attended only by the countries participating in the fighting. In December 1953, the Communist Chinese delegate accused the United States of perfidy in allowing South Korea to "release" 21,000 noncommunist North Korean and Communist Chinese prisoners of war into UN custody instead of sending them home. In responses to the charge, Dean temporarily suspended negotiations.

In January 1954, after Dean was reported to have told the Providence Journal that the United States should recognize the People's Republic of China, Sen. HERMAN WELKER (R-Ida.) accused Dean of supporting "appeasement" and of collaboration with Communist China. He also assailed Dean as the former "official spokesman" of the Institute of Pacific Relations. In March, Dulles asked Dean to resign from the Korean negotiations. However, the secretary still asked him to go to South Korea and review the political situation with President Syngman Rhee a week before the negotiations opened in Geneva in April 1954.

Dean returned to the full-time practice of law in 1954. He continued to recommend recognition of Communist China during the Quemoy-Matsu crisis of 1955. In an article in Foreign Affairs, he maintained that recognition would improve the United States' international position. Dean recommended consideration of Great Britain's two-China idea, which would recognize Communist rule on the mainland and Nationalist rule on Taiwan.

During the spring of 1958, Dean represented the United States in Geneva at the 87-nation Conference on the Law of the Sea. Upholding the traditional U.S. position, he initially called for a three-mile limit on national claims to the coastal sea. This stand was opposed by the USSR, Iceland, and several South American nations, which favored at least a 12-mile limit. In an attempt to break the deadlock, on April 15 Dean proposed that territorial limits be extended to six miles. He also asked for the establishment of an additional six-mile zone from which all foreign fishermen could be excluded except those who had fished the area regularly for 10 years preceding the signing of a new sea law convention. The proposal was voted down on April 28, and Dean gave formal notice that the United States would continue to observe the three-mile limit.

During the Kennedy administration, Dean represented the United States at the Geneva talks on ending nuclear weapons tests and advised the president on disarmament. He also served as a delegate to the UN General Assembly in the 1960s. In 1968, he became a member of the Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam, convened to consider the military's request for over 200,000 more troops for Vietnam. The panel recommended rejection of the request and the de-escalation of the war. Dean died in Glen Cove, N.Y., on November 30, 1987.

DeLoach, Deke (Cartha) (Dekle)(1920–) FBI official

Born into a poor family in Claxton, Ga., on July 20, 1920, DeLoach worked his way through Stetson University, from which he graduated in 1942. He joined the FBI and worked as an agent carrying out investigations of Communist Party members in Norfolk, Toledo, and Akron, Ohio. Dissatisfied with the work, he left the agency in 1944 to join the navy. Following the war, he returned to the bureau.

Assigned to FBI headquarters, DeLoach carried out security checks of potential employees in atomic energy projects. Later, he served as liaison between the FBI and various U.S. intelligence agencies. In 1951, DeLoach attended an international conference on intelligence matters and wrote a report on the meeting for Director J. EDGAR HOOVER. Hoover was impressed by the young man, and the two quickly became close friends. Hoover quickly promoted DeLoach to inspector and gave the young man sensitive special assignments, mainly disciplining agents who failed to comply with the bureau's strict code of personal behavior. He disciplined agents for major offenses such as trying to persuade communists to become FBI informers and allowing these overtures to be leaked. On other occasions, DeLoach punished agents for sexual infidelity.

In 1953, DeLoach became a special assistant in the office of Clyde Tolson, Hoover's right-hand man. That year, Hoover asked DeLoach to join the American Legion and guide the group's anticommunist crusade. Hoover did not object to the spirit of the legion's campaign. However, he opposed the legion's demands to investigate specific groups and individuals, preferring to choose the bureau's targets himself. He resented amateur attempts to compete with his organization. DeLoach took his task seriously and, using his FBI credentials, became a post commander, department commander, vice commander, and eventually national vice commander. At one point, he thought of running for national commander, but Hoover vetoed the proposal as "too political." DeLoach became chairman of the organization's public relations committee in 1958. There he exercised great influence over the organization's internal policy as well as public relations. The American Legion was a strong source of support for Hoover, and over the next 20 years, it often mobilized its forces to defend the director's controversial actions.

In 1959, DeLoach became assistant director of the crime records division which, despite its title, was responsible for public and congressional relations. He became one of the bureau's leading speakers, articulating a hard-hitting conservative view of the communist threat and the FBI's role in combating it. The personable DeLoach maintained a close relationship with key members of Congress and worked with them to further the interests of the bureau. DeLoach also improved relations with the press. Toward that end, he used his access to the FBI's massive files containing personal information on members of Congress. He often leaked information on individual congressmen to favorite reporters.

Upon the assassination of JOHN F. KENNEDY, DeLoach was appointed liaison to the White House. In December 1965, DeLoach became assistant to the director and assumed charge of all the bureau's investigative activities. He developed a close relationship with President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, who often preferred to communicate with DeLoach rather than Hoover. DeLoach had hoped to succeed Hoover as director. When it became apparent that Hoover was unwilling to retire, DeLoach accepted a lucrative offer to become an executive with Pepsico, Inc. He left the bureau in June 1970. In 1995, he published Hoover's FBI: The Inside Story by Hoover's Trusted Lieutenant.

DeSapio, Carmine G(erald)(1908–2004) chairman, New York CountyDemocratic Committee

The son of an Italian immigrant, DeSapio was born on New York City's Lower West Side on December 10, 1908. He attended local parochial schools and studied law at Fordham University. However, he was forced to give up his studies because of an attack of rheumatic fever. The illness resulted in an eye inflammation that required him to wear the tinted glasses that became his trademark. While still attending high school, DeSapio became interested in politics and joined the local Democratic club. A loyal member of New York's Tammany Hall, he worked his way up in the Democratic machine until he won a seat on its executive committee in 1943. He was elected to the citywide Board of Elections in 1946 and the following year was part of the four-man group that took over effective leadership of Tammany Hall. In 1949, he became the first Italian-American leader of Tammany Hall.

During the next five years, DeSapio expanded his control throughout New York City's five boroughs and amassed great power in the state. In 1953, he broke with Mayor Vincent Impellitteri over questions of patronage and charges that the mayor had been connected with organized crime. He instead backed ROBERT F. WAGNER, JR., for the Democratic mayoral nomination. The son of a popular liberal senator, Wagner was a favorite of New York liberals. With DeSapio's help, Wagner defeated Impellitteri in the primary and went on to win the general election.

During the 1950s, DeSapio sought to make Tammany Hall a force for liberalism while at the same time continuing to function as a political machine. He championed housing reform and health care legislation. Indebted to DeSapio for his election, Wagner turned patronage over to him. Under DeSapio's guidance, city appointments and elected offices were opened to minorities, and many qualified individuals were appointed to city positions. He democratized the organization's process of electing local political leaders and sought to sever Tammany's ties with organized crime. Unlike many traditional bosses, DeSapio relished public exposure and acclaim. He lectured in colleges, published articles, consented to be interviewed by the media, and enjoyed mingling openly with the powerful.

In 1954, DeSapio supported W. AVERELL HARRIMAN for governor of New York. The former ambassador was opposed by such Democrats as THOMAS FINLETTER and ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, who favored the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. Using his control of the New York State Democratic Party, DeSapio pushed the nomination through the Democratic convention. With Harriman's victory at the polls, DeSapio emerged as the most powerful Democratic Party leader in the state. To add to DeSapio's prestige and power, Harriman appointed him secretary of state and consulted him on patronage and other political matters. In addition, DeSapio served as an unofficial lobbyist for New York City in Albany and Washington.

Ironically, Harriman's victory over Roosevelt contributed to the decline of DeSapio's power. Eleanor Roosevelt held him responsible for her son's defeat and became increasingly hostile to DeSapio throughout the 1950s. She joined HERBERT LEHMAN and Thomas Finletter to found the New York Committee for Democratic Voters, a group formed to wrest power from DeSapio and Tammany Hall. DeSapio also contributed to his own political downfall. In July 1957, he unwittingly left an envelope containing $11,200 in large bills in a taxi. Although he denied the money was his, the cab driver publicly identified him as the source. Wagner's personal triumph in the election of 1957 released the mayor from obligations to his former sponsor, and the two men became rivals. At the same time, reform stirrings in his own district eroded DeSapio's power at its source. Most importantly, the gubernatorial and senatorial elections proved disastrous for DeSapio. Over the objections of reformers, DeSapio pushed the nomination of FRANK HOGAN for the Senate through the state convention. When Hogan and Harriman were defeated in the November election., DeSapio lost his upstate power base. His dictatorial conduct at the convention served as a catalyst for New York City reformers to organize to unseat DeSapio's supporters from elected positions.

In 1961, Wagner broke openly with DeSapio and accepted the support of the reform movement for his bid for reelection. Running on the issue of bossism, Wagner defeated DeSapio's candidate, Arthur Levitt, in the Democratic primary. DeSapio himself was defeated for his district leadership. Because only district leaders were eligible to serve as county leaders, DeSapio lost all his state and local posts. He attempted political comebacks in 1964 and 1965 but failed in both cases. In 1969, a federal jury convicted DeSapio of having conspired to induce a public official to misuse his office in return for a bribe. After serving a 17-month sentence, he was released in December 1972. DeSapio died in Manhattan on July 27, 2004.

Dewey, Thomas E(dmund)

(1902–1971) governor of New York, presidential candidate

Thomas E. Dewey was born on March 24, 1902, in Owosso, Mich., where his father was editor of the local Republican newspaper. Dewey earned a B.A. at the University of Michigan in 1923 and an LL.B. from Columbia Law School in 1925. His decision to embark on a legal career came only after seriously contemplating a career in opera. After graduating from law school, he entered private practice with Larkin, Rathbone & Perry, a Wall Street firm. In 1927 he went to work for McNamara & Seymour. In the late 1920s, he became active in Republican politics, associating himself with the “reform” element that battled the Tammany Hall Democratic machine. During this period, he met HERBERT BROWNELL, another lawyer with similar political leanings. Brownell would become Dewey’s closest adviser and manager of Dewey’s successful campaigns for governor and his unsuccessful campaigns for the presidency. In 1931, Dewey took a position as chief assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York and served as acting U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York for five weeks in 1933, after which he returned to private practice. While in the U.S. attorney’s office, Dewey played an important role in prosecuting organized-crime figures and corrupt politicians. In 1935, Gov. HERBERT H. LEHMAN named him special prosecutor to investigate racketeering and vice in New York. His activities as a “racket-busting” prosecutor made him a national hero and helped him launch a career in politics.

In 1937, running on Fiorello La Guardia’s Fusion ticket, Dewey won election as district attorney for New York County. The next year, he challenged Lehman for the governorship and narrowly lost. His strong showing made him a serious contender, despite his youth, for the Republican presidential nomination in 1940. The outbreak of World War II in Europe, however, changed the dynamic of the presidential election. The Republicans chose Wendell L. Wilkie, an internationalist, over Dewey, who lacked experience in foreign policy, and Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio, an isolationist. In 1942, Dewey won the Republican gubernatorial nomination, swept to victory in the general election, and became the first Republican governor of New York in 20 years. He easily won reelection in 1946 and 1950.

As governor, Dewey proved to be an efficient administrator, and, while no New Deal liberal, he believed that government could play a constructive role in promoting the public interest. Dewey oversaw a needed reapportionment of congressional and legislative districts, liberalized the state unemployment insurance law, undertook an ambitious expansion of public housing and highway programs, established a state university system, and introduced public health programs. A forceful and consistent proponent of civil rights for African Americans, Dewey sponsored the first state commission to end religious and racial discrimination in employment practices and was a major force behind passage of landmark civil rights legislation enacted by the state legislature in 1945. A fiscal conservative, Dewey maintained a balanced budget, even as he expanded social programs and the state’s infrastructure.

Able assisted by Brownell and others, Dewey built a national political organization. He became the leader of the Eastern, or internationalist, wing of the Republican party, which drew its support primarily from the Northeast and the West Coast. Dewey maintained that his progressive but fiscally conservative approach offered a viable alternative to the New Deal. Eastern Republicans vied for control of the party with the Midwestern, conservative, isolationist wing led by Taft. In the contest for the Republican nomination in 1944, Dewey brushed aside Wilkie in the Wisconsin primary and overcame JOHN BRICKER, a conservative senator from Ohio, at the convention. In an effort to placate conservatives, Dewey chose Bricker as his running mate. Initially, Dewey took the high road during the campaign. He proposed to remove not only the war but foreign policy from the partisanship of a campaign. Attacks by Roosevelt and his supporters, however, led Dewey to respond in kind. On November 8, Roosevelt won 36 of 48 states and garnered 342 electoral votes to Dewey’s 99. In the popular vote, however, Dewey’s 44.8 percent (against Roosevelt’s 52.8 percent) represented the best showing by a Republican since the 1920s.

Dewey’s respectable showing against Roosevelt made him a leading contender for the nomination in 1948. He consistently led Gallup polls of Republican voters, and Democratic strategists expected him to be the Republican nominee. Dewey strengthened his identification with the Eastern, internationalist wing of the party by supporting the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan in 1947. The conservative wing of the party had always regarded Dewey warily. His support of the Truman administration's approach to the cold war reinforced their suspicions. On other matters of foreign policy, though, Dewey took positions closer to those of the Midwestern conservatives. In 1947 and 1948, he repeatedly called for more U.S. aid to Nationalist China and for greater attention to Asia generally.

In spite of Dewey's prominence, the road to the nomination in 1948 was not easy. HAROLD E. STASSEN upset Dewey in the Wisconsin and Nebraska primaries. Trapped by a pledge not to campaign while the New York legislature remained in session, Dewey made only brief appearances right before the primaries in those states. In contrast, Stassen campaigned tirelessly. In the Oregon primary that May, Dewey matched Stassen's efforts and performed well in a radio debate on the issue of outlawing the American Communist Party. He criticized the ban, which Stassen supported, as antithetical to a democratic society. Dewey won the primary and ended Stassen's hopes for the nomination, but he still faced a serious challenge from Taft. At the Republican National Convention in June, Stassen refused to throw his delegates to Taft, and Taft declined to withdraw in favor of a compromise candidate, Sen. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG (R-Mich.). Division among his opponents and a strong showing on the first two ballots enabled Dewey to capture the nomination on the third ballot. He chose EARL WARREN, the popular governor of California, as his running mate.

Experts nearly unanimously predicted Dewey's election. Republicans had won both houses of Congress in 1946, and Truman's approval ratings remained low. Further, the Democrats were divided. Henry A. Wallace, whom Truman had fired from the cabinet after he split with the president over the cold war, was running on a third-party ticket. Truman's problems compounded when, despite the efforts of his managers, liberals succeeded in inserting a strong civil rights plank into the Democratic platform at the convention. In response, southern delegates walked out and later formed a third party, the States' Rights Party, which nominated STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.).

In spite of the apparent strength of his position, Dewey had problems, too. Like their opponents, the Republicans were divided. In private, Dewey disapproved of the 80th Congress, led by Midwestern Republicans and relentlessly attacked by Truman, but he could ill afford to alienate such a substantial element of his party. Further, Truman called the Republican-controlled Congress into special session and effectively dared it to pass the progressive Republican party platform. Despite pleas from Dewey and Brownell, Congress refused to do so. Truman traveled all over the country denouncing the "do-nothing" 80th Congress. Foreign policy presented Dewey with another predicament. After the beginning of the Berlin airlift, Dewey consulted with Vandenberg and JOHN FOSTER DULLES and decided to avoid discussing foreign policy. Instead, the Republican nominee promoted national unity in a time of rising tensions with the Soviet Union.

Having taken foreign policy off the table and needing to tread carefully on domestic issues, Dewey found it hard to establish a base from which to attack Truman effectively. True to his meticulous personality, his campaign appearances ran like clockwork; cartoonists likened him to an adding machine. Although a skilled orator, he rarely appealed to emotions. He never attacked Truman by name and resisted suggestions that he emphasize the issue of domestic subversion. Most important, Dewey, as critics observed, campaigned like the incumbent. He did not begin campaigning until Labor Day. Even then, Truman gave twice as many speeches as his Republican opponent. Finally, Dewey held to an older notion of dignified statesmanship. Although he could display warmth and humor in private, he came across in public as formal, prim, and stiff. Alice Roosevelt Longworth quipped that Dewey looked like the groom on a wedding cake.

By mid-October Truman began to edge up in the Gallup polls. On October 25, Truman blasted Thurmond's Dixiecrats as "crackpots" and Wallace's supporters as part of a "contemptible communist minority." The president also compared Dewey and the Republicans to the fascists of the 1930s in Germany and Italy. Dewey's instinct was to respond, but his aides persuaded him not to change tactics and aggressively attack Truman. On November 2, voters reelected Truman with 49 percent to Dewey's 45 percent.

Between 1949 and 1952, Dewey continued to exert a powerful influence within the Republican party. He persisted in supporting the basic approach of the Truman administration to the cold war. Specifically, he backed the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the U.S. intervention in Korea. When Taft emerged as the front-runner for the nomination in 1952, Dewey, who believed that Taft's unilateralist foreign policy would be disastrous for the party and the country, was instrumental in persuading Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to run. Dewey lent key advisers, including Herbert Brownell, to the Draft Eisenhower Committee. Ultimately, Dewey and his advisers played a key role in denying the nomination to Taft and gaining it for Eisenhower. In the process, Dewey earned the undying hatred of Taft's supporters. Partly as a concession to the Taft wing, Dewey also played a significant role in securing the vice presidential nomination for Sen. RICHARD M. NIXON (R-Calif.). Once the story of Nixon's "slush fund" broke, Dewey urged Nixon to make a televised speech responding to the charges. Nixon delivered his famous "Checkers" speech, and effectively rebutted charges of corruption. Eisenhower decided to keep Nixon and easily defeated ADLAI STEVENSON in November.

Dewey chose not run for a fourth term as governor in 1952, and declined to serve in the Eisenhower administration. Instead, he returned to the private practice of law with the firm of Dewey, Ballantine, Bushby, Palmer & Wood. He remained active in the Republican party and served as an occasional adviser to President Eisenhower. Moreover, many of his former aides and advisers, including Dulles, Brownell, LEONARD HALL, WILLIAM ROGERS, GABRIEL HAUGE, Lawrence Walsh, and JAMES HAGERTY, held prominent positions in the Eisenhower administration. Dewey addressed the Republican National Conventions in 1956, 1960, 1964, and 1968. He also served on the Republican Coordinating Committee between 1965 and 1968. After Nixon won election to the presidency, he offered Dewey an appointment as secretary of state or chief justice. Dewey declined. He died of a heart attack in Bal Harbour, Fla., on March 15, 1971.

Dillon, C(larence) Douglas

(1909–2003) ambassador to France, State Department officer

Born in Geneva, Switzerland, on August 21, 1909, C. Douglas Dillon grew up amid affluence in New York City suburbs. He graduated from Groton School in 1927 and Harvard University (magna cum laude) in 1931. With help from his father, Dillon purchased a seat on the New York Stock Exchange in 1931. Seven years later, he became vice president of Dillon, Read and Co., the investment banking firm founded by his father. Dillon followed the firm's president, James V. Forrestal, into the Navy Department in 1940. During World War II, he saw action in the Pacific as a navy air operations officer. After the war, Dillon became board chairman of Dillon, Read. Under his guidance, the firm doubled its investment portfolio in six years.

A prominent Republican, Dillon worked with JOHN FOSTER DULLES in Gov. THOMAS DEWEY's 1948 presidential campaign. In December 1951, he initiated the "draft Eisenhower" movement in New Jersey and became a large financial contributor to the Republican presidential campaign in 1952.

President Eisenhower named Dillon ambassador to France in January 1953. Dillon frequently represented Secretary of State Dulles at the Geneva Conference on Indochina in 1954. He also assisted Special Ambassador DAVID BRUCE in attempting to persuade the French to accept European economic and military unity. Fearful of German rearmament and of sacrificing their sovereignty to a supranational army, the French rejected the European Defense Community in August 1954. At the end of the year, however, they agreed to a compromise solution: the admission of West Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under the aegis of the Western European Union.

In January 1957, Dillon became deputy under-secretary of state for economic affairs. During the course of that year, he was given supervisory authority over the entire U.S. foreign-aid program. In

Douglas Dillon, undersecretary of state (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

April, he was named alternate governor of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and in December, he was appointed to the Development Loan Fund (DLF). Dillon was promoted to undersecretary of state for economic affairs in July 1958. His increased power reflected the Eisenhower administration's desire to devise a more ambitious and coherent foreign aid program. Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, who was instrumental in choosing Dillon for the job of coordinating foreign aid, believed that Dillon could ably argue the case for increased expenditures before a skeptical Congress.

With his new authority, Dillon sought to revamp foreign-aid policy. The United States, he asserted, could no longer grant foreign aid on an emergency basis. In November 1957, he advocated a five-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and more money for the DLF, especially for African and Asian nations. He also urged Congress to approve U.S. membership in the Organization for Trade Cooperation, an agency designed to administer the 38-nation General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Finally, he recommended more private investment and greater use of the Export-Import Bank to help underdeveloped nations.

Dillon's ambitious designs met with considerable success. In September 1957, the Inter-American Economic Conference called for a reduction of trade restrictions among member nations, increased efforts to stimulate investment capital, and intergovernmental cooperation on the problems of raw-material producers. Dillon encouraged the creation of regional common markets in Latin America, although he pointed out that the United States could not join because of conflicting agreements with other parts of the world. In August 1958, Dillon announced U.S. support of the Inter-American Development Institution, formed to provide development loans to Latin American countries.

In April 1959, Dillon became undersecretary of state, the second-ranking post in the State Department. He retained his authority over economic affairs and achieved two of his most notable successes in the last year of the Eisenhower administration. In September 1960, Dillon submitted a $500-million program to the Inter-American Economic Conference meeting in Bogotá, Colombia. Despite Cuban denunciations of the Act of Bogotá, all the other nations agreed to the proposal. The social development plan, a forerunner of President Kennedy's Alliance for Progress, was financed by the United States but administered by the Inter-American Development Bank. With its aims of modernizing Latin American economies, improving standards of living, and fostering land and tax reform, Dillon hoped that the plan could help democratize Latin America and thus make the rest of the hemisphere immune to communist revolution.

In December 1960, Dillon's persistent efforts to convince the Western Europeans to develop more ambitious foreign-aid programs led to the establishment of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). Consisting of the United States, Canada, and 18 European nations, the OECD succeeded the Organization for European Economic Cooperation and marked the beginning of a coordinated foreign aid policy by the developed nations.

Although Dillon was a large contributor to Nixon's presidential campaign in 1960, President-elect Kennedy asked him to join his cabinet as secretary of the treasury. Dillon accepted Kennedy's offer and became the most important economic policy maker during the Kennedy administration. He continued at his post under the Johnson administration. Unable to achieve a rapport with Johnson, Dillon left the Treasury in March 1965 and returned to Dillon, Reed. In February 1967, he became president of the U.S. and Foreign Securities Corp.

After leaving Washington, Dillon's activities with the Metropolitan Museum of Art occupied most of his time. He served as president of the museum from 1970 to 1977 and chairman from 1977 to 1983. Even after stepping down as chairman, he continued his involvement with the museum. A passionate collector of 18th- and 19th-century French paintings, he donated his collection to the Metropolitan Museum. Dillon died in New York City on January 12, 2003.

Dilworth, Richardson

(1898–1974) mayor of Philadelphia

Dilworth was born into a patrician family in Pittsburgh on August 29, 1898. After serving in the Marine Corps during World War I, he attended Yale, where he received his A.B. in 1921. Five years later, he earned his law degree from the same institution. Dilworth then began to practice law in Philadelphia. The colorful, outgoing trial lawyer also became involved in reform politics as a Democrat. Over the next 40 years, Dilworth opposed the entrenched Republican machine, which had dominated Philadelphia politics since the end of the 19th century.

In 1947, Dilworth ran for mayor on a platform denouncing municipal corruption. He lost to the Republican machine candidate, Mayor Bernard Samuels, by approximately 90,000 votes. Over the next two years, however, revelations of wholesale municipal corruption were uncovered, and in 1949 Dilworth was elected city treasurer. In 1951, he became district attorney at the same time that his political ally and friend, JOSEPH CLARK, became mayor. Dilworth and Clark received their support from a broad-based coalition of ethnic minority leaders, ideological liberals, and patrician Philadelphia families. Dilworth became mayor in 1956, when Clark went to the U.S. Senate.

During the 1950s, the two men ushered in what journalist Neal Peirce called "Philadelphia's modern Golden Age." Under the Clark and Dilworth administrations, Philadelphia reorganized its government and reformed its civil service. It began a reform of its transit system, encouraged industrial development, and undertook a large-scale public housing program.

The two men developed one of the largest urban-renewal projects in the nation. It was designed to rejuvenate the city's waterfront and rehabilitate the aging downtown area. Parks were created and the city's historic sites renovated. Dilworth often used public-interest corporations to coordinate and guide renewal efforts. These groups, independent of but close to municipal government, were composed not only of corporate and banking officials, but also of members of various interest groups. The businessmen on the board provided investors with confidence in the stability of projects, while the civic groups gave the efforts a broad political base.

Dilworth opposed segregation in private schools and defended the rights of organized labor. He endorsed federal aid for housing and in 1959 protested Eisenhower's veto of a $1.5-billion housing bill. The mayor also urged the development of a progressive national transportation policy. He recommended that commuter railroads be subsidized by low-interest loans; that rail taxation policies be coordinated among state, local, and federal governments; and that mass transit facilities be improved.

Dilworth resigned as mayor to run for governor in 1962. He lost to William Scranton but continued in public service as president of the Philadelphia Board of Education. Dilworth resigned from the school board in 1971. He died in Philadelphia of a brain tumor on January 23, 1974.

Dirksen, Everett McKinley

(1895–1969) U.S. senator, Senate minority leader

Born in Pekin, Ill., on January 4, 1895, Everett McKinley Dirksen grew up on his family's farm in central Illinois. After attending the University of Minnesota, he served in the army during World War I and received a battlefield commission. He returned to Pekin after the war and engaged in several business ventures. He won a seat on the city council in 1926. After running unsuccessfully in the Republican primary for a seat in the House of Representatives in 1930, he won a seat in the House in 1932, where he would serve until 1948. In Congress, Dirksen generally supported his party's Eastern internationalist wing. Dirksen found little fault in Roosevelt's conduct of foreign policy from 1933 to 1936. Beginning in 1937, however, he became increasingly critical of what he regarded as the president's interventionism. Then, in September 1941, he repudiated his isolationist position and threw his support behind Roosevelt. After World War II, Dirksen, an avid anticommunist, advocated American economic assistance to curtail Soviet influence. He played an important role in the passage of the first Marshall Plan appropriations in 1947. Because of problems with his health that threatened his eyesight, Dirksen did not run for reelection in 1948. In 1950, his health and eyesight restored, Dirksen defeated the heavily favored Democratic incumbent, Scott Lucas, in a race for the U.S. Senate.

A growing conviction that the Fair Deal was moving towards welfare statism and that government regulation was strangling economic freedom combined with increasing concerns over Truman's foreign policies and Dirksen's own anticommunism, to move the new senator's politics to the right.

Dirksen figured prominently in the battle for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952. A leading supporter of Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), he twice spoke for the Taft forces before the national convention, and he nominated Taft. Dirksen wanted the vice presidential spot and hoped that Taft would choose him as his running mate. From the rostrum, he rhetorically attacked the GOP's presidential nominee in 1944 and 1948, Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY, who opposed Taft. Pointing to Dewey, seated before him, he cried, "We followed you before, and you took us down the path to defeat!" The convention fell into pandemonium. Despite Dirksen's histrionics, Dewey's candidate, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, won the nomination. The general did not seriously consider Dirksen for the vice presidency, despite Taft's strong recommendation.

In the next three years, Eisenhower commanded only marginal loyalty from Dirksen, whose flannel-voiced orations and slippery positions on issues earned him the nickname "the Wizard of Ooze." During the campaign for the general election in 1952, Dirksen gave Eisenhower only lukewarm support. In the 83rd (1953–54) Congress, Taft, then majority leader, rewarded Dirksen with three important committee assignments: Appropriations, Judiciary, and Government Operations. Yet, neither Taft nor Eisenhower could count on Dirksen for crucial votes. In March 1953, he voted against the nomination of CHARLES E. BOHLEN to be ambassador to the Soviet Union, despite Taft's support for the appointment. The following month, Dirksen joined Taft in criticizing Eisenhower's first budget, because defense appropriations proved larger than hoped. Dirksen favored the Bricker amendment, which would have curbed the president's treaty-making powers. Long after Sen. JOHN W. BRICKER (R-Ohio) had all but abandoned the cause, Dirksen reintroduced the measure in early 1956. His initiative failed. In 1954, Dirksen reversed himself and supported Eisenhower's proposal for foreign aid and the Saint Lawrence Seaway.

Dirksen also opposed the Eisenhower administration during the Army-McCarthy hearings of 1954. From the time of his campaign for the Senate in 1950, Dirksen had been a vociferous proponent of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY'S (R-Wis.) anticommunist investigations. Assigned to McCarthy's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, he generally backed the Wisconsin senator's ambitious investigation of subversion in the army, and in 1954 attempted to forestall an open clash between McCarthy and the White House over the issue. In one last attempt to heal the growing breach between the army and McCarthy, Dirksen hosted a luncheon for Army Secretary ROBERT T. STEVENS and Republican members of the subcommittee. The stormy meeting failed to reconcile the differences between the administration on the one hand and McCarthy and his supporters on the other. As the meeting ended, KARL MUNDT (R-S.Dak.) read a "memorandum of understanding" that sounded like a surrender by Stevens. The episode infuriated some top members of the White House staff. The hearings began on April 22, 1954. In early May, Dirksen twice sought unsuccessfully to cut short the proceedings, the second time by proposing that once Stevens had completed his testimony, the subcommittee would then go immediately to McCarthy's testimony; the remaining hearings would be held in executive session. Stevens, however, wanted vindication, and Mundt joined the Democrats on the committee (who were happy to see an intramural brawl within the Republican party continue) to defeat Dirksen's motion. Thus, the public had an extended opportunity to observe McCarthy in action. In June, Dirksen motioned, again unsuccessfully, to end the hearings after one additional week of testimony. By then, however, McCarthy had all but destroyed his credibility.

Dirksen stood by McCarthy through the Senate vote that condemned him. In July 1954, he implored the Senate not to discipline McCarthy. He worked to alter the wording of the resolution from "censure" to "deplore." Visiting McCarthy during the fall, he asked his colleague to sign one of three letters of apology he had drafted, but McCarthy refused. In December, the Senate condemned McCarthy by a 67-22 vote; Dirksen joined 19 other GOP senators in voting against the motion. Dirksen received severe criticism from his colleagues and the national press for his advocacy of McCarthy's case.

Dirksen's political fortunes rose spectacularly within two years after McCarthy's fall. Soon after the vote to condemn McCarthy, Dirksen began to move away from the extreme right wing of the Republican party. Although erratic in his support for Eisenhower up to 1955, thereafter the senator identified his interests closely with those of the president. Up for reelection the same year as Eisenhower, Dirksen needed the popular president's endorsement. In addition, Dirksen's former sponsor, the very conservative owner of the Chicago Tribune, Robert McCormick, died in April 1955. Therefore, when Eisenhower appealed to Dirksen for help because WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) proved ineffective as minority leader, Dirksen answered the call. By early 1956, Dirksen stood apart from the party's "Old Guard," managing the administration's plan to sell old air force planes to Yugoslavia. Nevertheless,

Knowland and the conservative stalwarts prevented the Yugoslav arms sale. Dirksen also led administration forces backing a civil rights bill in 1956, a modified version of which passed the House in August. However, majority leader LYNDON JOHNSON buried the bill when it got to the Senate. Eisenhower warmly endorsed Dirksen for his labors, and in the fall, both men carried Illinois easily.

In January 1957, Dirksen became minority whip and Knowland's chief assistant. He assumed more and more of his chief's responsibilities as Knowland began his California gubernatorial campaign in 1958. Unlike Knowland, Dirksen established cordial relations with Eisenhower and supported the administration's programs. During the 85th Congress, the once-rebellious Dirksen ranked first in Congressional Quarterly's listing of senators voting in support of the administration. Dirksen even defended Eisenhower's aide, SHERMAN ADAMS, on the eve of his ouster for conflict of interest.

Dirksen succeeded Knowland as minority leader in January 1959. Most Republican moderates in the Senate opposed his succession as one engineered by the Old Guard and its powerful leader, STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.). The moderates' candidate, JOHN SHERMAN COOPER (R-Ky.), lost to Dirksen by a 20-14 vote in the party caucus. After his victory, Dirksen made the liberal THOMAS KUCHEL (R-Calif.) minority whip. As demanded by the younger caucus members, he redistributed at least one important committee assignment to each senator, no matter how low his seniority. Through these moves, as well as his mastery of legislative detail, compromise, and cajolery, Dirksen molded the once-fragmented Republican minority into a cohesive unit.

Dirksen worked for the administration with some success against overwhelming odds. The Democrats made spectacular gains in the 1958 elections; the Democratic majority in the Senate climbed from 48-47 to 64-34. Despite Republican losses, Dirksen and the president, working in concert, frustrated an ambitious legislative program promoted by majority leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON. For example, strong Republican support for presidential vetoes on two occasions in 1959 killed the Democrats' housing bill. Congress ultimately passed a measure acceptable to Eisenhower. Dirksen also played an important role in securing passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

Dirksen served as minority leader through the 1960s. His national stature increased markedly when the GOP lost control of the executive branch after 1960. By the mid-1960s, Dirksen had earned much praise for his bipartisan support for initiatives of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations in civil rights and foreign policy. A colorful, dramatic speaker and storyteller, Dirksen enjoyed a national constituency that long remembered his oratorical flights. By 1967, however, his control over the Senate minority began to wane. Dirksen died in Washington, D.C., on September 7, 1969.

DiSalle, Michael V(incent)

(1908–1981) governor of Ohio

The son of Italian immigrants, Michael DiSalle was born on January 6, 1908, in New York City. He grew up in Toledo, Ohio. After earning a law degree at Georgetown University in 1931, DiSalle entered Toledo Democratic politics and in 1947 was appointed mayor. Three years later, he lost the Democratic primary for the Senate nomination. In December 1950, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him director of price stabilization. DiSalle left Washington in 1952 to return to Ohio and campaign for the U.S. Senate. Running ahead of the national ticket, he lost nonetheless to the popular Republican incumbent, JOHN W. BRICKER. DiSalle returned to Washington in early December to serve as administrator of the Economic Stabilization Agency for the remaining six weeks of the Truman presidency.

Out of office after 1953, DiSalle nevertheless commanded the loyalty of many state and national Democrats who were dissatisfied with Ohio Democratic Gov. FRANK J. LAUSCHE's leadership.

DiSalle played a major role in the Democratic vice presidential nomination in 1956. After ADLAI E. STEVENSON opened the vice presidential nomination to the convention, DiSalle agreed to nominate Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.). In so doing, he effectively committed 58 of Ohio's 64 votes to Kefauver, who narrowly defeated Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) on the second ballot.

In the fall of 1956, DiSalle ran for the governorship of Ohio. During the campaign, he devoted several weeks to an effort to reinvigorate the state party's organization and allotted still more time to touring rural counties, expecting to gain from farmers' unhappiness with Eisenhower's agriculture policies. The strategy failed. Eisenhower swept all parts of the state, and Republican gubernatorial nominee, Attorney General C. William O'Neill, won 56 percent of the vote.

DiSalle's opportunity came two years later. Poorly staffed, indecisive, and ill, O'Neill proved an ineffective governor. In a monumental political error, he warmly endorsed a business coalition that placed on the November 1958 ballot a "right-to-work" proposal banning union shops. The referendum evoked vehement, well-organized union opposition and failed to engender expected support from Catholics and nonunion laborers. It lost by 1 million votes. In the face of a nationwide Democratic trend, both O'Neill and Sen. Bricker lost their campaigns for reelection. DiSalle was the first Democratic governor clearly identifiable with the politics of the national party since 1920.

DiSalle's sense of triumph proved short-lived. His predecessor's policy of borrowing to meet expenses (the state ran a $100 million budget deficit in 1958) forced DiSalle to raise corporate and sales taxes in 1959, an immensely unpopular decision. Yet, despite the increased revenues, DiSalle alienated union officials and liberal Democrats by delaying action on the expansion of social services. He gained nothing in popularity by opposing capital punishment and employing convicted murderers to work at the governor's mansion.

Kennedy maneuvered a reluctant DiSalle into endorsing his presidential candidacy in January 1960. Kennedy won the nomination and, with DiSalle's encouragement, selected the Senate majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), as his running mate.

The Democratic ticket lost Ohio. Surveys later suggested that Kennedy's Catholicism hurt him, but most experts and DiSalle himself blamed the result on the governor's tax increase in 1959. The Republicans recaptured control of the legislature and made the governor's last two years in office difficult.

DiSalle lost his campaign for reelection in 1962 by a then-record margin of 555,669 votes. He returned to law practice in Columbus and remained active in Democratic politics. However, he never again sought elective office. In 1976, he moved his law practice to Washington, D.C. He died of a heart attack while visiting Pescara, Italy, on September 15, 1981.

Dixon, Edgar H.

(1904–1962) president, Middle Southern Utilities Inc. Dixon was born on December 16, 1904, in Hackensack, N.J. His formal schooling ended with graduation from Hackensack High School in 1922. Starting at Electric Bond and Share Co. as a $70-a-month clerk, he took night courses in English and accounting at New York University. By 1934, Dixon was serving as financial clerk and assistant treasurer of a number of Electric Bond's subsidiaries. He was secretary-treasurer and director of Electric Power and Light Corp. from 1935 to 1944 and served as president of the company from 1944 to 1949. Dixon became the first president of Middle Southern Utilities, Inc., in 1949. The company doubled its profits over the next 10 years.

In 1954, Middle Southern Utilities joined the Southern Co., headed by Eugene Yates, to form the Mississippi Valley Generating Co. Their purpose was to construct a plant at West Memphis, Ark., to sell 600,000 kilowatts of power annually to the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC). Dixon's firm owned 80 percent of Mississippi Valley and Yates's company owned 20 percent.

Under the terms of the proposed Dixon-Yates contract, power would be fed into the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) system for distribution to consumers, including the AEC. It marked the first time in its history that the TVA would act as a distributor rather a generator of power.

Dixon and Yates started negotiating with the AEC and the Bureau of the Budget in June 1954. Haste was required, because President Eisenhower had promised a 600,000-kilowatt reduction in the AEC's demand on TVA power by 1957. The two government agencies, therefore, solicited no other bids. They ignored a proposal by Walter von Tresckow, head of an alternate power syndicate in New York, as well as the TVA's suggestion that it could supply the power for $5 million less than private sources. The TVA was not told the terms of the Dixon-Yates contract until after it had been negotiated.

Democratic senators denounced the agreement as an attempt to undermine the TVA. In late 1954, they uncovered possible violations of the Holding Company Act by Dixon's and Yates's southern subsidiaries. In February 1955, Sen. LISTER HILL (D-Ala.) discovered that Adolphe H. Wenzell, a vice president of the First Boston Corp., which was arranging financing for Dixon-Yates, was a consultant to the Bureau of the Budget at the time negotiations were in progress. His name did not appear on a list that the AEC had released revealing the names of those who had worked on the contract. Questioned by Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) in hearings held by the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly in July 1955, Director of the Budget ROWLAND HUGHES stated that he thought Wenzell's role too insignificant to mention.

After Wenzell openly acknowledged his dual role and stated that he had worked with Hughes, the president canceled the contract in July 1955. His action followed an announcement by Memphis that it intended to build a $100-million municipally owned power plant. The following year, Dixon and Yates brought suit against the United States for $3 million in reported expenditures. In June 1959, the U.S. Claims Court awarded the Mississippi Valley Generating Co. $1.8 million. The Supreme Court reversed that decision in January 1961. Throughout the controversy and thereafter, Dixon defended the contract. He remained one of the most sought-after utilities executives in the United States. He died in New York City on August 3, 1962.

Dodd, Thomas J(oseph)

(1907–1971) U.S. congressman and senator

Dodd was born in Norwich, Conn., on May 15, 1907. He received a Bachelor of Philosophy from Providence College in 1930 and an LL.B. from the Yale Law School in 1933. From 1933 to 1935, he was a special agent with the FBI. In 1935, Dodd organized the National Youth Administration in Connecticut, and from 1938 to 1945, he served as an assistant to the attorney general. During the postwar period, Dodd was executive trial counsel at the Nuremberg war crimes trials. He unsuccessfully sought the Connecticut Democratic gubernatorial nomination in 1946 and 1948.

In 1952, Dodd won election to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he proved to be one of Congress's staunchest anticommunists. In 1953, Dodd was named to the seven-man Select Committee to Investigate Soviet Seizure of the Baltic Countries, which held hearings in 1953 and early 1954. The following year, he was assigned to that panel's successor, the nine-member Select Committee on Communist Aggression. The committee's report, in August 1954, recommended that the United States call a conference of "free world" nations for the purpose of breaking off trade and diplomatic relations with communist countries. During the same year, he chaired a special subcommittee probing alleged incarceration and abuse of American citizens in Communist China. In November, Dodd suggested that the United States retaliate by urging the West to apply a trade embargo against mainland China. Two years later, he successfully amended a farm-surplus disposal bill to restrict surplus transactions to "friendly countries."

Although a strong anticommunist, in 1954 Dodd criticized a bill, recommended by Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL, that would have permitted the attorney general to order wiretapping in suspected cases of espionage, sabotage, and other threats to national security. He voted for the bill only after the addition of an amendment requiring federal court approval for a tap. In a related issue, Dodd voted against a bill giving Congress and U.S. district courts authority to grant immunity to congressional and court witnesses. The measure was aimed at witnesses taking the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination in hearings involving national security. Under the bill's provisions, such persons would have the alternatives of either testifying or going to jail. On the other hand, he backed the Communist Control Act of 1954, sponsored by Democratic liberals, which outlawed the Communist Party.

Dodd compiled a generally liberal record on domestic issues. A strong supporter of civil rights, in 1956 he backed a controversial amendment offered by Rep. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.) to a bill providing federal aid for school construction. The Powell amendment would have barred aid to states operating racially segregated schools. Dodd voted both for the amendment, which was adopted, and the final bill, which was defeated. In 1956, he also supported a civil rights bill sponsored by the administration aimed against racial discrimination, particularly in voting.

In 1956, Dodd unsuccessfully ran for the U.S. Senate. The following year, he represented three members of the Teamsters Union in an unsuccessful suit to block JAMES R. HOFFA's accession to the presidency of the organization. In 1958, he again ran for the Senate on a platform stressing the need for a strengthened military and a program to combat unemployment and inflation. He won by 146,000 votes.

Dodd maintained his strong anticommunist position as a senator. In a letter to President Eisenhower in January 1959, he warned against a bilateral conference with the Soviet Union on the ground that it would divide the United States from its allies. In 1960, he was a leader of opposition to the ratification of the Antarctic Treaty with the Soviet Union and 10 other nations. The purpose of the pact was to ensure that Antarctica would be used for peaceful purposes, but opponents maintained that the treaty did not have guarantees against Soviet military operations on that continent.

In 1960, Dodd and Sen. KENNETH B. KEATING (R-N.Y.), as members of the Judiciary Committee's Internal Security Subcommittee, introduced a four-part internal security bill. The measure widened the definition of illegal espionage and of foreign agents under the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1958. It defined the Smith Act's (1940) prohibition against forming a group advocating the violent overthrow of the government as applying to the organization's ongoing activities as well as its initial formation. This represented an effort to overturn the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Smith Act in Yates v. U.S. (1957), which held that the statute did not outlaw advocacy of forcible overthrow of the government as an abstract doctrine. In addition, the bill permitted the secretary of state to declare certain areas off limits for travel and, after a hearing, to deny passports to communists and communist sympathizers whom he believed might endanger U.S. security. The House passed a similar bill, but the Senate did not act. Most of the Dodd-Keating proposals, however, became law in 1961 and 1962.

As chairman of the Internal Security Subcommittee, Dodd conducted an investigation in 1960 into alleged communist influence in the nuclear test-ban movement. He ordered Nobel Prize-winning chemist Dr. LINUS C. PAULING to produce the names of persons who helped him circulate a petition in 1957 calling for a test-ban agreement, but Pauling declined to do so.

Dodd backed most social welfare and civil rights legislation during his first two years in the Senate. He voted to override Eisenhower's vetoes of housing legislation in 1959 and of an area redevelopment bill in 1960. Dodd supported a boost in the minimum wage from $1 to $1.25, a bill to provide federal aid to schools, a health care program for the aged funded by Social Security, and the administration's Civil Rights bill in 1960.

During the early 1960s, Dodd, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee's Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee, conducted a probe of the influence of television upon juvenile delinquency. Subsequently, he was a strong supporter of the Vietnam War and of gun-control legislation. In 1967, the Senate censured him for misuse of campaign funds. Dodd unsuccessfully ran for reelection as an independent in 1970. He died in Old Lyme, Conn., on May 24, 1971.

Dodge, Joseph M(orrell)

(1890–1964) director of the budget

Born in Detroit, Mich., on November 18, 1890, Joseph Dodge attended public high school. Upon graduating in 1908, he worked as a bank messenger and in various clerical positions before becoming a bank examiner for the Michigan State Banking Commission in 1911. In 1917, he joined a Dodge (no relation) auto dealership as general manager. He remained until 1932, when he returned to banking as vice president of the First National Bank of Detroit. The next year, he became president of the Bank of Detroit.

During World War II, Dodge held a number of posts with government agencies, the most important of which was chairman of the War Contracts Board. At the war's end, he went to Germany as financial adviser to Gen. LUCIUS CLAY, commander of the Allied military government. He returned to the Bank of Detroit in 1946. In 1949, President HARRY S. TRUMAN summoned Dodge to serve as financial adviser to Gen. Douglas MacArthur in Japan. Dodge's program of fiscal austerity helped stabilize the Japanese currency and rebuild the country's shattered economy.

In November 1952, Dodge was named budget director by President-elect DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. Dodge's first public statement, on January 6, 1953, warned against expecting any "60-day miracle" in the way of budget cuts, but he devoted himself to reducing government spending. He directed all federal agencies to submit revised estimates of expenditures in order to cut the budget deficit of $9.9 billion projected by the outgoing Truman administration for fiscal 1954. Under Dodge, the deficit for that year was trimmed to $3.1 billion, although the total budget did not fall under $70 billion, as President-elect Eisenhower had pledged it would. Among Dodge's methods for raising revenues and cutting costs were increased rents in public housing and admissions to national parks as well as curtailed use of government automobiles. He also promoted economy in defense spending and opposed plans by Republican members of Congress to cut taxes on 1953 income.

Dodge resigned as budget director in April 1954 to return to his bank in Detroit. Later that year, he became involved in the congressional investigation of the controversial Dixon-Yates affair. EDGAR DIXON and EUGENE YATES were utility executives seeking a government contract to supply power to the Atomic Energy Commission. Dodge had originally suggested having a private company supply the power instead of the Tennessee Valley Authority and had named Adolphe Wenzell, a vice president of the First Boston Corp., to study the matter. The choice of Wenzell became a subject of controversy when it was revealed that First Boston was to finance the Dixon-Yates combine. Testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, Dodge maintained that Wenzell had not influenced his decision on the contract.

In the fall of 1954, Dodge returned to government as a special assistant to President Eisenhower on foreign economic policy. In January, he became chairman of the administration's Council on Foreign Economic Policy, which had been set up at his recommendation. He served in this post until July 1956. His major task was coordinating the disparate activities of the dozens of U.S. agencies involved in international economic affairs. Dodge died in Detroit on December 2, 1964.

Doerfer, John C(harles)

(1904–1990) commissioner, Federal Communications Commission

The son of a German immigrant, John C. Doerfer was born in Milwaukee, Wis., on November 30, 1904. He worked his way through the University of Wisconsin, where he graduated in 1928. After receiving a law degree from Marquette in 1934, he then opened a private law practice in a suburb of Milwaukee. From 1940 to 1949, he served as city attorney of Milwaukee; in 1949 he became chairman of the state's Public Service Commission.

President Eisenhower named Doerfer to a one-year vacancy on the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) in 1953 and to a full seven-year term in 1954. At the time, some liberals denounced the appointment as an attempt by the administration to placate Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). The Senate, however, confirmed Doerfer in April.

In 1953, Doerfer promoted an FCC investigation of an Erie, Pa., TV station license owned by EDWARD LAMB, a wealthy attorney from Toledo with a leftist past. FCC hearings in 1954–55 proved embarrassing to Lamb's opponents. Government witnesses who had testified to Lamb's communist connections confessed to committing perjury at the request of an FCC attorney. Even McCarthy, initially enthused over the affair, admitted by early 1955 that the FCC had no case. In December 1955, an FCC examiner, Herbert Sharfman, exonerated Lamb and recommended renewal of the license.

Doerfer repeatedly expressed doubts about legislation that would have granted the FCC authority to regulate the national television networks. Rather, he believed competition between networks would eventually improve the content of programs. Under his chairmanship, the FCC issued and renewed station licenses without regard to earlier FCC precedents requiring "public interest," locally oriented news and cultural programming.

In February 1957, the FCC announced plans for testing a subscription television service (PAY-TV) in selected markets. This action aroused the opposition of the major networks and Congress. House Judiciary Committee Chairman EMANUEL CELLER (D-N.Y.) argued that the FCC did not have the power to conduct PAY-TV tests. At first, Doerfer stood firm with the 6-1 majority favoring the tests. In January 1958, however, he told a House committee that he did not favor PAY-TV if it threatened to replace free TV. By July 1958, Doerfer relented to pressure from Congress and the networks, and the FCC delayed indefinitely authorization of the tests.

In 1958, DREW PEARSON, a newspaper columnist, charged Doerfer with conflicts of interest. At the urging of Speaker SAM RAYBURN, in 1957 the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had appointed a subcommittee, known as the Special Committee on Legislative Oversight, to investigate interference with the regulatory agencies. In January 1958, the subcommittee's chief counsel, BERNARD SCHWARTZ, submitted a memorandum urging a sweeping investigation of the FCC. The subcommittee declined to undertake the sort of investigation recommended by Schwartz, and someone leaked the memo to Pearson. At congressional hearings, it came out that station KWTV in Oklahoma City had reimbursed Doerfer for the first leg of a trip in 1954, and the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters reimbursed him for the second leg, to Spokane, Wash. Doerfer then submitted travel vouchers to the government for the trip. Doerfer attributed the double reimbursement to a mistake. It also came out that he had received travel expenses and an honorarium for speeches to broadcasting groups at several resorts. In addition, he received partial reimbursement for one of the trips from the government. Doerfer defended the trips and payments as "amenities.” The hearings established neither illegality nor impropriety on Doerfer’s part.

Doerfer survived criticism stemming from the exposés. Imprecise language in a 1952 amendment to the FCC Act could be interpreted to permit commissioners to accept honoraria, and the comptroller general supported Doerfer’s interpretation. Thus, Eisenhower refused to remove Doerfer. In addition, Schwartz’s tactics, both as an investigator and interrogator, also offended many and created sympathy for Doerfer. Attention soon turned away from Doerfer’s hearings to another, more serious conflict-of-interest scandal involving another FCC Commissioner, RICHARD A. MACK. Nevertheless, the subcommittee warned Doerfer not to continue his close fraternization with the industry.

Subsequently, the FCC chairman had to deal with a series of scandals in the television industry. In fall 1959, several contestants on TV quiz shows (once the highest-rated programs) confessed to having been given questions and answers in advance. The quiz-show scandals shocked the nation and created demands for the criminal prosecution of the producer and overall reform. In October, Doerfer denied that the FCC had any responsibility for “policing” the shows. Rumors concerning irregularities involving quiz shows had reached the FCC in July 1958. The commission had asked the three networks about them, but the networks disclaimed knowledge of the alleged practices. Doerfer told a subcommittee of the House Commerce Committee that the best response to all “objectionable programming” would be “greater incentive for the exercise of self-regulatory restraints.”

Early in March 1960, the New York Herald Tribune reported that Doerfer had spent a portion of his previous month’s vacation aboard the yacht of George Storer, who owned five television stations and seven radio stations. Storer had also paid for a trip Doerfer took to Miami and Bimini in 1955.

Before the House Commerce Committee a day later, Doerfer admitted to accepting Storer’s hospitality and defended his own actions. He had not clearly violated the law, but he had acted against the subcommittee’s 1958 recommendation that he discontinue his close and remunerative contacts with broadcasting executives. This time, Eisenhower immediately requested and secured his resignation.

After resigning from the FCC, Doerfer took up legal practice in Washington, D.C. He moved to Florida in 1963, where he did legal work for Storer Broadcasting Company until 1974. He practiced law on a part-time basis until he retired in 1980. Doerfer died in Boston on June 5, 1992.

Dorfman, Paul

A former prizefighter, member of Al Capone’s mob, and associate of such underworld figures as John Dioguardi (Johnny Dio), Paul “Red” Dorfman was born around 1902. He took over the Waste Materials Handlers Federated Labor Union in 1939, following the murder of its president. That same year, he established the Union Casualty Agency with his stepson, Allan, and his wife as the principal agents. Already a leading crime figure in Chicago, Dorfman sought to expand his power through his close personal relationship with JIMMY HOFFA.

In late January 1959, the Senate Committee on Improper Relations in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), investigated an insurance scheme ostensibly fashioned by Dorfman and Hoffa to swindle members of the Teamster’s Union. According to the Committee, shortly after Dorfman established the Union Casualty Agency, the company bid to handle the welfare pension fund of the huge Central States Drivers Council and Local 1031 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Hoffa arranged for Dorfman’s company to obtain the contract. Testimony showed that the Dorfman family made $4 million in commissions and fees as a result of the deal. At the same time, the Teamster’s benefits were reduced and their premiums raised in 1952. The committee’s counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, revealed that a Chicago Internal Revenue agent had been discharged for having given his personal approval to Allan Dorfman’s income tax returns.

Paul Dorfman repeatedly took the Fifth Amendment when he appeared in front of the Committee on January 30, 1959. Robert Kennedy asked him whether the contract that Hoffa gave him was a reward for Dorfman's aid in enabling the Teamster leader to amass power in the Chicago area. Although Dorfman refused to answer this question, the McClellan committee claimed that such a deal did occur.

The committee also charged that Dorfman had helped Hoffa increase his power in New York City. Dorfman persuaded his friend Anthony Doria, an official in the United Automobile Workers–American Federation of Labor (there was another group associated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations), to issue a charter for a new local in New York organized by Sam Zachman, a friend of Dorfman who had ties to organized crime. Involved in actually setting up the local was Johnny Dio, one of Hoffa's operatives and another close friend of Dorfman. Dio eventually pushed Zachman out and took over the union himself. He organized additional locals, staffed them with ex-convicts, and then became the union's regional director. The employees of the businesses organized were forced to join the union. The mostly black and Puerto Rican members paid a $25 initiation fee and a $3.50 a month dues; the companies paid them the minimum wage with no benefits. By setting up this extortion operation, Dorfman and Dio provided Hoffa with a power base in the New York area.

In December 1958, GEORGE MEANY placed Dorfman's union under AFL-CIO trusteeship. The federation president then removed Dorfman in August 1959 from his office as secretary-treasurer and from the union itself. Meany based his decision on the fact that the Dorfman family had derived personal advantage from union funds deposited in their insurance company.

Revelations of the activities of union officials such as Paul Dorfman led to a public demand for legislation to prevent such abuses. In September 1959, Congress passed the Landrum-Griffin Act. The law's anticorruption provision subjected union officials found guilty of misusing funds to stiff fines and prison terms. It also prohibited certain types of criminal offenders from holding union offices. However, it proved difficult to enforce.

Following the McClellan committee's revelations, the Dorfman insurance company was reorganized, allegedly to hide its activities. Paul Dorfman devoted most of his time to that business. In 1964, a grand jury in San Francisco indicted him and his son on a charge of extorting $100,000 from an insurance executive in San Francisco. The jury acquitted them on the charge. Allan Dorfman was tried with Jimmy Hoffa in 1964 on a charge of jury tampering and was acquitted. Paul Dorfman died in Chicago on March 12, 1971.

Douglas, Paul H(oward)

Born in Salem, Mass., on March 26, 1892, and reared on a farm in northern Maine, Paul Douglas worked his way through Bowdoin College, graduating in 1913. He obtained an M.A. (1915) and a Ph.D. (1921) in economics from Columbia University and taught economics at a number of colleges before joining the University of Chicago's faculty in 1920. Douglas won professional renown for his scholarly works, the most notable of which were Wages of the Family (1925), Real Wages in the United States, 1890–1926 (1930), and Theory of Wages (1934). He entered the political arena in 1929, when he undertook an investigation of the Chicago utilities magnate, Samuel Insull, then at the peak of his power. Persistent in the face of harsh opposition from the financial and political establishment, Douglas displayed the doggedly independent liberalism that became his trademark as a political figure.

During the Depression, Douglas influenced public policy through his service on a variety of commissions and committees. In 1930, he was a secretary to the Pennsylvania Commission on Unemployment and the New York Committee to Stabilize Employment. From 1931 to 1933, he was a member of the Illinois Housing Commission, and he helped to formulate the state's Utilities Act of 1933, Old Age Pension Act of 1935, and Unemployment Insurance Act of 1937. He also participated in the drafting of the national Social Security Act of 1935.

In 1938, Douglas won election as a Chicago alderman with the support of intellectuals and upper-middle-class reformers from the Hyde Park area as well as the Democratic machine. In office, he alienated the regular organization with his exposures of graft and corruption and lost the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate in 1942 to a machine-backed candidate. Immediately following his defeats, Douglas enlisted in the Marine Corps as a private, despite his age (50) and his Quaker faith. (He had been a pacifist and opposed military preparation until Italy's invasion of Ethiopia in 1935.) Douglas served in the Pacific theater and left the service in 1946 as a decorated lieutenant colonel, recipient of the Purple Heart and Bronze Star. Despite five operations, he never recovered functional use of his left arm.

Douglas again ran for the Senate in 1948, on a platform advocating a federal housing program, federal aid to education, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and support of President Truman's foreign policy. With the support of the Cook Co. Democratic machine, he defeated the Republican incumbent by 400,000 votes.

Douglas soon became a leader of the Senate's liberal bloc. His voting record consistently won the approval of the AFL-CIO and the Americans for Democratic Action. During the Eisenhower administration, Douglas called for a number of legislative initiatives, including civil rights, tax reform, stimulative economics, and social welfare. He frequently pointed out waste and extravagance in the military and in public works programs. He was frustrated as much by his Democratic colleagues in Congress as by the Republican administration. Douglas frequently stood alone in a crusade or in the company of a handful of fellow liberals.

One of the Senate's most outspoken proponents of civil rights legislation. Douglas persistently and unsuccessfully sought to pave the way for such laws by amending the Senate's Rule 22, which governed debate and enabled Southerners to filibuster civil rights proposals to death. Rule 22 required a two-thirds vote to limit debate. Douglas's efforts to substitute cloture by a simple majority consistently failed, as did moderate revisions, such as cloture by a three-fifths vote or after 15 days of debate.

During the first term of the Eisenhower administration, civil rights proposals got nowhere in the Senate. In August 1956, Douglas led a group of northern liberals who tried and failed to put a strong civil rights plank into the Democratic platform. Douglas was disinclined to moderate civil rights goals in order to mollify southern Democrats. Commenting in the fall of 1957 on reports that forced school desegregation might lead southern segregationists to form a third party, he said he "would welcome it" because "it would mean getting the Dixiecrats out of our party."

Douglas supported the Civil Rights Act of 1957, although it was not so far-reaching as his own proposals. He joined the administration in fighting unsuccessfully against an amendment mandating a jury trial in cases in which a court injunction protecting black voting rights had been violated. He voted for the final bill in spite of its dilution, because it contained some protections for voting rights and established a civil rights division within the Justice Department.

In January 1959, Douglas headed a 15-member Senate group that introduced a measure empowering the attorney general to initiate lawsuits to halt illegal bias and providing $40 million a year to help finance school districts trying to desegregate in the face of state opposition. The bill failed to pass at the time, but its major provisions were included in the omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In economic affairs, Douglas was a vocal and knowledgeable spokesman for liberal Senate Democrats. He made several unsuccessful attempts to legislate sizable tax cuts to stimulate the economy and reduce unemployment. Douglas was also the Senate's foremost critic of tax loopholes. Named to the Finance Committee in 1956 after being kept off several years, Douglas and Sen. ALBERT GORE (D-Tenn.) were frequently a minority of two protesting the committee's enactment of tax preferences for corporations and wealthy individuals. Douglas's chief target was the 27½ percent oil depletion allowance. His efforts to reduce or eliminate this provision were easily defeated in the committee and on the Senate floor.

Douglas enjoyed more success in his promotion of area redevelopment legislation. Parallel to his continuous criticism of "pork barrel" public works projects that he considered expensive and unnecessary, he conceived and gathered support for an ambitious federal program to reinvigorate the economies of chronically depressed regions. The principal features of Douglas's area redevelopment plan were public works, technical assistance and long-term credit for local industry, and the retraining of jobless workers. Douglas first introduced his measure in 1955 with the textile and coal-producing areas of the Northeast in mind; in 1956, he broadened its scope to reach the depressed agricultural regions of the South as well.

Area redevelopment passed the Senate, 60-30, in 1956 but remained bottled up in the House Rules Committee when the 84th Congress adjourned. Congress passed it in 1958 and 1960. Both times it was vetoed by President Eisenhower, who objected to the breadth of the measure and said that it would "greatly diminish local responsibility." The Area Redevelopment Act was signed into law by President JOHN F. KENNEDY in 1961. Douglas listed it as his greatest achievement during his over 20 years in Congress.

A vigorous anticommunist, Douglas was a member of the Committee of One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the UN. In 1954, he called for U.S. intervention on the side of France in the Indochina war. He supported Secretary of State JOHN, FOSTER DULLES's efforts to build the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. During Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's visit to America in 1959, Douglas joined several other members of Congress on the Committee for Freedom of All Peoples, which called for Americans to observe Premier Khrushchev's visit with a period of mourning for victims of communist oppression.

Douglas won reelection in 1960 by a margin of 420,000 votes. In the next six years, he actively supported the Kennedy and Johnson administrations' social welfare programs. The senator continued his personal battles for tax reform and truth-in-lending legislation. In 1966, he lost his Senate seat to Republican Charles Percy. Douglas died in Washington, D.C., on September 24, 1976.

Douglas, William O(rville)

(1898–1980) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

The longest tenured justice in the history of the Supreme Court, William O. Douglas was born in Maine Township, Minn., on October 16, 1898. He grew up in Yakima, Wash., and worked his way through Whitman College. After his graduation in 1920, he taught school for two years. He then worked his way through Columbia Law School, graduating second in his class in 1925. He worked briefly for a major Wall Street law firm and then taught at Columbia and Yale law schools, where he developed a reputation for his studies of bankruptcy. Named to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in January 1936, he became its chairman in 1937. On the SEC, Douglas pushed the reorganization of stock exchanges and instituted various reforms to protect investors. President Franklin Roosevelt appointed Douglas to the Supreme Court in March 1939. The Senate confirmed his nomination the following month.

In his earliest years on the Court, Douglas joined a majority of his colleagues in sanctioning the expansion of the power of the federal government over the economy and in sustaining various regulatory measures of the New Deal. A recognized expert in financial and corporate law, Douglas wrote many influential Court opinions in these areas. Yet, Douglas became best known as an ardent defender of individual liberties, whose commitment to personal freedoms grew over the years.

During World War II, Douglas's most significant decisions involved the regulation of business and bankruptcy law. At the same time, the war presented difficult issues for the Court, particularly for Douglas and his close ally, HUGO BLACK. For example, Black and Douglas struggled to balance the competing values of protection of civil liberties on the one hand and support for the wartime activities of the government and the president who appointed them on the other. Both justices supported compulsory flag-salute laws in Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940). Two years later, however, in a case involving the validity of municipal license fees on transient merchants, including Jehovah's Witnesses, Black and Douglas, joined by Frank Murphy, took the extraordinary step of publicly repenting their vote in Gobitis. They then enthusiastically joined the majority in reversing the Gobitis decision in West Virginia v. Barnette (1943).

After the war, Black and Douglas consistently upheld civil liberties, particularly free speech. Douglas, who had earlier held that government could restrict free speech in certain circumstances, concluded that, under the First Amendment, government could regulate actions but could not prohibit any form of expression. In Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), Douglas wrote for the Court, reversing the conviction of a fascist, defrocked ex-priest whose words provoked a hostile crowd. Black and Douglas entered vigorous dissents in Dennis v. U.S. (1951), in which the majority upheld the convictions under the Smith Act of leaders of the American Communist Party for conspiring to teach and advocate the overthrow of the government. In Yates v. U.S. (1957), the Court reversed the convictions of a second group of Communist leaders. The majority found that the lower court's instructions to the jury failed to distinguish between advocacy of forcible overthrow of the government as an abstract doctrine and advocating action toward that end. Douglas and Black dissented in part; they would have struck down the Smith Act as a violation of the First Amendment.

With respect to obscenity, Douglas dissented when the majority upheld the conviction of Samuel Roth for mailing obscene materials (Roth v. U.S., 1957). Writing for the majority, WILLIAM BRENNAN held that obscenity was not protected by the First Amendment and that banning obscene material was a "proper exercise of the postal power." Douglas filed a vigorous dissent, in which Black joined. He wrote that the standard established by the majority inflicted punishment "for thoughts provoked, not for overt acts or antisocial conduct" and therefore violated the First Amendment. Speech and writing, he argued might be suppressed only when they amounted to conduct or were "so closely brigaded with illegal action as to be an inescapable part of it."

Though he gave a special place to First Amendment rights, Justice Douglas was solicitous of other guarantees of individual rights. He generally interpreted the criminal procedure guarantees in the Bill of Rights broadly to the benefit of the individual. Throughout the 1950s, he favored extending the right to counsel to all. In Ullman v. U.S. (1956), the Justice dissented when the Court upheld a federal law under which the government could force a witness to testify in security cases by granting him immunity from prosecution. Douglas asserted that the Fifth Amendment made it unconstitutional for Congress to compel anyone to confess to a crime, even with a grant of immunity. Douglas also strongly supported the right of equal protection under the law, and he unhesitatingly voted with his colleagues in May 1954 to hold that racial segregation violated the Fourteenth Amendment.

Often a controversial figure, Douglas became a center of conflict in June 1953, when he granted a stay of execution to convicted atomic spies JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG. The month before, the Court had refused for the third time to review the Rosenbergs' conviction. Nevertheless, Douglas granted the stay when new legal arguments were presented on their behalf. Chief Justice FRED VINSON then called the Court into special session. After hearing arguments, the Court vacated Douglas's stay. Rep. William M. Wheeler (D-Ga.) introduced a resolution to impeach Douglas for his action, but the House Judiciary Committee killed the resolution.

In the 1960s, the majority of the Court came to adopt many of Douglas's positions on the rights of the criminally accused. Perhaps his greatest impact on the law came in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), when he wrote for the majority in a decision striking down Connecticut's anti-contraceptive law on the ground that it violated a right of privacy he found in the "emanations" and "penumbras" of the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments. From the mid-1960s, however, Douglas's opinions came under increasing attack from legal scholars for their tendentiousness and for their lack of legal craftsmanship. In addition, his personal life generated controversy. In the early 1950s, he divorced his wife of 29 years; subsequently, he remarried three times. Douglas also began to travel widely and to explore the outdoors. He also wrote books intended for popular consumption about his various expeditions. These books won him a reputation as an outdoorsman and conservationist.

His controversial private life, his absolutist positions on legal matters, and the lack of care that marked his opinions, even on matters about which he cared deeply, resulted in a move, led by the House Minority Leader, GERALD FORD (R-Mich.), to impeach the justice in 1970. A subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee rejected the charges. The experience, however, did little to moderate Douglas's positions or subdue his combative personality.

Douglas suffered a debilitating stroke in December 1974. He missed much of the Supreme Court's term, and though he returned the following term, his capacities were substantially and clearly diminished. He resigned in November 1975, after serving longer than any justice in history. Douglas remained in Washington, D.C., where he died on January 19, 1980.

While legal analysts unanimously conceded Douglas's brilliance, critics attacked his absolutist approach, his results-oriented jurisprudence, and the absence of formal legal analysis in his opinions. As a result of these traits and his abrasive personality, Douglas left an insubstantial intellectual legacy. Black, Douglas's close ally for many of his years on the Court, was the greater theoretician and legal craftsman. Indeed, Black developed most of the legal theories with which Douglas was associated. Supporters pointed to Douglas's mercurial intellect and his eloquent advocacy for the less powerful. He could be particularly eloquent in his defense of free speech. The fact remains, however, that his impact on jurisprudence was considerably less than that of his contemporaries such as FELIX FRANKFURTER, Black, and Brennan.

Dowling, Walter C(ecil)

(1905–1977) ambassador to South Korea, ambassador to West Germany

Walter Dowling was born in Atkinson, Ga., on August 4, 1905. Following his graduation from Mercer University in 1925, Dowling worked as a bank clerk. He joined the Foreign Service in 1932, and, over the next 12 years, served as vice consul in Oslo, Lisbon, Rome, and Rio de Janeiro. In 1945, he was transferred to the office of the U.S. representative to the Advisory Council for Italy. The following year, Dowling was assigned to the State Department's division of South European affairs and by 1947 was its associate director. In 1949, he was appointed counselor of legation in Vienna. Three years later, Dowling became deputy U.S. high commissioner for Austria; in 1953, he represented the secretary of state in negotiations for an Austrian peace treaty. Dowling was appointed deputy U.S. high commissioner for Germany in July 1953, and in 1955 became minister-counselor of the American embassy at Bonn.

Eisenhower appointed Dowling ambassador to South Korea in May 1955. Six months later, the United States and South Korea signed a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation designed to further development of economic relations between the two countries. Relations between the United States and Korea became strained at the end of the decade because of repressive measures pushed through the South Korean parliament. In January 1959, Dowling was recalled to Washington to protest the tactics used in the passage of the Korean National Security Act, one of two measures abolishing local elections and suppressing opposition newspapers passed in December 1958 after specially hired guards had forcibly removed members of the opposition party from Parliament.

In February 1959, the State Department ordered Dowling to return to Seoul to mediate a dispute between South Korea and Japan. Japan's plan to return thousands of Koreans living in that country to Communist North Korea incensed South Korean President Syngman Rhee, who threatened to use military force to prevent the move. Dowling helped bring the two nations to the conference table. As a result, although thousands of Koreans were repatriated to North Korea, the condition of those remaining in Japan improved considerably, as did the relations between South Korea and Japan.

After a stint as assistant secretary of state for European affairs during the fall of 1959, Dowling became ambassador to West Germany. In November 1958, Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev had announced that the Soviet Union had decided "to renounce the remnants of the occupation regime in Berlin." He demanded that the three Western powers, the United States, France, and Great Britain, withdraw 10,000 men from their occupation zones, declare Berlin a demilitarized free city, and negotiate directly with East Germany on access to the city. He threatened that if the Western allies did not comply within six months, the USSR would give the East German government control of Western military supply routes to the city. The United States refused Khrushchev's demand that Berlin be made a "free city," opposed recognition of East Germany, and announced that, as one of the Allied occupation powers, it would maintain its access rights to all sectors of Berlin.

Immediately after assuming office, Dowling traveled to West Berlin to reassure the people there of continued American support. He reiterated the U.S. stand more dramatically in September 1960, when he forced East German border police to back down in their attempt to bar him from the Soviet sector of Berlin because he was not accredited to the East German government.

Dowling retired from the Foreign Service in 1963 because of poor health. In 1969, he became a visiting professor of political science at Mercer University and served there until his death in Savannah, Ga., on July 1, 1977.

Drucker, Peter F(erdinand) (1909–2005) author

The son of a lawyer and university professor, Peter Drucker was born in Vienna, Austria, on November 19, 1909. After receiving a doctorate in law from the University of Frankfurt in 1931, he taught international law and constitutional history at that university while writing on finance and foreign affairs for the city's daily newspaper. Soon after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933, Drucker left Germany for England and took a job with a bank in London. In 1937, he moved to the United States, where he made his living over the next 40 years as an author, teacher, and consultant to business enterprises. He taught first at Sarah Lawrence College from 1942 to 1948 and then at Bennington College. In 1950, he became professor of management at New York University.

In 1939, Drucker published The End of Economic Man, a critique of totalitarianism and a forecast of what it portended for the future of mankind. He offered a dismal vision in which no hope lay in either capitalism or socialism because they failed to satisfy man's need for noneconomic fulfillment. Fascism was a fraud, Drucker asserted, but it had succeeded because it gave individuals status and the illusion that their actions had heroic significance.

In The Future of Industrial Man (1942), Drucker continued to argue that individuals must be given status and purpose if a free industrial society were to survive. In his analysis, this could only be accomplished within an institution. To Drucker, the essential institution for America's future would be the corporation, which he considered the representative social phenomenon of the era. He applauded corporate managers for their commitment to objective analysis in the pursuit of profits. Indeed, Drucker likened a capitalist to a "good artist or scientist." This led him to conclude, "There has never been a more efficient, a more honest, a more capable and conscientious group of rulers than the professional managers of the great American corporations today."

Drucker gave a more detailed picture of modern business enterprise in The Concept of the Corporation (1946), which he undertook as a study of the General Motors Corp. (GM). Drucker held that workers should have no role in the management of the corporation; their sense of status and function might be enhanced by greater participation in activities peripheral to their jobs, such as community services, but not in the making of company policy. At the same time, he advocated fostering a sense of community among workers. Drucker regarded workers as a resource rather than a cost, and advocated creating a safety net for them. Drucker praised bigness as conducive to efficiency and social stability. He generally approved of GM's famous decentralized organization but placed emphasis on the exercise of leadership by top management and the generation of esprit de corps.

By the 1950s, Drucker's books, his prolific magazine writing, and his successful consulting ventures had established him as an important theorist of corporate capitalism and a seminal contributor to the study of management. His celebration of the corporation fused with the decade's dominant strain of thought. Drucker, however, warned against placing a premium on conformity, which could turn the corporate structure into an ossified bureaucracy. He maintained that a good manager understood the need for risk-taking.

Drucker frequently decried the growth of government into a "swollen monstrosity," and called the proliferation of new agencies a cancer on the political system. During the 1960s and 1970s, he maintained his steady output of articles and books, including The Effective Executive (1967), The Age of Discontinuity: Guidelines to Our Changing Society

(1969), and The Unseen Revolution: How Pension Fund Socialism Came to America (1976). In his characteristic fashion, Drucker mixed philosophic speculation on business, government, and society with practical analysis of managerial problems.

In 1971, Drucker became Clarke Professor of Social Sciences at Claremont Graduate School. He continued to publish a stream of books and popular articles. Of his more than 30 books, 13 concerned economics, politics, and society; 15 were about management. He published a volume of memoirs, Adventures of a Bystander, in 1979. Recent works included Management Challenges for the 21st Century (1999) and Managing the Next Society (2002). Many regarded him as the seminal thinker and writer on organizations and management.

Drucker was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2002. He died in Claremont, Calif., on November 11, 2005, a few days short of his 96th birthday.

Dryden, Hugh L(atimer)

(1898–1965) director, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics; deputy administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration

The son of a streetcar conductor, Dryden was born in Pocomoke City, Md., on July 2, 1898. He grew up in Baltimore and attended the city's public schools. He received his B.A. from Johns Hopkins in 1916 and his Ph.D. there three years later. He then took a job as the director of the aeronautics section of the National Bureau of Standards, where he had conducted research as a student. During the 1920s, Dryden made a significant scientific breakthrough by using wind tunnels to determine what the flow around airplane wings would be at speeds approaching and beyond the speed of sound. This work, together with studies of wind turbulence carried out in the 1930s, made him one of the key figures behind the revolutionary strides in aircraft design during the 1930s and 1940s. During World War II, Dryden headed a project that developed the first self-guided missile used in combat. He was appointed associate director of the Bureau of Standards in 1946 but resigned the following year to join the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (NACA), an agency geared toward civilian research in aviation design. Dryden became director of the agency in 1949.

As director, Dryden was often called upon to justify research projects before congressional committees. In April 1953, he appeared before a House Appropriations subcommittee to explain projects intended to link a nuclear reactor to a comparatively conventional jet engine. Two years later, after it became known that the Soviet Union was working on an atomic-powered airplane, Dryden went before a Senate Armed Services subcommittee to request funds to expand NACA's facilities for the same research.

In response to the Soviet Union's successful launching of Sputnik, the first artificial satellite, in October 1957 and to the Gaither Report, warning of increasing Soviet advances in military-technology and scientific knowledge, Eisenhower called for the creation of a national space and aeronautics agency in April 1958. This Agency, which would absorb the functions of NACA, was designed to direct U.S. activities relating to all nonmilitary aspects of outer space. Dryden played a major role in drafting the legislation and presenting the proposal to Congress. The measure was signed into law in July.

Dryden, himself, had a conservative vision of the goals of the new National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). He reported that its initial project would be the orbiting of a stargazing satellite and urged the development of satellites that could be used either for communications purposes or for the scientific investigation of the Moon. When questioned about the feasibility of sending men into space, Dryden dismissed the idea as a circus stunt. Because of his limited view of the agency's goals, he did not oppose NASA's modest budget.

Upon the creation of NASA, Dryden was appointed deputy administrator of the agency. He was initially shaken by his failure to receive the top post, but this disappointment waned when he learned that his position would permit him to concentrate on the technical aspects of space research. Despite his initial caution, Dryden came to express his full confidence that the United States could quickly develop a program of manned space exploration. Pointing to the complexity of the factors involved, he suggested that the best way to meet the goal lay in international cooperation.

Dryden continued at his post during the Kennedy administration and the early years of the Johnson presidency. He died in Washington, D.C., on December 2, 1965.

Dubinsky, David

(1892–1982) president, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union

David Dubinsky was born on February 22, 1892, in Brest Litovsk, Poland (later the Soviet Union). His family moved to Łódź, Poland, when he was very young. In order to work in his father's bakery, Dubinsky had to join the city's semi-legal bakers' union. At the age of 15, he led a strike against the bakers, including his father. Arrested as a labor agitator, he was exiled to Siberia, but he managed to escape en route and emigrated to the United States in 1911. In New York, Dubinsky learned the cloak-cutting trade, joined the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU), and was active in the Socialist Party. In 1922, he became a member of the union's executive board. Dubinsky tightly controlled his cutters' local and waged a successful 10-year battle against communists in the union. He became acting president in 1927 and was elected president in 1932. He became a vice president of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in 1935.

In 1935, Dubinsky joined JOHN L. LEWIS and other advocates of industrial unions to form the Committee (later Congress) for Industrial Organization (CIO). Dubinsky vigorously backed the CIO's organizing drives among workers in mass-production industries but opposed its permanent formation as an alternative to the more conservative, craft-union-oriented AFL. For a short time, Dubinsky pulled his union out of the AFL in protest against its treatment of the CIO, but he rejoined it in 1940.

An enthusiastic supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal, Dubinsky joined Sidney Hillman and ALEX ROSE in forming the American Labor Party (ALP) to support the New Deal nationally while remaining outside the Democratic Party, which they thought dominated by urban bosses and southern conservatives. Because of growing communist strength in the ALP, Dubinsky, Hillman, and Rose left in 1944 to found New York State's Liberal Party. Dubinsky helped form Americans for Democratic Action three years later. By the onset of the cold war, he had repudiated his socialist past. Starting with HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1948, Dubinsky and the Liberal Party supported every Democratic candidate for president.

Dubinsky also played a major role in the AFL's international activities, helping to organize the International Federation of Trade Unions. Following World War II, the ILGWU spent $3 million abroad, much of it in Israel and Italy, where Dubinsky helped facilitate the merger of Catholic and socialist trade unions into one federation.

By the 1950s, the ILGWU's welfare programs were among the most extensive of any union in the country. The union had established its own health centers, radio stations, a major cooperative housing project on New York City's Lower East Side, and extensive recreational facilities. Dubinsky continued to expand the benefits throughout the decade. Following a strike in 1958, the union obtained severance pay for those workers whose companies closed down or moved out of New York. This was of crucial importance, because many small clothing manufacturers were fleeing the Northeast to the South, which was hostile to unions. Dubinsky also persuaded the employers to sew the famous "union label" into their garments. Both union and management hoped that labeling would persuade Americans to buy union-made garments. Their objective was to fight cheap imports and, just as importantly, hurt many of the nonunionized shops protected from ILGWU organizers through alliances with organized crime. The strike settlement in 1958 included provisions to equalize wages for workers outside the Northeast.

Dubinsky's leadership often earned the praise of his opponents at the bargaining table. ILGWU special teams cooperated with industry to encourage efficiency, and many employers acknowledged that the benefits Dubinsky won for his workers made them into a stable, contented workforce. Stability of employment became common in the 1950s for many ILGWU members for the first time. When negotiating, Dubinsky often took into consideration the financial status of an industry plagued with price-cutting competition from imports and nonunion shops in the South. Finally, many employers admired Dubinsky's campaign against labor racketeers.

In the 1920s and 1930s, Dubinsky waged a battle to purge his union of corrupt officials, who were often tied to organized crime. Although he was never completely successful in his campaign, by the late 1930s, the ILGWU had purged most criminal elements from its ranks. Dubinsky also sought to press the AFL, and after 1955 the AFL-CIO, to deal more forcefully with the criminal elements in member unions. In 1952, he successfully initiated the AFL's expulsion of the racketeer-infested International Longshoremen's Association. Dubinsky sat on the AFL-CIO's Committee on Ethical Practices that expelled the Teamsters Union in December 1957. That year, the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field heard testimony that Dubinsky had cooperated with criminals to aid his union's past organizational drives. Dubinsky denied the accusations.

In the 1960s, Dubinsky remained active in Liberal Party politics and aided John V. Lindsay's mayoral campaigns in 1965 and 1969. Dubinsky retired as president of the ILGWU in 1966. He died in New York City on September 17, 1982.

Dulles, Allen W(elsh)

(1893–1969) director of Central Intelligence

Allen Dulles was born in Watertown, N.Y., on April 7, 1893. The Dulles family had a background in diplomatic service. Allen's grandfather John W. Foster served as Benjamin Harrison's secretary of state. His uncle Robert Lansing held the same post in the Wilson administration; another uncle, John Walsh, had been minister to England. Dulles's father, however, was a Presbyterian minister who imbued his sons with a strong belief in the conflict of good and evil. Dulles attended private schools in upstate New York and Paris and then earned B.A. and M.A. degrees at Princeton University.

Beginning in 1916, Dulles served in a number of posts in the diplomatic service, including an assignment with the U.S. delegation to the Versailles Peace Conference of 1918–19. From 1922 to 1926, he served as the chief of the State Department's division of Near Eastern affairs. After receiving his LL.B. from George Washington University in 1926, he resigned from government work and joined his brother, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, at the law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell. He became a partner in the firm four years later. Allen Dulles observed with horror the rise of Hitler. In 1938, he ran an unsuccessful campaign for Congress in which he urged the need for America to face up to the Nazis.

With the outbreak of World War II, Dulles returned to government service as director of the Office of Strategic Services. He supervised espionage activities against Germany and played an important role in the surrender of German troops in Italy in 1945. After the war, he helped draft the National Security Act of 1947, which established the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), and in 1948 he headed a three-man committee that studied the intelligence functions of the organization. In 1951, Dulles left his law practice to become the deputy director of the CIA, in charge of covert operations.

In 1953, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Dulles director of Central Intelligence, a position that gave him power not only to run the CIA but also to oversee all U.S. intelligence activities. Dulles's personal style quickly became the public's image of the CIA and its formal standard of behavior. Pipe-smoking, urbane, and educated in the Ivy League, like many early CIA officials, Dulles was able to impress upon his listeners in public and government circles the need for absolute secrecy in CIA operations. During his tenure, there was little outside oversight of his agency, largely because of his close relationship with Eisenhower and powerful congressional leaders who shared his views on secrecy.

During the Eisenhower administration, the CIA and State Department worked harmoniously because of the closeness of Allen Dulles and his brother, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. The two men shared the view that the cold war was a moral crusade against communism. Both used their belief in the necessity for democracy to triumph over totalitarianism to justify their policies.

Under Dulles, the CIA helped overthrow several left-wing governments and establish regimes that supported the United States. The CIA's first major success occurred in Iran in 1953, when operatives, directed by Kermit Roosevelt, helped topple the leftist government of Prime Minister Mohammad Mossadeq.

Two years later, Dulles helped plot the overthrow of Guatemalan President Jacobo Arbenz, whose leftist government had roused the ire of the American administration. In June, a small army of exiled Guatemalans, trained and financed by the CIA, crossed the Honduras-Guatemala border to overthrow Arbenz. Three old airplanes, supplied by the CIA, provided the army with necessary air cover. When the invasion faltered, Dulles convinced Eisenhower to send two additional American planes to the small, crippled air force. As a result of the attack, Guatemalan army officials deserted Arbenz, and he was forced to capitulate. With CIA guidance, negotiations brought the rightist Col. Carlos Castillo-Armas into power. Castillo-Armas was assassinated in 1957.

In Iran and Guatemala, the CIA supported disaffected local groups. The agency also backed anticommunist regimes with little popular support. In South Vietnam, for example, the agency helped President Ngo Dinh Diem solidify his hold on the central government despite opposition from military and sect leaders.

During Dulles's tenure, intelligence-gathering operations were expanded and new technological means of surveillance, such as the U-2 and SR-71 spy planes, were developed. Emphasis was put on the use of technology rather than traditional operatives to collect data.

In 1975, the Senate Select Committee to Study Intelligence Activities (the Church committee) reported that, during Dulles's tenure, the CIA formulated a complicated system of responsibility for departmental actions. By issuing vague but suggestive instructions to subordinates, highly placed officials under examination could legitimately claim "plausible denial" of culpability in covert operations. The committee, therefore, had difficulty in determining Dulles's role in some of the CIA's more controversial projects. It found evidence that he authorized the assassination of Congolese leader

Patrice Lumumba and said he may have received suggestive, if not direct, encouragement for such action from President Eisenhower. Dulles sent the following message to the CIA station in Léopoldville in 1960: "We wish every possible support in eliminating Lumumba from any possibility of resuming a governmental position." CIA operatives, headed by RICHARD BISSELL, interpreted the cable as authorization to arrange Lumumba's death. Local Congolese, however, killed Lumumba before the CIA operation could materialize. In addition, the Select Committee revealed that Dulles and Eisenhower had urged the overthrow of Rafael Trujillo, the rightist dictator of the Dominican Republic.

Investigations by the Church committee and by the Rockefeller committee on CIA activities within the United States revealed that, during the Dulles years, some U.S. businesses, small foundations, and organizations were used as fronts for CIA activities. From 1952 to 1973, beginning with Dulles's approval of a "New York mail program," CIA officials intercepted, screened, opened, and sometimes photocopied millions of mailed items from selected countries, primarily those under communist control. Presumably with the tacit approval of three postmasters general, the agency monitored the correspondence of those on their "watch list," which included such individuals as Victor Reuther and LINUS PAULING.

A former CIA agent, Victor Marchetti, and an ex-State Department official, John D. Marks, claimed in their book The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence that in 1959 Dulles had revised the content of a CIA intelligence report describing Cuban premier Fidel Castro's rise to power as a natural development in the face of the excesses of the Batista regime and had sent Eisenhower a much darker analysis predicting that Castro would use extreme measures to solidify his power. In March 1960, the president authorized Dulles to initiate a series of measures designed to liberate the island from communist rule. Dulles, in turn, gave Bissell responsibility for handling the operation.

Bissell embellished upon the relatively cautious program Eisenhower endorsed on March 17. Bissell devised a plan to use exiles, trained at CIA bases in Guatemala, to infiltrate the island and overthrow the regime. When that proved unfeasible, he developed a plan to invade the island. Bissell also enlisted the aid of organized crime figures in an unsuccessful effort to assassinate Castro. The Senate Select Committee reported that "it is not entirely certain that Dulles was ever made aware of the true nature of the underworld plot."

After the election of 1960, Dulles and Bissell briefed President-elect JOHN F. KENNEDY on Cuba. Bissell informed the president-elect that the CIA was considering a "significant strike force to act as a catalyst" in provoking an uprising against Castro. In fact, the original program did not include a "significant strike force" and reckoned that it would be necessary to develop anti-Castro resistance within Cuba before contemplating any paramilitary infiltrations from the outside. Nevertheless, as planning got under way, Bissell increasingly turned his attention to the development of a strike force. As the CIA plans became more ambitious, neither Bissell nor Dulles had apprised Eisenhower of these developments. Kennedy approved the landing, and the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion took place in April 1961. After the fiasco, Kennedy moved quickly to replace Dulles, who resigned in September 1961 and returned to his law practice. Dulles served on the Warren Commission, which investigated the Kennedy assassination. He died in Washington on January 29, 1969.

Dulles, John Foster

(1888–1959) secretary of state

Born on February 25, 1888, in Washington, D.C., Dulles was descended from a family of diplomats and clergymen. His maternal grandfather, John W. Foster, served as ambassador to Russia, Spain, and Mexico and was secretary of state under Benjamin Harrison. His uncle, Robert Lansing, was secretary of state in the Wilson administration. Dulles's paternal grandfather, John Welch Dulles, was a Presbyterian missionary in China. His father, Allen Dulles, taught philosophy at Auburn Theological Seminary and was a Presbyterian minister in Watertown, N.Y., where Foster grew up.

Dulles graduated from Princeton University in 1908 and spent a year studying at the Sorbonne. Although he had expressed an interest in entering the ministry, he decided to become a lawyer. He completed the three-year curriculum at George Washington University's law school in two years while earning the highest grades ever achieved at that school. Upon finishing law school in 1911, he joined the prestigious New York law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell. Dulles served as a special agent for the State Department in Central America in 1917. During World War I, he worked with the army intelligence service and was an assistant to the chairman of the War Trade Board.

Dulles went to the Versailles Peace Conference in 1919 as legal counsel to Bernard Baruch, the U.S. representative on the Reparations Commission. In that capacity, Dulles earned high praise for his role in convincing the British and French to lower their demands for reparations.

Upon Dulles's return from Paris, he became a partner in Sullivan & Cromwell. An austere man and a compulsive worker, Dulles established a distinguished record as a specialist in international law. After Germany defaulted on its reparations payments and France occupied the Ruhr Valley, Dulles served as special counsel to the Dawes Commission (after its chairman, Charles Dawes). Dulles became managing partner of Sullivan & Cromwell in 1927. Under his leadership, the firm opened offices in Berlin and Buenos Aires and expanded its office in Paris. For the next two decades, it would be the largest law firm in the world.

Throughout the 1930s, Dulles lectured and wrote on foreign affairs. Moreover, his firm had extensive dealings in Europe and particularly in Germany. Dulles attended a meeting of the World Council of Churches at Oxford in 1937. He came away from the conference impressed with the sincerity of the participants and the effectiveness of the World Council as a platform. Personally, Dulles deplored the excesses of the Nazis but maintained that it was up to Germans to deal with the matter. Further, he believed that the injustices of the Versailles treaty had led to Hitler's rise and the international friction of the late 1930s. He presented his views in War, Peace and Change, published in early 1939. Devoid of the moral tone that would later typify his work, the book was a systematic, legalistic inquiry into the reasons nations go to war. Dulles ascribed the troubled situation in Europe to the failure of the Treaty of Versailles. By insisting on the maintenance of the status quo, the victorious Allies had forced Germany to take violent action to achieve needed change. Dulles saw the threat to peace coming from the system of nation-states advancing their self-interest and suggested that war could be avoided through the creation of "international mechanisms" (which he did not clearly define) to manage change.

Throughout the late 1930s, Dulles remained a noninterventionist. He was deeply disturbed by the outbreak of war in Europe and believed the United States could avoid entering the struggle by developing a moral solution to the crisis. In 1940, he assumed the chairmanship of the Federal Council of Churches' Commission on a Just and Durable Peace. Dulles's major goal was to create a more effective successor to the League of Nations. In May 1943, he set down an abstract plan for preventing war in a report titled "The Six Pillars of Peace." In contrast to his early works, it contained a strong moral theme. Dulles believed that peace could be achieved only when nations acted in conjunction with moral law. The United States had a particular moral obligation in guiding the postwar world and in forming the international organization that would maintain peace.

During the war, Dulles emerged as a leading spokesman on foreign policy for the eastern wing of the Republican party. In 1944, he served as a foreign policy adviser to the Republican presidential candidate, Governor THOMAS DEWEY of New York. A supporter of a bipartisan foreign policy, Dulles also undertook several diplomatic assignments for the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. In 1945, he was a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN Conference in San Francisco. From 1946 to 1950, he was a delegate to the UN General Assembly and an adviser to the State Department. Dulles served as Dewey's adviser during the presidential campaign in 1948 and backed the candidate's decision not to mount an aggressive attack on Truman's foreign policy. During the immediate postwar period, Dulles endorsed the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty, as well as the president's conduct of the Korean war.

In the last half of the decade, Dulles's assessment of the world situation changed. No longer did he see peace threatened by the system of nation-states and the selfishness of all countries. Instead, it was jeopardized by the evil intentions and ideologies of specific states, particularly the Soviet Union. In an article in Life magazine in 1946, he warned that the Soviet Union would continue its expansionist policy. Dulles called for military measures to meet the threat, but more importantly, he preached a need for a spiritual rebirth and a recommitment to American institutions to counter the threat. Despite his hatred of communism, he urged a more conciliatory attitude toward the USSR, believing it might lift the Iron Curtain and permit the entrance of beneficent Western influence.

In 1949, Dewey appointed Dulles to fill a vacancy in the Senate created by the resignation of Robert Wagner. Dulles lost to HERBERT H. LEHMAN in a special election that fall to serve the remainder of the term. Dulles became a consultant for the State Department and in 1950–51 negotiated the U.S.-Japanese peace treaty. This agreement restored Japan's sovereignty and allowed U.S. bases to remain in that nation. Dulles was always proud of the treaty. He regarded it as "creative and curative," not harsh and vindictive, like the Treaty of Versailles.

During the early 1950s, Dulles, by then the Republican Party's most prominent foreign-policy figure, became increasingly critical of the Truman administration's foreign policy.

Dulles outlined his new position in a Life article in 1952. He contended that Truman's policy of containment had been only partly successful in preventing communist expansion and had failed to roll back the communist sphere of influence in Eastern Europe and China. Containment offered the American people only the status quo. Instead, Dulles suggested a policy of liberation for nations of the Eastern bloc. Dulles opposed Truman's reliance on conventional weapons, maintaining it would bankrupt the nation. He recommended that the United States rely on nuclear weapons when necessary. In his words, the primary way of countering communist aggression was "for the free world to develop the will and organize the means to retaliate instantly against open aggression by Red Armies, so that, if it occurred anywhere, we could and would strike back, where it hurt, by means of our own choosing."

Dulles's ideas impressed both moderate and conservative Republicans. In 1952, he was asked to draft the foreign policy plank in the Republican platform. There he condemned containment as "negative, futile and immoral" because it abandoned "countless human beings to despotic and godless terror." The party pledged the liberation of Eastern Europe. Dulles campaigned vigorously for the Eisenhower ticket but was rarely seen with the general or asked for his advice. Eisenhower had reservations about and was reluctant to associate himself too closely with Dulles's policy of liberation.

The press widely assumed that Dulles would be chosen as Eisenhower's secretary of state and, in fact, Eisenhower never seriously considered anyone else. He named Dulles secretary of state in late November.

Relations between the men were initially formal. The aloof Dulles had difficulty dealing with the president. Eisenhower, in turn, found his secretary of state dull, verbose, and legalistic in his discussions. Yet the two men developed a close relationship. Eisenhower spoke to Dulles daily.

Over the decade, the two men molded foreign policy. Contrary to some earlier accounts, Dulles did not dominate Eisenhower. The president was clearly in charge and made policy decisions. Nonetheless, Eisenhower had a high regard for Dulles and his opinions. Eisenhower once told EMMET HUGHES, "There's only one man I know who has seen more of the world and talked with more people and knows more than he does—and that's me." In general, Eisenhower and Dulles agreed on the basic outlines of foreign policy. Dulles sometimes took a harder line with respect to the Soviet Union or specific foreign policy conflicts. Moreover, Dulles had a penchant for encapsulating his ideas into catchy phrases ("massive retaliation," "agonizing reappraisals") that created controversy. At times, this caused Eisenhower some irritation. At other times, Eisenhower used Dulles as the bad cop while he came on as the reasonable good cop in international relations.

Dulles considered himself primarily the president's personal foreign policy adviser, and he jealously guarded his position within the White House. He objected to independent foreign policy initiatives by such advisers as HAROLD STASSEN in the field of disarmament and NELSON ROCKEFELLER in the field of Latin American relations. Each of these men resigned, in part, because the secretary frustrated their plans.

Because he thought of himself as an adviser, Dulles spent less time on the administration of the State Department. However, he did not, as some critics charged, attempt to run the state department out of his briefcase.

Dulles entered office well aware of the need for good relations with Congress. During his early life he had seen Woodrow Wilson's dream of American participation in the League of Nations destroyed by his inability to deal with Congress. After World War II, he saw DEAN ACHESON hampered by the same failure. Dulles was particularly concerned with maintaining good relations with the powerful Republican Right, led by such senators as WILLIAM JENNER, (R-Ind.), STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.), and JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.).

Soon after becoming secretary of state, he attempted to placate McCarthy, who had charged that the State Department harbored subversives. Dulles instituted strict security reviews under the direction of SCOTT McLEOD, a McCarthy supporter. Over the next few years, investigations resulted in the dismissal or forced resignation of several hundred State Department employees as security risks or because of drunkenness, homosexuality, incompetence, or "incompatibility." The last reason was used for those whose policy judgments displeased the Republican Right.

Those removed included JOHN P. DAVIES and JOHN CARTER VINCENT, China experts under attack as pro-Communist because they opposed all-out aid to Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) during the 1940s. Reviewing their files, Dulles found no security violations. Nevertheless, he refused to support these men and asked for their resignations on the grounds of lack of judgment, discretion, and reliability.

Dulles did, however, support the nomination of CHARLES E. BOHLEN to be ambassador to the USSR. Right-wing Republicans accused the diplomat of being a security risk and attacked him because of his role in the formation of the Yalta agreements. The Senate confirmed Bohlen's appointment, but while the Senate considered the nomination, Dulles insisted that he not be seen too frequently in Bohlen's company.

Dulles entered his office with the desire to implement a policy of boldness and action. No longer would the United States simply react to communist challenge; it would take the offensive against the adversary. Although he had no long-range plans to implement this idea, his policy initially dealt with four considerations: ending the Korean war without changing the status quo in the rest of Asia; developing anticommunist alliances in the Middle East; unifying western Europe; and maintaining the cold war against the Soviets.

Shortly after the inauguration, Dulles and Eisenhower took steps to end the Korean War. They intensified the pressure on China to accept a compromise agreement. In his State of the Union message, Eisenhower announced he would remove the Seventh Fleet from the Formosa Straits, thus "unleashing" Chiang Kai-shek for a possible attack on the mainland. The administration also revealed plans to increase U.S. air power in Korea, enlarge the South Korean Army, and place nuclear weapons on Okinawa. At the same time, Dulles firmly pushed South Korea into accepting an armistice by refusing to give in to President Syngman Rhee's demands for resumption of the war if Korean unification was not achieved within three months of an armistice. The agreement was signed on July 27, 1953.

In the Mideast, Dulles attempted to forestall communist expansion through the establishment of pro-Western governments and the formation of a military alliance similar to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The leftist government of Iranian Premier Mohammed Mossadeq was overthrown in August 1953 with the help of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). A pro-Western regime loyal to the Shah took its place. In attempting to form alliances, the secretary was frustrated by growing nationalism in Arab nations, particularly Egypt. Reacting to years of British colonial rule, Egyptian leader Gamal Abdel Nasser refused to accept membership in any mutual defense organization giving Great Britain or any other colonial power the right to return to Egypt if strategic interests were threatened. Nasser did not perceive the communist threat as serious and attempted to maintain a policy of neutrality to prevent domination by either the Western or Soviet bloc. In 1954, the British succeeded in forming the Baghdad Pact, a military alliance with Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Pakistan. Dulles, however, was reluctant to recognize the alliance, because he did not want to be associated with colonial powers. Fearing that American membership would antagonize Arab leaders, he sent an "observer" rather than an ambassador to the new organization.

As secretary of state, Dulles was particularly concerned with American policy in western Europe, which he thought would be the major battlefield of the cold war. Throughout his tenure, he attempted to promote European unification, maintaining that Europe, "the world's worst fire hazard," could not be rebuilt on the old system of nation-states. The secretary supported moves toward economic unification, including the formation of the European Iron and Steel Community, and he wanted them complemented by steps toward military unification. By the time Dulles came into office, an agreement on the formation of the European Defense Community (EDC), establishing an inter-European army, had already been initialed by the entities concerned: France, Germany, and the Benelux countries. However, popular opposition to the plan, particularly in France, which feared German rearmament, endangered ratification. During the early months of 1953, Dulles flew to various European capitals in an attempt to increase support for the EDC. Intent upon gaining acceptance, he suggested that a defeat of the proposal would result in "an agonizing reappraisal" of American commitments in Europe. However, his efforts failed. The proposal died in August 1954, when the French Assembly refused to consider the plan.

Dulles was particularly upset by the defeat because he believed it necessary to integrate West Germany into the mainstream of European politics as quickly as possible lest the nation make an accommodation with the Soviet bloc. Dulles's strident stand during the debate over the EDC, however, angered America's allies, and the secretary was forced to leave the negotiation of the German issue to the British. Over the next few months, Foreign Minister Anthony Eden laid the groundwork for the introduction of Germany into NATO while placing constraints on German rearmament to please the French. Dulles supported the plan, approved at a foreign minister's conference convened in London in September.

Although critics derided him as an unwavering and reflexive cold warrior, documents declassified over the last two decades have revealed that Dulles was more complex and flexible than his image as a Presbyterian crusader in the cold war. He was open to the possibility of genuine negotiations with the Soviets and recognized the process of change in the post-Stalin era. Dulles believed that, after Stalin's death, communist rulers in Eastern Europe would "experience far greater difficulty . . . in subordinating the impulse of nationalism" and urged American embassies "to sow doubt, confusion, uncertainty about [the] new regime." At the same time, he counseled caution. An overly exuberant response on the part of the West, he warned, could channel Russian nationalism into sympathy for the new leadership. When a series of anticommunist riots broke out in East Germany, Dulles made a point of explicitly and publicly stating that fomenting internal difficulties in the Soviet sphere did "not mean" encouraging "an armed revolt which would precipitate a massacre." Nevertheless, Dulles seems to have been more suspicious of a series of peace overtures by the post-Stalinist leadership than was Eisenhower. When Eisenhower determined to respond publicly to the gesture, Dulles recommended that the speech contain a list of "deeds," including political self-determination for Eastern Europe, to test the sincerity of the Russian proposals. These were included in the president's statement, which suggested the possibility of accommodation.

Along the same lines, Dulles had serious reservations about the summit conference with the Soviet leaders in 1955. He believed that the meeting would accomplish nothing and worried that it would antagonize the Republican right. The secretary urged that the United States require the USSR to begin withdrawal from Eastern Europe before serious talks began. Eisenhower, however, rejected his secretary's advice and accepted an invitation to meet with the Soviet leaders in July. Although Dulles had advised him to wear an "austere countenance" when photographed with Premier Nikolai Bulganin, the president conducted himself in a warm, friendly manner. The conference resolved none of the issues dividing the nations—Germany and disarmament—but the fact that the leaders of the two superpowers had discussed differences gave hope of improved chances for peace and led to the "Spirit of Geneva," the first thaw in the cold war.

Dulles, however, had a pessimistic assessment of the meeting. He remained convinced that the Soviet Union had called the summit to gain strategic respite. The secretary believed that the Soviets had overextended themselves in the arms race and were hence forced toward conciliation with the West. He conceded that the new Soviet policy "might assume the force of an irreversible trend" and that it should be encouraged. However, he refused to accept the situation in Europe and warned that Russian actions did not justify "the free world relaxing its vigilance or substantially altering its programs for collective security."

Although Dulles and his defenders hailed his policies as a departure from those of the Truman administration, they were in essence continuations of containment. The major innovation was the introduction of the "New Look" defense policy, with its reliance on strategic deterrence or "massive retaliation" as it became known. Fashioned chiefly by Adm. ARTHUR RADFORD, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the New Look was based on a desire to hold down defense costs and prevent debilitating ground wars such as those in Korea. It called for a greater reliance on the strategic air force and a reduction in conventional forces. Although its origins could be traced to Dulles's article, "The Policy of Boldness," which appeared in Life in 1952, the secretary had very little to do with the actual formulation. In military matters, he was content to rely on the Pentagon. Yet the secretary was given the task of explaining the New Look to the American people. In a speech before the Council on Foreign Relations in January 1954, Dulles told the audience that the use of conventional forces had traditionally given the enemy the initiative. The secretary promised that the United States could "depend upon a great capacity to retaliate instantly by means and at places of our own choosing."

Foreign policy observers had difficulty trying to understand what Dulles meant by this ambiguous statement. Many thought the secretary promised nuclear war for any Soviet infraction of the status quo. Dulles attempted to clarify the use of the term, but his several attempts at explanation confused the issue further. WALTER LIPPMANN, wrote that "official explanations of the New Look have become so voluminous that it is almost a career to keep up with them." That concept, with its ambiguity, played an important role in the development of Dulles's foreign policy. The secretary saw the threat of deterrence as a potent diplomatic weapon to brandish before the communists.

The New Look was tested twice during 1954: in Vietnam and in the Formosa Straits. During the spring of 1954, the French asked for direct American intervention in Vietnam to relieve their garrison at Dien Bien Phu, then under attack by the communist Vietminh. The French confided to Dulles their desire to reach a settlement in the Indochina war and told him they would restrict military operations to achieve that goal. The secretary opposed the French decision, believing it would further the expansion of communism in Southeast Asia. He also rejected Radford's call for bombing raids to relieve the fort, because the proposal was too narrow in scope.

Nevertheless, Eisenhower and Dulles believed that something should be done, and they began to formulate a response between March 24 and April 1. They considered a coalition of the United States, Great Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, the Philippines, and the Associated States of Indochina that would commit itself to defend Indochina and the rest of Southeast Asia against communism. Eisenhower and Dulles agreed that, if the United States were to intervene, it should do so only as part of a multinational coalition. Further, if the United States did intervene, they wanted, in keeping with the New Look, local and regional forces to do most of the ground fighting. The United States would provide air and naval support, train local forces, and furnish money and supplies. In a speech on March 29, Dulles publicly presented the concept, but did so in deliberately vague terms. "The United States," he said, "feels that the possibility of communist control should not be passively accepted, but should be met with united action."

Over the next month, Dulles attempted to generate congressional and allied support for his plan. Eisenhower and Dulles understood that if they did nothing and Indochina fell to the communists, they would be vulnerable to attack both from right-wing Republicans and Democrats. Further, in the aftermath of Korea, intervention without congressional authorization was not politically feasible. Contrary to what Chalmers Roberts and others have argued, Eisenhower and Dulles did not seek congressional authority for an immediate air strike to relieve the French garrison at Dien Bien Phu. Rather, they sought a congressional resolution that would give the president broad discretionary authority to use American power to prevent the "extension and expansion" of communism in Southeast Asia. Congressional leaders, however, wanted assurances that America's allies would participate and the United States would not have to bear most of the burden. They also wanted France to agree to grant the Indochinese independence. These conditions did not differ in any significant way from what Eisenhower and Dulles had in mind, but they did take unilateral action off the table. Since the French showed no inclination to meet Eisenhower's conditions that any force be multinational and that the French promise independence to the Indochinese, it was highly improbable that Eisenhower would have intervened on behalf of the French. The position of the congressional leaders, however, provided a convenient excuse. Moreover, the British did not agree that the fall of Indochina threatened the rest of Southeast Asia.

Dulles opposed sending a delegation to the Geneva Conference on Indochina in April 1954. Eisenhower, however, wanted an American presence and sent WALTER BEDELL SMITH as an observer but not a participant. Dulles spent a week at the conference, during which he refused to acknowledge the Communist Chinese delegation.

On July 20, the Geneva Conference reached an agreement on Vietnam. Under the Geneva Accords, as the agreement was known, Vietnam was temporarily divided along the 17th parallel, with the communists, led by Ho Chi Minh, controlling the north and a pro-Western government in the south. Neither North nor South Vietnam would enter into military alliances. The nation was to be reunified through free elections scheduled for 1956. The United States took note of the agreements and announced that it would "refrain from the . . . use of force" to upset them, but it did not sign the Geneva Accords. In a statement after the agreement had been reached, Smith announced that the United States "would view any renewal of the aggression in violation of the aforesaid agreements with grave concern and as seriously threatening international peace and security.”

Over the next few months, Dulles worked to prevent communist expansion in Vietnam. In September, eight nations (the United States, Great Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Thailand, and the Philippines) formed the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization and pledged to resist communist aggression in the area. That fall, Dulles announced that the United States would give both economic and military aid to the government of South Vietnam. The United States backed the government of Prime Minister Ngo Dinh Diem and sent economic aid and military advisers, such as EDWARD LANSDALE, to help Diem solidify his position. The American government also supported Diem when he ousted the emperor, Bao Dai. In a shift from the New Look, the secretary began backing reliance on “local defense” to counter communist aggression. When, in 1955, the North Vietnamese proposed preliminary talks to plan the national elections called for by the Geneva Accords, Diem refused, and the Eisenhower administration, convinced that Ho would win such an election, backed Diem’s position.

During the fall of 1954, Communist Chinese artillery began shelling the islands of Quemoy and Matsu located off the mainland coast and held by the Nationalist Chinese. Members of the administration differed on how to interpret the action. Dulles believed it was a possible prelude for an invasion of Taiwan; but several military leaders questioned the Communists’ military capacity to stage such an action. The secretary joined Radford and most of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (except Gen. MATTHEW RIDGWAY) in proposing that Eisenhower permit Chiang to bomb the mainland. If Beijing retaliated, they suggested the United States send bombers to help the Nationalists. Eisenhower, however, rejected the proposal, preferring to work out a diplomatic solution to the crisis. Eisenhower did order airlifts to Taiwan and the Seventh Fleet to escort Nationalist supply ships. He also sent Dulles to negotiate a mutual security treaty between Nationalist China and the United States. The treaty declared that an armed attack against either nation would be regarded as an act of war against the other.

At Eisenhower’s insistence, the treaty applied only to Taiwan and the Pescadores, thus omitting Quemoy and Matsu. The treaty also provided that the Nationalists would not unilaterally use force against the mainland.

In early 1955, the Chinese Communist air force raided the Tachen islands, held by the Nationalist Chinese. The Chinese Communists also captured an island near the Tachens and gave indications of preparing to invade Quemoy and Matsu. In late January, Eisenhower and Dulles met to discuss a congressional resolution granting the president authority to use American forces to defend Taiwan and the Pescadores. Dulles wanted to include Quemoy and Matsu, but Eisenhower overruled him. Congress passed the resolution by the end of the month. On April 23, at the conference of nonaligned nations in Bandung, Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai) gave a conciliatory speech, and Eisenhower responded. Subsequently, the mainland Chinese reduced their shelling of the islands and by mid-May stopped it entirely. The crisis passed.

With the presidential campaign approaching in 1956, Dulles defended his conduct of foreign policy in an interview with Life magazine. He maintained that only unwavering opposition to the Soviet Union could avoid both war and surrender to communism. Dulles pointed to three occasions on which such a posture prevented both further Soviet aggression and war: the implied threat of the use of nuclear weapons to end the Korean War, a show of force that deterred the Chinese from entering the war in Indochina, and the firm stand the administration had taken on Quemoy and Matsu. “You have to take chances for peace,” Dulles told Life, “just as you must take chances in war. Some say we were brought to the verge of war. The ability to get to the verge without getting into war is the necessary art. If you cannot master it, you inevitably get into war. If you try to run away from it, if you are scared to go to the brink, you are lost. . . . We walked to the brink and we looked it in the face. We took strong action.” Critics pointed out that threats to use nuclear weapons over limited objectives had little force, because other nations knew that the United States would not be the first to resort to nuclear weapons in such instances.

The consequences of decolonization after World War II ranked among the most persistent and serious issues Dulles and Eisenhower faced. Between 1946 and 1960, 37 new nations emerged from colonial status in the Middle East, Asia, and Africa. Many of these nations chose to remain at least ostensibly neutral in the cold war. In April 1955, 29 "nonaligned" states met at the Bandung Conference and declared their support for "neutrality" and for the Soviet call for "peaceful coexistence." Dulles regarded neutralism as "immoral and shortsighted."

Above all, the United States wanted to make sure that the transition from colonialism to independence did not result in either an increase in communist influence or, worse still, communist control. The Middle East provided the most difficult test for this policy. In Egypt, Gamal Abdel Nasser and a group of young army officers overthrew King Farouk in 1952. Nasser pledged to regain control of the Suez Canal from Great Britain. Under pressure from the United States, the British agreed in 1954 to a phased withdrawal of their troops from the Suez Canal Zone. To maintain Western influence, the United States supported a military alliance of Great Britain, Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Pakistan, known as the Baghdad Pact. Egypt, however, refused to join, and the bitter conflict between Arabs and Israelis made any hopes for peace in the region unlikely.

Egypt had requested American arms, which the United States refused to supply while British soldiers remained in the Suez Canal Zone. The Egyptian requests for arms were complicated by repeated incidents along the Israeli-Egyptian frontier, particularly at the armistice line along the Gaza Strip. A series of Arab raids and Israeli retaliations increased tensions in the fall of 1954. Several more substantial attacks by Egyptians in early 1955 led to a brigade-strength reprisal raid by Israelis against the Egyptian headquarters in Gaza at the end of February. Nasser used the occasion to renew his request for arms from the United States. When the United States offered arms but with conditions attached, Nasser turned to the Soviets, who arranged for Czechoslovakia to supply a massive shipment of arms to Egypt. In the meantime, the United States attempted to broker a peace agreement. The adversaries, however, did not cooperate. In response to repeated Egyptian raids, Israel launched a significant attack in September, and Nasser responded by tightening his blockade of the Straits of Tiran. Israel decided on the need for a preventive war before the full effect of the Soviet arms could be brought to bear.

Dulles and Eisenhower attempted to win Nasser's loyalty by offering to provide funding for Nasser's dream of a dam on the Nile at Aswan. British intelligence, however, informed the Eisenhower administration that Nasser was urging the overthrow of pro-Western monarchies in Saudi Arabia, Iraq, and Jordan. Moreover, in May 1956, Nasser recognized Communist China. Domestically, the dam drew opposition from Zionists and Jewish Americans as well as southern members of Congress, who resisted a project that would increase competition for American cotton. Further, Eisenhower and Dulles worried that the arms deal with Czechoslovakia meant that Egypt had aligned with the Soviets. Thus, on July 19, 1956, Dulles informed the Egyptian ambassador that the United States would not fund the Aswan Dam. Nasser responded by seizing the Suez Canal and announced that he would use future proceeds to pay for the dam.

The seizure of the canal threatened British and French interests in the Middle East. The British and French depended on the Canal for shipment of most of their oil, and they began making plans to regain control of the waterway militarily. Eisenhower and Dulles urged a negotiated settlement. Dulles proposed an association of canal users to collect tolls and give to Egypt what it determined was a fair share of the revenues. The proposal angered both Egypt and the European nations. The British and French particularly resented the fact that they had not been consulted in advance.

Impatient with U.S. leadership, the British and French made common cause with the Israelis and decided to settle the matter militarily. In late October 1956, the Israeli army invaded the Sinai, while British and French forces seized the canal. Furious that the United States had not been consulted, worried that the military action would draw attention away from the Soviet invasion of Hungary, and concerned that the action might bring the Soviets into the Middle East, Eisenhower exerted pressure on the British, French, and Israelis to withdraw their forces. The United States joined with the Soviet Union at the UN to pass a resolution calling for the withdrawal of invading forces. Faced with the opposition of world opinion and the two superpowers, Britain, France, and Israel withdrew their forces. The Suez Crisis strained U.S. relations with the British; although the differences were soon composed. The crisis also created frictions with the French, which less easily and less quickly abated. Disagreements over Suez, however, did not seriously disrupt NATO.

Concerned about the expansion of Soviet influence in the Middle East, in January 1957 Eisenhower asked Congress for a joint resolution granting the president authority to send troops to the area if a pro-Western government required assistance against communist aggression. Congress quickly passed the resolution, which became known as the "Eisenhower Doctrine." When, in the aftermath of a military coup that overthrew the Hashemite monarchy in Iraq, the pro-Western Lebanese government feared a revolt in 1958, it requested American assistance, and Eisenhower sent American troops in a show of support for the government of President Camille Chamoun. American diplomats negotiated the withdrawal of American and British forces and a compromise between factions in Lebanon.

The night the UN voted to call for a cease-fire in the Suez Crisis, Dulles experienced severe abdominal pains and went to the hospital. He was diagnosed with cancer. In spite of Dulles's failing health during the second Eisenhower administration, he continued to exert a powerful influence on American policy. Responding to some sentiment in Congress and elsewhere in favor of reaching an accord with mainland China, Dulles gave a speech in June 1957 restating the U.S. policy of nonrecognition. In the meantime, after the Quemoy and Matsu crisis of 1955, Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) had reinforced his garrisons on the two islands. In 1958, Communist China once again began heavy shelling of the islands. Dulles favored an unequivocal statement of America's willingness to defend the islands, but Eisenhower rejected the idea of such a statement. With Eisenhower's approval, however, Dulles held a press conference in which his remarks would be attributable only to a "high official." In it, he declared an unequivocal determination to defend the islands. America's allies counseled caution, and a growing segment of the American public also expressed concern over the possibility of war over the islands. Eisenhower resisted military advice to employ "low yield" nuclear weapons. Rather, he ordered the Seventh Fleet to escort Nationalist supply ships and an airlift of supplies to Taiwan. Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev sent a letter warning against any contemplated use of nuclear weapons and reminding Eisenhower that "the other side too has atomic and hydrogen weapons." Offended by the intemperate tone of the letter, Eisenhower had it returned to the Soviet embassy. Nevertheless, in a press conference at the end of September, Dulles, while maintaining that he had no intention to modify American policy, stated that the United States had no legal commitment to defend Quemoy and Matsu. He further remarked that the heavy concentration of forces on the islands was "rather foolish." In late October, after some frank discussions, Dulles and Chiang agreed that the Nationalist leader would refrain from the use of force against the mainland and withdraw some troops from the islands. Eisenhower suspended escorts of Nationalist ships, and the Chinese Communists relaxed the bombardment. Once again, war over the islands was avoided.

The last major foreign policy crisis in which Dulles was involved came when Khrushchev issued an ultimatum in November 1958. Unless talks on the final disposition of Germany began within six weeks, the Soviets would sign a peace treaty with East Germany, thus ending the agreements reached at the end of World War II. The Western allies would then have to negotiate access to West Berlin with East Germany. In early December, Dulles had to be hospitalized for his cancer. Although quite ill, he attended the NATO meeting of the council in mid-December. Dulles regarded Khrushchev's action as reckless and urged the Western nations not to negotiate under duress. However, he believed that a show of resolve could avoid war. At the end of March, the Soviet premier agreed to a conference of foreign ministers in May and withdrew his ultimatum.

His failing health forced Dulles to resign on April 15. He died in his sleep on May 24, 1959, in Washington, D.C.

Durkin, Martin P(atricks)(1894–1955) secretary of labor

Born on March 18, 1894, in Chicago, Durkin worked for four years as an apprentice steam fitter before becoming a journeyman plumber in Chicago Local 597 of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the U.S. and Canada (UA). He served in the army during World War I. In 1922, Durkin became business manager of the largest local of the plumbers' union, Local 597, and in 1927 was made vice president of the Chicago Building Trades Council.

Appointed Illinois state director of labor in 1933 by Democratic Gov. Henry Horner, Durkin served in that post until 1941. As director, he streamlined his department and gained recognition as an administrator. He successfully pushed through legislation that established unemployment compensation and a state employment service, developed new safety rules for employees, and regulated minimum wages and maximum hours for women and children. Durkin went to Washington in 1941 as secretary-treasurer of the national office of the UA. In 1943, he succeeded GEORGE MEANY as its president.

Eisenhower announced Durkin's appointment as secretary of labor in December 1952. The new Republican administration was acutely aware that, during the campaign, organized labor had called for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and that demands for repeal, or at least revision, of the law would not end with the election. When he considered filling the post of secretary of labor, Eisenhower told LUCIUS CLAY and HERBERT BROWNELL that he wanted someone "from the ranks of labor itself." After considering a number of possibilities, Brownell and Clay accepted HAROLD STASSEN's recommendation of Durkin.

The nomination prompted an angry response from some Republicans. Durkin was a Democrat and had actively worked for the campaign of ADLAI E. STEVENSON. Sen. ROBERT TAFT called the nomination "incomprehensible," "incredible," and "an affront to millions of union members who had the courage to deny the edict of officers like Mr. Durkin that they vote for Stevenson." Republicans were not alone in their dismay over the nomination. African Americans protested the elevation of the leader of one of the most racist unions to the cabinet. Eisenhower described the nomination as an "experiment"; his chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, described it as "an experiment doomed from the start to failure." The New Republic described the cabinet as "eight millionaires and one plumber."

Durkin and his views found little sympathy in the administration. The secretary's primary goal was to revise the Taft-Hartley Act, opposed by labor because of its restrictions on unions. Eisenhower himself, while rejecting total repeal of the measure, had supported amending the legislation to eliminate those provisions that could be used to "smash unions." However, in the White House, Eisenhower did not back Durkin when he clashed with other departments.

Durkin initially set up a committee of representatives of the public, business, and labor to study ways of revising the Taft-Hartley Act. However, quarrels led him to recess the panel. He blamed the representatives of employers for the committee's inability to function.

The secretary's problems with revising the statute soon narrowed to a clash between the Labor Department and the Commerce Department, headed by SINCLAIR WEEKS. Durkin wanted to drop the act's requirement that union leaders sign noncommunist affidavits and to abolish "right-to-work" laws. He also wanted to give labor more control over membership and liberalize the ability to engage in secondary boycotts. Most important, he wanted to minimize the jurisdiction of state courts in labor disputes. Weeks, on the other hand, refused to concede anything above what Eisenhower had vaguely promised and wished to emphasize the power of states in disputes.

Because the two executive departments could not come to an agreement, presidential assistants BERNARD SHANLEY and GERALD MORGAN drew up a memorandum suggesting a position for the administration; most of its 19 points were concessions to Durkin. Their memorandum eventually became the basis for a draft message the president was to make to Congress. It was to have been forwarded to the legislature on July 31. However, Taft died that day, and because Taft had coauthored the original legislation, the White House thought that it would be tactless to submit the amendments. Shanley and Morgan, however, assured Durkin that the amendments would be publicly released shortly.

In the meantime, Weeks and others maneuvered behind the scenes to kill the message. Vice President RICHARD NIXON told Eisenhower that repealing the right-to-work provisions would alienate business leaders and southerners. On Aug. 3, the Wall Street Journal ran an exposé on the message under the headline "They Favor the Union." In response to the leak, the White House staff released a statement emphasizing that the text was only an early draft.

Durkin and Eisenhower had lunch on August 19. Durkin recalled that Eisenhower had promised to support the 19 amendments. According to Eisenhower's account, he urged Durkin not to think of himself as "a special pleader for labor" and to take a broader view of his responsibilities. On September 10, the president made it clear to Durkin that he would not support the amendments. Durkin resigned and publicly charged that Eisenhower had reneged on his promise to support the amendments. Durkin's eight months in office was the shortest tenure of any secretary of labor. At a press conference later that week, Eisenhower angrily denied having ever agreed to support the amendments.

Durkin returned to the presidency of the UA. He died in Washington, D.C., on Nov. 13, 1955, after operations for a brain tumor.

Dworshak, Henry C(larence)

(1894–1962) U.S. congressman and senator

Henry Dworshak was born on August 29, 1894, in Duluth, Minn. He served in the army during World War I, after which he became manager of a printer supply business. In 1929, he began publishing a newspaper in Idaho. Dworshak won election as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1938 and in 1946 was elected to complete a Senate term expiring in January 1949. He lost his bid for a full term in 1948, but after the Democrat who defeated him died in October 1949, Dworshak was appointed to fill the seat. The following year, he was elected to complete the final four years of the term.

Dworshak was one of the most conservative Republicans in Congress. In 1953, he joined 11 other Republicans voting against the confirmation of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union. They maintained that Bohlen was associated with President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy, which they alleged was "soft on communism."

Dworshak was a strong supporter of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). In April 1954, McCarthy, with the consent of the Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chose Dworshak to replace him as chairman during the Army-McCarthy hearings. Dworshak generally favored McCarthy during the probe. In late May, he introduced a motion that had the effect of removing FRANCIS CARR, the subcommittee's staff director, as a witness. Carr was one of McCarthy's staff members accused by the army of attempting to secure special favors for Pvt. G. DAVID SCHINE, a former consultant to the subcommittee. Despite the pleas of the army's counsel, JOSEPH L. WELCH, who wanted to question Carr, Dworshak's motion passed on a straight party vote. The following December, Dworshak voted against the Senate's condemnation of McCarthy.

An advocate of a balanced budget, Dworshak pressed for cuts in Post Office and Public Housing Administration appropriations in 1953. He favored defense budget reductions in 1954 and 1957. Dworshak also criticized the foreign-aid program. In 1957, the senator declared that "goodwill and friendship cannot be bought by American dollars alone."

In 1956, Dworshak opposed a bill, sponsored by Sen. WAYNE MORSE (D-Oreg.), authorizing federal construction of the Hells Canyon Dam. Nevertheless, the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee reported out the measure. Dworshak signed the panel's minority report, which stated that private erection of the dam was in the national interest and that there was no need to insist on a federal project when private construction could achieve similar benefits. The bill reported out of committee was defeated on the Senate floor, and the project was privately built.

Dworshak was a staunch opponent of President Kennedy's domestic policies. The Idaho senator died of a heart attack in Washington, D.C., on July 23, 1962.

Eastland, James O(liver)

(1904–1986) U.S. senator; chairman, Judiciary Committee

The son of a well-to-do and influential district attorney, James Eastland was born in Doddsville, Miss., on November 28, 1904. He attended the University of Mississippi, Vanderbilt University, and the University of Alabama. After gaining admission to the Mississippi bar in 1927, he began a career as a lawyer. Eastland served as a Democrat in the Mississippi House of Representatives from 1928 to 1932. He then retired from politics and, beginning in 1934, practiced law and managed his family's cotton plantation in Ruleville.

Upon the death of Sen. Byron Patton Harrison in 1941, Gov. Paul B. Johnson appointed Eastland the vacant seat. He declined to run in the special election, but Eastland won a full term in 1942 and subsequently won reelection five times. An unswerving opponent of measures aimed at eliminating racial discrimination, Eastland denounced an anti-poll tax measure in 1944 and charged that "the driving force behind this bill is a bunch of communists." Four years later, he backed the states' rights presidential candidacy of Gov. STROM THURMOND.

Eastland devoted a major share of his activity in the Senate to defending Mississippi's cotton interests. During the 1940s, he introduced bills to ban the import of foreign cotton and to withhold government cotton from the domestic market. During the 1950s, as a member of the Agriculture and Forestry Committee, Eastland attempted to protect the cotton planters of the Deep South against competition from new growers in the Southwest. In 1953, Congress was considering reductions in acreage allotments to reduce cotton surpluses. Planters in California and Arizona requested special protection for new cotton growers in the form of an acreage reduction ceiling of 25 percent for their states. Eastland played a key role in working out a compromise, passed in January 1954, that gave California and Arizona bonus acreage but apportioned basic allotments among the states according to past production figures.

Even while supporting subsidies for cotton farmers in Mississippi, Eastland consistently opposed social welfare legislation. He also supported a strongly anticommunist foreign policy and the crusade against communist subversion at home. Although he did not publicly support Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and voted for the censure of the junior senator from Wisconsin in December 1954, he, too, was convinced of the need to ferret out communist subversion. After becoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee's Internal Security Subcommittee in 1955, Eastland began an investigation of communist infiltration of the news media. Eastland maintained that the press had to be free from control of the Communist Party or "any other conspiracy against the government of the United States." He also believed that communists influenced labor unions, civil rights groups, liberal political organizations, and the Supreme Court.

Eastland criticized the Supreme Court's ruling in Cole v. Young (1956), which restricted the application of the Internal Security Act of 1950 to employees in sensitive agencies. In response to that decision, he introduced a bill to apply the act to all federal jobs. The measure failed to win approval.

Eastland denounced the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision of 1954 as "an illegal, immoral, and sinful doctrine" and warned that the decision would lead to the "mongrelization of the white race." Further, he questioned whether people were "obligated morally or legally to obey a decision whose authorities rest not on law but upon the writings and teachings of pro-communist agitators." In 1955, he played a major role in the formation of the Federation for Constitutional Government, a short-lived attempt to unite the white Citizens' Councils and other local white-supremacist groups. He was a frequent and popular speaker before those organizations.

After becoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee in March 1956, Eastland posed a formidable obstacle to the passage of civil rights bills, which fell within the jurisdiction of that panel. In 1957, the administration's civil rights measure passed only after the Senate, in June, voted to bypass the committee and place the measure on the chamber's calendar. Throughout 1959, Eastland delayed another civil rights bill in committee. Liberals pressed Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and Minority Leader EVERETT M. DIRKSEN (R-Ill.) to bring the measure to the floor, and the leaders announced in September that they would act early the following year to bring the legislation up for debate. In 1960, Johnson and Dirksen bypassed Eastland's Judiciary Committee to get the bill to the floor of the Senate. Southern senators filibustered, and an attempt to invoke cloture failed. Eventually, the Southerners abandoned their filibuster. Passed by Congress in April and signed by the president on May 6, the Civil Rights Act of 1960 provided for court-appointed referees to supervise voting procedures and imposed more stringent penalties for obstructing voting rights. That same year, Eastland bottled up an anti-poll tax amendment to the Constitution.

Disturbed by Supreme Court rulings in civil rights, internal security, and other areas, Eastland joined southerners and anticommunists who sought to restrict the Court's power. In 1956, he introduced a constitutional amendment providing that "there shall be no limitation upon the power of any state to regulate health, morals, education, marriage, and good order in the state." The Senate took no action on the proposal. Eastland claimed the communist influence on the Court was extensive, and in 1958, he asserted that Justices HUGO BLACK, WILLIAM DOUGLAS, and FELIX FRANKFURTER had taken a "pro-communist" position in the great majority of cases involving subversive activities. In 1959, after the Court overturned New York State's ban on exhibiting the movie L'Amant de Lady Chatterley (Lady Chatterley's Lover), Eastland offered a constitutional amendment barring infringement upon the right of a state "to decide on the basis of its own public policy questions of decency [and] morality." The Senate took no action on this proposed amendment, either.

Although not well known outside of Washington and Mississippi, Eastland wielded considerable power. He opposed most of the social welfare programs of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, including an increase in the minimum wage, federal aid to education, Medicare, and Head Start. Most notably, Eastland used his chairmanship of the Senate Judiciary Committee to block civil rights legislation. It took deft parliamentary maneuvering to extricate the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 from his grip. He delayed for almost a year the confirmation of THURGOOD MARSHALL, a black lawyer who led the NAACP's legal fight against segregation, to a seat on the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "The Chairman," as Eastland was known, also used his power to gain appointments to federal judgeships for conservative Southerners, particularly during the Kennedy administration.

Eastland declined to support Lyndon Johnson in the election of 1964, although he supported Johnson's policy on the war in Vietnam. After choosing not to stand for reelection in 1978, he returned to Doddsville, and lived in Mississippi until the end of his life. He died in Greenwood, Miss., on February 19, 1986.

Eastman, Max F(orrester)(1883–1969) journalist, writer

The son of two Congregational ministers, Max Eastman was born in Canandaigua, N.Y., on January 4, 1883. After graduating from Williams College in 1905, he did graduate work in philosophy under John Dewey at Columbia University. After completing all the requirements for a Ph.D., he did not file his dissertation. Through his sister, Crystal, he became associated with the pre–World War I bohemian Left in Greenwich Village. In 1912, he accepted an offer to become editor of the Masses, a failing monthly magazine. Eastman turned it into a brilliant and influential journal of Leftist politics and radical approaches to art. Eastman, along with other contributors to the Masses, opposed American entry into World War I and expressed those views in the magazine. Consequently, Eastman and six others were indicted for conspiring to obstruct military recruiting and other offenses under the Sedition Act. They escaped conviction thanks to two hung juries. Nevertheless, the revocation of its second-class mailing privilege effectively killed the Masses in 1917.

Eastman enthusiastically supported the Bolshevik seizure of power in October 1917, and in 1918, he and Crystal founded the pro-Bolshevik magazine, the Liberator. An admirer of Lenin, Eastman went to the Soviet Union in 1922, where he married the sister of a prominent official. In the power struggle that followed Lenin's death in 1924, Eastman supported Trotsky. Joseph Stalin became increasingly powerful, and Eastman left the Soviet Union later that year for western Europe, where he published extracts from what came to be known as Lenin's last "Testament," which warned against Stalin. In 1925, he published Since Lenin Died, an account of the methods the Stalinist faction had used to grab power. Eastman was devastated when Trotsky joined communist newspapers in Europe and the United States in denouncing the book.

After returning to the United States in 1927, Eastman supported himself by giving public lectures. He translated Trotsky's works into English and was influential in founding the first Trotskyist party in the United States; however, his position puzzled and angered some of his compatriots. Marx and Lenin: The Science of Revolution (1926) combined his attack on the corruption of Bolshevism under Stalin with probing questions about Marxism as an intellectual system. At the same time, however, it supported the communist revolution. His opposition to Stalin alienated Eastman from the majority of American leftists. The publication in 1934 of Artists in Uniform, an expose of Stalin's literary purges (conducted in the United States through John Reed Clubs), provoked the wrath of leftist publications in the United States. Eastman's disillusion with what he regarded as the unscientific Marxism practiced in the Soviet Union led him ultimately to reject Marxism itself. Two books published in 1940 elucidated his new position. Marxism: Is It Science? explained how he had been misled on that question and why he no longer believed in socialism. Stalin's Russia offered the most accurate and cogent indictment in English of Stalin's rule and the purges of the 1930s. Eastman moved to the Right and in 1941 began a long career as roving editor for Reader's Digest.

Although his political views gained more notoriety, he believed—and other critics concurred—that his major contribution came in literary studies. His Enjoyment of Poetry (1913) was long used as a standard college text. Edmund Wilson praised The Literary Mind: Its Place in an Age of Science (1931) for its incisive analysis of "the larger relations of art and science to one another, and of both to the society behind them." Eastman also published five volumes of his own verse.

By the 1950s, Eastman had emerged as a vociferous voice on the Right. Although concerned about internal subversion, he did not succumb to the idea that every reversal in foreign policy resulted from communist influence in Washington. He regarded Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) as clumsy, intemperate, and embarrassing to the Right, calling him "a misbehaved and sloppy-minded person functioning in a place where the prime demand was for a well-behaved and extremely accurate and exact mind." Eastman considered McCarthy incapable of doing "a necessary job in a mature and thoughtful way." Eastman, however, concluded that McCarthy's enemies were still more dangerous, because they refused to recognize the desperate nature of the West's struggle with communism. Further, they were compromised by their own past flirtations with the Left. Eastman said that he would gladly suffer McCarthyism's assaults on civil liberties in exchange for removing communists from the government.

Eastman reserved his greatest contempt for liberalism. He believed that liberalism, with its support of a growing welfare state and a declining free marketplace, might well destroy Western democracy before communism could. He advocated laissez-faire capitalism and decentralization of government.

In 1955, Eastman published Reflections on the Failure of Socialism, in which he analyzed what he believed were fallacies of Marxist and socialist thinking. First, he rejected socialism as naively utopian. Further, he regarded liberalism as equally dangerous. In an argument based on the writings of conservative European economists like F. A. HAYEK and Ludwig von Mises, Eastman contended that any planned economy led to the destruction of the free market, from which other liberties were derived. Nevertheless, Eastman tolerated a "mixed economy" so long as consumers and workers retained substantial control over the market.

Reflections on the Failure of Socialism won a wide audience among conservatives. In 1955, Eastman accepted the invitation of WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR., to join the National Review as a member of the board of directors and a contributor. He continued to attack communism, but his avowedly nonreligious perspective isolated him from many other conservatives on the staff. Throughout his life, Eastman, an atheist, deeply distrusted organized religion and its potential for "ecclesiastical authoritarianism." He earlier had split with communism because he regarded it as a religion, and now he disagreed with conservatives such as WHITTAKER CHAMBERS who viewed the cold war as a battle of religion versus atheism. Eastman resigned from National Review in 1958, although he contributed articles until 1964.

Eastman continued to publish books and essays throughout the 1960s. Commenting on the "young rebels" of that period in an interview with Alden Whitman of the New York Times, he said that, though they shared some of the intensity of feeling of his own Greenwich Village rebels of the 1910s and 1920s, they "had no ultimate purpose."

He described them as detached from the working class, "the bohemian wing of the bourgeoisie." Eastman was working on another book when he died in Bridgetown, Barbados, on March 25, 1969.

Eaton, Cyrus S(tephen)

(1883–1979) industrialist

Born in Pugwash Junction, Nova Scotia, Canada, on December 27, 1883, Cyrus Eaton was the son of a rural Baptist minister. He earned a divinity degree at McMaster University in 1905. Through his uncle, a Baptist minister in Cleveland, Eaton met John D. Rockefeller, Sr. Eaton became a protégé of Rockefeller and went on to found his own company, the Continental Gas and Electric Company, which emerged as a major supplier to western Canada and the upper Midwest in the United States. In 1913, Eaton became a U.S. citizen. He took up a partnership at Otis and Company, an investment house, and later consolidated his vast utilities holdings into the United Light and Power Company. He also moved into the rubber and steel industries. Eaton lost most of his personal fortune, about $100 million, in the stock market crash in 1929. He subsequently rebuilt his fortune. Eaton acquired substantial holdings in railroads, shipping, iron ore, coal, and steel; and he served on the board of directors of approximately 40 companies, including Goodyear Tire and Rubber, Youngstown Sheet and Tube, Fisher Body, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

For all his own aggressive (and sometimes litigious) business practices, he was suspicious of Wall Street's financial community and wrote articles criticizing American business practices and the failure of the capitalist system to take into account social concerns. With respect to politics, Eaton supported Franklin D. Roosevelt and HARRY S. TRUMAN.

During the 1950s, Eaton became increasingly critical of the cold war and the nuclear arms race, and his public comments on these matters often generated controversy. He opined, for example, that "the only people in the U.S. who believe that communism is a menace to the U.S. are the boys on the payroll of the FBI.” Further, he denounced Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES for “blithely court[ing] the ultimate world catastrophe of the bomb without even consulting the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee.”

Eaton believed that “we must either learn to live with the communists or resign ourselves to perish with them.” In an effort to foster intellectual exchange and growing understanding, he gathered a group of Soviet and American nuclear scientists at his cattle ranch near Pugwash in 1957. At the second “Pugwash Conference,” in 1958, the conferees urged that nations either ban nuclear tests completely or at least establish tests for radioactivity and quotas for the production of weapons. Ultimately, he held more than 40 “Pugwash Conferences” at Pugwash and other locations around the world. Eaton made a number of trips to the Soviet Union and met with top Soviet leaders. In September 1958, he met for an hour and a half with Premier Nikita Khrushchev at the Kremlin. That same year, Eaton caused a furor when he entertained János Kádár, the Hungarian leader installed by Khrushchev after the Soviets brutally suppressed the Hungarian uprising. The Soviet bloc bestowed numerous awards on Eaton, including the Lenin Peace Prize in 1960. In the United States, many condemned the Cleveland industrialist’s efforts at private diplomacy as naïve; some considered them subversive.

After Eaton had met briefly with Khrushchev in May 1960 at Paris’s Orly Airport following the collapse of the Paris summit meeting, Sen. THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.) called for prosecution of Eaton under the Logan Act. The measure, passed in 1799, barred private citizens from dealing with foreign governments on U.S. policy matters. However, no action was taken on Dodd’s demand.

Eaton continued to manage his investments and to serve on many boards through the 1960s and 1970s. He also attempted to establish economic ties with the Soviet bloc and was an early opponent of the war in Vietnam. When he died at Acadia Farms, his 850-acre holding at Northfield, Ohio, on May 10, 1979, his fortune was estimated at over $1 billion.

Eaton, Frederick M(cCurdy)

(1905–1984) chairman, U.S. delegation, 10-nation Committee on Disarmament

Born in Akron, Ohio, on May 21, 1905, Frederick Eaton received a B.A. from Harvard University in 1927, and obtained a degree from its law school three years later. He was admitted to the New York bar in 1930 and went to work for the New York law firm of Cotton & Franklin. During World War II, Eaton was general counsel to the War Production Board and a member of the Combined Raw Materials Board and Combined Production and Resources Board. After the war, he joined the prestigious Wall Street law firm of Shearman and Sterling. He became a director of the New York Life Insurance Company and in 1954 was appointed a director of the New York City Bank Farmers Trust Company. He also served as special counsel to the secretary of the army during the Army-McCarthy hearings.

Eaton served as chairman of the U.S. delegation to the 10-nation Committee on Disarmament in 1960. When the panel first met on March 15, he served as spokesperson for the Western nations—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Canada. He presented a joint proposal for conventional and nuclear disarmament enforced by an international disarmament organization with the right of on-site inspection. Reflecting the Western nations’ most immediate concern, it called for a total prohibition of orbiting satellites carrying nuclear weapons.

Soviet delegate Valerian A. Zorin rejected the plan on the grounds that it would require a prolonged study of the technical problems of inspection and put off practical disarmament indefinitely. The Soviets opposed early inspection measures as “espionage” and preferred enforcing disarmament controls after each phase of the plan was completed. Further, Zorin refused to give priority to the satellite agreement and insisted that the United States agree to remove its military bases from Europe before discussing the issue. The Soviets, in turn, offered a plan for total disarmament within four years. Eaton denounced the plan as a “grand but hollow design” and an “unenforceable scheme.”

On April 14, in an attempt to break the deadlock, Eaton offered to terminate Western production of nuclear weapons and allow international inspection of Western atomic plants. In a dramatic move, he made public a list of U.S. atomic plants, challenging the Soviets to do the same. Eaton then proposed a joint U.S.-USSR inspection team be formed to check manpower reductions in the armed forces of the two nations. The USSR rejected the proposal.

On July 7, the Soviet Union presented still another proposal, calling for the evacuation of foreign military bases in Europe simultaneously with the demolition of nuclear delivery systems as the first stage in disarmament. Eaton rejected the plan. He claimed that, because of Russia's large conventional forces in Eastern Europe, the proposal would leave the small Western nations at the mercy of the USSR. Charging that the United States sought only "unilateral military advantages," the communist delegations withdrew from the committee on June 27, effectively ending negotiations. Eaton accused the Soviets of "torpedoing" the conference and said that their "refusal to continue the discussions is convincing proof that the present Soviet motivation is propaganda, pure propaganda."

After the disarmament conference, Eaton returned to the private practice of law. He became the senior partner of Shearman and Sterling and held that position until he retired in 1975. During the Johnson administration, Eaton headed an investigation of the intelligence community. Upon his retirement, Eaton moved to New Hampshire. He died in Dublin, N.H., on October 3, 1984.

Egan, William Allen

(1914–1984) governor of Alaska

The son of a gold miner, William Egan was born on October 8, 1914, in Valdez, Alaska. He graduated from Valdez High School in 1932 and worked at odd jobs. He was elected as a Democrat to Alaska's territorial house of representatives in 1941 and served in the army from 1943 to 1946. Upon returning from the army, he bought a grocery store in Valdez. He served in the state house of representatives from 1947 until 1952, when he won election to the territorial senate. Eaton became territorial speaker in 1955.

Egan championed Alaskan statehood throughout his career. Pointing to Alaska's lack of adequate civil government and to its exploitation by the salmon industry, he believed that these problems could be solved only by statehood. In 1941, he cosponsored the first bill to submit the issue of statehood to Alaskan voters, but it was defeated. Five years later, Egan again introduced a bill providing for a referendum on statehood. This time the bill passed, and in the referendum held that year a majority of Alaskans voted for statehood.

When a coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats defeated statehood bills in the U.S. Congress during 1950, 1954, and 1955, the territorial legislature decided to force the issue. It called a constitutional convention, which met in 1955 and 1956. As president of that body, Egan was the principal architect of the constitution, signed in February 1956 and ratified by the voters in April. The document provided for only two elected statewide officials—the governor and secretary of state. The governor appointed all department heads and judges subject to legislative or judicial council approval. The size of the legislature was increased, and it met annually.

The convention also called for the election of a state delegation of two senators and one representative to go to Washington and lobby for statehood. Egan was elected as part of the all-Democratic delegation in October. Despite Republican fears that Alaska would remain a Democratic state, Congress voted for statehood in July 1958. The following month, Alaskans approved statehood five to one.

In November 1958, Egan was elected governor, defeating his Republican opponent by a large margin. Sworn into office in January 1959, a few months after statehood was proclaimed, Egan fell ill and was unable to assume his duties until April. During the early months of his administration, he presented a budget that increased aid for education, health, and welfare. He also ended the issuance of licenses for salmon traps, which he believed reduced the salmon crop and aided corporate fishing interests.

After winning reelection in 1962, Egan lost to Walter J. Hickel in 1966. Egan won a third term in 1970 but failed in his bid for reelection in 1974. He died in Anchorage, Alaska, on May 6, 1984.

Einstein, Albert

(1879–1953) theoretical physicist

The son of nonreligious German-Jewish parents, Einstein was born in Ulm, Germany, on March 14, 1879. He moved to Switzerland as a young man and renounced his German citizenship. After graduating from the Swiss Federal Polytechnic in Zurich in 1900, he failed to obtain a teaching position and held a succession of temporary teaching jobs before finding work in 1902 as a patent office clerk in Berne. While working in the patent office, Einstein worked on problems in theoretical physics. Beginning in 1905, he published a series of papers that revolutionized modern physics. Perhaps the most famous of these dealt with his theory of special relativity, which Einstein used to conclude that matter and energy were physically equivalent, in effect interconvertible. This result, stated mathematically as $E = mc^2$, furnished an explanation for the liberation of energy in atomic explosions. The other papers dealt with Brownian motion as a final proof of the molecular nature of matter and the photoelectric effect, an important advance in quantum mechanics, which founded the photon theory of light.

Einstein received his doctorate from the University of Zurich in 1909, and taught at Zurich, Prague, and Leyden before accepting an offer to direct the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Sciences in Berlin in 1913. A Swiss citizen living in Berlin, he publicly opposed Germany's participation in World War I and supported socialism. In spite of this, he managed to avoid imprisonment.

During a solar eclipse in 1919, a British astronomer, Arthur Stanley Eddington, observed the light-bending effect predicted by Einstein. This made Einstein, already one of the world's most respected physicists, a celebrity. He received the Nobel Prize in 1921 for his work on the quantum theory. During the 1920s, Einstein became an active Zionist, traveling extensively to raise funds for Jewish settlement in Palestine. In 1933, he fled Nazi-dominated Germany and accepted a lifetime professorship at Princeton's Institute for Advanced Study.

Although World War I made him a pacifist, Einstein abandoned this position following the rise of fascism in Germany and Japan. In 1939, he signed a letter to Franklin D. Roosevelt urging the United States to develop an atomic bomb before the Germans did. His action led to the establishment of the Manhattan Project in 1942. However, Einstein did not take part in constructing the bomb. The bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945 horrified the physicist, and, during the postwar period, he became a leading voice for nuclear disarmament. As chairman of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, founded in 1946, Einstein sought to inform Americans of the realities of atomic warfare and the dangers of a nuclear arms race. He called on scientists to refrain from cooperation with the military and opposed the development of the hydrogen bomb.

Einstein was outspoken in his opposition to the anticommunist crusade of the late-1940s and early-1950s. In 1953, he urged clemency for JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG, who were convicted of espionage and later executed. Einstein also spoke out against the abuses of congressional investigating committees. In a letter made public in June 1953, he told a New York City high school teacher who had refused to testify before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee that "every intellectual who is called before one of the committees ought to refuse to testify." Einstein asserted that "it is shameful for a blameless citizen to submit to such an inquisition." His letter was cited by several witnesses who refused to testify before congressional committees later that year. In April 1954, when physicist J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER's government security clearance was suspended, Einstein publicly affirmed his confidence in his colleague.

Einstein continued to advocate disarmament until the end of his life. Early in 1955, he and Nobel Prize winner Lord Bertrand Russell, the British mathematician and philosopher, drafted an international appeal against the further development or use of atomic weapons.

Einstein died in Princeton of a ruptured aorta on April 18, 1955. The Einstein-Russell statement, signed by six other Nobel Prize winners, was sent to various heads of state in July.

Eisenhower, Dwight D(avid)(1890–1969) president of the United States

Born into a Mennonite family in Dennison, Texas, on October 14, 1890, David Dwight Eisenhower grew up in Abilene, Kans., where his father worked at a local creamery. To avoid confusion with his father, David Jacob Eisenhower, the boy's mother, Ida, called him Dwight; from boyhood on, however, most people called him Ike. Although intelligent and ambitious, he was an above-average student, not an outstanding one, in school. He was also a talented athlete and an intense competitor. Eisenhower won an appointment to the U.S. Military Academy through the competitive examination process and in 1911 enrolled at West Point as Dwight David Eisenhower, in deference to his mother. He graduated in the middle of his class in 1915. His class rank would have been higher but for his considerable accumulation of demerits.

Much to his disappointment, Eisenhower did not go overseas during World War I. Rather, he served as a tank instructor. During the interwar years, he served on the staffs of generals Fox Conner, Douglas MacArthur, and George C. Marshall. Under the tutelage of Conner, a respected military intellectual, Eisenhower became a serious student of military science. Recognition of his status as a rising young officer came when Eisenhower received orders first to attend Command and General Staff School, where he finished first in his class, and then the Army War College. Although his superior officers held him in high regard, promotions in the peacetime army were hard to come by. He expected to face forced retirement as a lieutenant colonel—but World War II changed that.

Soon after America's entry into the war, Marshall, then serving as chief of staff, made Eisenhower head of the War Plans Division. In May 1942, Marshall placed the recently promoted Maj. Gen. Eisenhower in command of U.S. forces in Great Britain. Eisenhower commanded the Allied invasion of North Africa in 1942. He also led the Allied invasions of Sicily and Italy in 1943. Eisenhower's rank rose with his responsibilities. He was promoted to lieutenant general before assuming command of the North African invasion and to four-star general before the invasion of Sicily. In December 1943, President Franklin D. Roosevelt named Eisenhower supreme commander of the Allied Expeditionary Force that would invade France in 1944. At the end of 1944, Eisenhower was promoted to five-star general, the rank he held when the German army surrendered on May 7, 1945. Eisenhower emerged from the war as the best known and most popular of American generals. He was a fine strategist, but his greatest strength as commander lay in his ability to handle complex multinational operations. That ability came to the fore in his skillful management of two contentious, egomaniacal, and nationalistic subordinates, Bernard L. Montgomery and George S. Patton.

Eisenhower served as head of the American zone of occupation in Germany from May to November 1945, when President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him Army Chief of Staff. Eisenhower held that position until he resigned from the army in 1948. That same year, he published his memoir of the war, Crusade in Europe. It became one of the best-selling and most widely translated books of the 20th century, and the proceeds from it provided Eisenhower with financial security. Also in 1948, Eisenhower became president of Columbia University, a position he held through 1950. In December 1950, Truman named him the first supreme commander of the allied forces in Europe being organized under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), a post he assumed in January 1951.

During the early 1950s, a group of liberal, or Eastern, Republicans urged Eisenhower to run for president. They argued that Eisenhower alone could prevent the Midwestern, or conservative, wing from gaining control of the party, and ultimately the White House. Eisenhower initially resisted. By late 1951, however, he became convinced that the leading Republican candidate, Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), a unilateralist, would, as president, threaten collective security and American interests in Europe. Still, Eisenhower remained publicly uncommitted and continued his work in Europe. In the meantime, various liberal Republicans, including politicians like Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY of New York and Sen. HENRY CABOT LODGE (R-Mass.) as well as business leaders like PAUL HOFFMAN and William Robinson, began to organize a campaign to secure the nomination for Eisenhower in 1952. They entered Eisenhower in the New Hampshire primary, where, without campaigning, he won 50 percent of the Republican vote to Taft's 37 percent. In Minnesota, Eisenhower's name was not even on the ballot, and he finished a strong second to favorite son HAROLD STASSEN.

Nevertheless, Eisenhower would not get the nomination without a bitter struggle against Taft. Thus, after the treaty establishing the European Defense Community was signed on May 27, Eisenhower resigned as NATO commander and returned to the United States to campaign actively for the nomination. His campaign emphasized his status as a leader above politics. It also portrayed him as a straightforward, regular fellow, who stood for traditional American values. After some initial difficulties in adjusting to having speeches written for him, Eisenhower emerged as an effective campaigner. His greatest gift was the ability to project his winning personality to the public. Taft, for all his intellectual gifts, was a cold, unappealing personality and a poor speaker. Nevertheless, Taft could claim the allegiance of party loyalists. By the time of the Republican National Convention in July, the struggle for the nomination revolved around the seating of rival delegations from Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. The regulars on the Republican National Committee seated most of the Taft delegations, but the Eisenhower campaign took the matter to the floor of the convention, where their so-called fair play amendment carried. After that, the general won the nomination on the first ballot and, on the advice of his campaign advisers, chose Sen. RICHARD M. NIXON of California as his running mate. Nixon balanced the ticket in several respects; he was young, from the West, and from the conservative wing of the party.

During the campaign, the Republicans ran on a formula described by Sen. KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) as K₁C₂ (Korea, Communism, Corruption). The unpopular war in Korea, concerns about communists in government, and the scandals of the Truman administration had combined to drive Truman's approval ratings to record lows. Eisenhower pledged to "clean up the mess in Washington," but, for the most part, he took the high road and left the partisan attacks to Nixon. In foreign policy, Eisenhower believed that isolationism had contributed to the rise of Hitler and thus to the coming of World War II. By extension, he held that a refusal to remain engaged with the rest of the world, and Europe in particular, would encourage continued communist aggression and might ultimately lead to nuclear war. At home, he opposed further extensions of the New Deal on the ground that such extensions would undermine individual initiative and threaten the American way of life.

The crusade to "clean up the mess in Washington" hit a snag when, on September 18, the New York Post, one of the few newspapers supporting the Democratic nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, ran a story that Nixon had a "secret" fund raised by California business leaders and had used it for personal expenses. In fact, the fund was not secret; Nixon had previously answered questions from reporters about it. Eisenhower had SHERMAN ADAMS arrange an audit by Price, Waterhouse. The candidate also let Nixon know that he favored a speech addressing the subject. Then, it came out that Stevenson had a similar fund, which muted Democratic criticism. Moreover, the audit showed that Nixon had not diverted any of the fund for personal use. The Republican National Committee bought 30 minutes of prime time on television for Nixon, who gave his famous "Checkers" speech.

Polls showed Eisenhower ahead, but after polls seemed to have predicted a Dewey victory in 1948, no one put too much trust in them. In October, Eisenhower announced, "I shall go to Korea." For all practical purposes, that settled the election. Voters found the idea of the hero of World War II going to observe the Korean War firsthand enormously reassuring. Eisenhower won in a landslide. In the highest turnout to that time, he garnered slightly over 55 percent of the vote. He carried 41 states and won 442 electoral votes to Stevenson's 89. Eisenhower even cracked the solidly Democratic South. He took Texas, Virginia, Tennessee, and Oklahoma. The Republicans also won a narrow majority in the House and a tie in the Senate, which they controlled through the tiebreaking vote of the vice president.

The election of 1952 was more a rejection of the Truman administration and a personal victory for Eisenhower than it was an endorsement of the Republican party. The Democrats remained the majority party; they would win back both houses of Congress in 1954 and maintain that control for the rest of Eisenhower's two terms (and, indeed, through the 1960s and 1970s). Further complicating matters, Eisenhower represented the liberal wing of his party, but conservatives controlled the congressional delegation. Eisenhower and his administration had no intention of undoing the New Deal; rather, they wanted to limit its expansion. In contrast, a number of Republican conservatives in Congress demanded a wholesale assault on the New Deal. Further, while the president and the Eastern (or liberal, or internationalist) wing of the party favored a foreign policy that concentrated on Europe and relied on multilateral defense, the conservative wing placed its priority on Asia and preferred a unilateral approach.

Eisenhower assembled a cabinet of capable and successful people. Unlike many presidents, he did not appoint old cronies; indeed, he did not choose a single old friend. The secretary of state, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, was senior partner in Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the leading Wall Street law firms, and came to the post with a wealth of experience in foreign affairs. The position of attorney general went to HERBERT BROWNELL, another highly successful lawyer who had been involved in reform and Republican politics in New York and had managed Dewey's campaigns for governor and president. Brownell had also played major roles in persuading Eisenhower to run in the campaign of 1952. Eisenhower picked CHARLES E. WILSON, president of General Motors, to be secretary of defense and GEORGE M. HUMPHREY, president of the Mark A. Hannah Company, to be secretary of the treasury. The secretary of labor, MARTIN DURKIN, was president of the plumbers' union and a Stevenson Democrat. The quip that the cabinet consisted of "nine millionaires and a plumber," although clever, did not give a real sense of the nature of Eisenhower's cabinet.

Eisenhower also reorganized the White House. He named SHERMAN ADAMS, the crusty former governor of New Hampshire, to be chief of staff. He created a White House staff secretary's office and chose his former staff assistant at the Pentagon and NATO, Brig. Gen. Paul T. Carroll, to head it. When Carroll died in October 1954, Eisenhower selected another former NATO aide, Col. ANDREW J. GOODPASTER, to replace him.

As president, Eisenhower's first objective was to end the stalemated, unpopular war in Korea. Stalin's death in March 1953 created an opportunity. Eisenhower pressed both Communist China and South Korea to accept an armistice. He removed the Seventh Fleet from the Formosa Straits, thus "unleashing" Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi). He also hinted darkly at the possible use of nuclear weapons. Finally, after considerable difficulty, an armistice was signed on July 27.

With respect to foreign policy in general, Eisenhower continued Truman's policy of containment of the Soviet Union. Like Truman, Eisenhower gave priority to Europe, which he believed was the primary area of American interest. In order to prevent communist expansion in that region, he encouraged the redevelopment and unification of Western Europe economically and militarily. Further, Eisenhower believed in a multilateral approach to defense. All of this brought Eisenhower into conflict with the right wing of his party, which opposed collective security and believed Asia to be the primary area of American interest. Throughout his presidency, Eisenhower faced a challenge from the China bloc, a group of conservative Republicans in Congress led by WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) in the Senate and WALTER JUDD (R-Minn.) in the House.

Conflict between Eisenhower and the conservative wing of his party surfaced immediately. Although conservative Republicans urged him to repudiate the Yalta accords, Eisenhower worried that to do so might cost Western access rights to Berlin. Moreover, he had no taste for the prospect of renouncing agreements he had carried out while army chief of staff. Further difficulties came when Eisenhower nominated CHARLES BOHLEN to be ambassador to the Soviet Union. The Republican right regarded him as too closely linked to the foreign policy of the Truman administration, and some suggested that he was a security risk. Eisenhower held his ground, and, with the cooperation of Taft, Bohlen won confirmation in March 1953.

Another sore point with the Right was that, in spite of the rhetoric of the campaign in 1952, during which Dulles in particular called for the "rollback" of communist influence and the "liberation of captive peoples," the United States often found itself powerless to control events in Europe. For example, the United States could realistically do nothing when East Germans rose to demand a greater degree of freedom after the death of Stalin in 1953.

The most serious challenge from the Republican right came when, in 1953, Sen. JOHN BRICKER (R-Ohio) proposed a constitutional amendment that would have limited the power of the president to make treaties. Sixty-two other senators cosponsored the measure, including 44 of the 47 Republicans in the body. Eisenhower vigorously opposed the measure, which would most likely have passed without his opposition. Procedural maneuvering kept the Bricker amendment off the floor throughout 1953, and Eisenhower managed to mobilize enough support to defeat the measure in a very close vote in February 1954.

Eisenhower intended to continue to wage the cold war, but he also wanted to balance the budget. Further, he worried that excessive defense spending would distort the American economy, and finally, he believed that the money could be better spent. Seizing on the death of Stalin as an opportunity, Eisenhower delivered a speech to the American Association of Newspaper Editors on April 16, 1953. In it, he proposed a reduction in the arms race and the use of the resulting savings to establish "a fund for world aid and reconstruction. . . . The monument to this new kind of war would be these: roads and schools, hospitals and homes, food and health." In contrast, "Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired, signifies, in a final sense, a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, those who are cold and are not clothed." Indeed, the best the arms race could offer was a "life of perpetual fear and tension." This, he concluded, was "not a way of life at all, in any true sense," but rather, "humanity hanging from a cross of iron."

Eisenhower's concerns to balance the budget while providing an adequate defense, combined with the lessons of the unpopular limited war in Korea, led to reorientation of defense policy. The "New Look," as the policy was known, featured a greater reliance on technology, air power, and the nuclear deterrent. For one thing, these were areas where the United States enjoyed a substantial advantage. With respect to Europe in particular, the advantage in conventional forces belonged to the Soviet Union. In a different vein, Eisenhower believed that a strong economy constituted an essential element of defense, and, toward that end, he hoped to cut defense spending. The New Look provided a means to achieve deterrence at a lower cost. While Eisenhower rejected the idea of withdrawing U.S. forces from Europe immediately, he hoped that America's allies might be weaned from dependence on American conventional forces. The New Look did enable Eisenhower to reduce defense budgets throughout his two terms in office. In a policy paper approved in October 1954 (NSC 162/2) and in its budget for 1955, the administration began implementing the New Look. NSC 162/2 called for a 25 percent reduction in the size of the military by 1956, with most of the cuts coming from the army and navy. The air force, on the other hand, was enlarged and its budget increased. The end of the Korean War as well as the emphasis on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent enabled the administration to reduce the defense budget by roughly $4 billion.

Detering the Soviets constituted only one aspect of managing the cold war. In the spring of 1954, the French, attempting to maintain their influence in Indochina, requested American military aid to relieve their garrison at Dien Bien Phu. In 1950, after the victory of Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-Tung) over the Nationalists in China and the outbreak of the Korean War, the Truman administration increased aid to the French to help their effort to defeat the insurgency of the Viet Minh. By the time Truman left office, the United States was paying for a good part of the cost of the French effort. While Eisenhower disliked colonialism and regarded French colonialism with particular contempt, he worried about the consequences of Vietnam falling to the Communists. Thus, he made substantial aid from the United States conditional on internationalizing the war and the promise of "unconditional independence" for the Associated States (Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam). The British were not keen on involvement, and the French were unwilling to meet Eisenhower's conditions. Without intervention by the United States, the French garrison surrendered on May 7, 1954. The Geneva Accords, signed a few months later, granted full independence to Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam. Vietnam was divided along the 17th parallel, with the Viet Minh in control in the North and the French-backed emperor, Bao Dai, at the head of the government in the South. Subsequently, the United States created the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO). The members—the United States, France, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, and the Philippines—agreed to consult in the event of common danger.

During the fall of 1954, Eisenhower again resisted pressure to become engaged in a war in Asia. The Communist Chinese began shelling Quemoy and Matsu, two islands held by the Nationalists. In January 1955, Eisenhower and Dulles obtained a congressional resolution granting the president authority to use American forces to defend Taiwan and the Pescadores. Dulles wanted to include Quemoy and Matsu, but Eisenhower overruled him. On April 23, at the conference of nonaligned nations in Bandung, Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai) gave a conciliatory speech, and Eisenhower responded. Subsequently, the mainland Chinese reduced their shelling of the islands and by mid-May stopped it entirely. The crisis passed.

Although a resolute cold warrior, Eisenhower hoped to reduce tensions between the United States and USSR. In 1955, the two countries agreed to end their occupation of Austria and create an independent, neutral country. That same year, the two countries, under the auspices of the United Nations, negotiated to prohibit the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and reduce conventional forces. Those negotiations ultimately failed. In July 1955, the United States, USSR, Great Britain, and France met at a summit conference in Geneva. Eisenhower presented his "Open Skies" proposal, which called for an exchange of maps of military installations and for each side to submit to aerial inspections. The Soviets rejected the plan. In the end, the conference reached no agreements of substance, but it did produce, as Eisenhower reported to the American people, a "new spirit of conciliation and cooperation."

At the same time he sought to reduce tensions with the Soviets, Eisenhower had to confront the problems associated with the breakup of the old colonial empires and the emergence of new nations. If the president demonstrated restraint in dealing with the Soviets and Chinese, he was not always so restrained in dealing with radical nationalist revolutions in the Third World. In 1953, the CIA supported a successful coup against the elected leftist government of Mohammed Mossadeq in Iran. The following year, in Guatemala, the CIA once again supported a coup against an elected leftist government, this time that of Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán in Guatemala.

In domestic policy, Eisenhower fit within the broad consensus established by Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal that the federal government was responsible for the functioning of the economy and for the basic welfare of the American people. Like his opposition to the Bricker amendment, this recognition brought Eisenhower into frequent conflict with the Republican right, which included his older brother, Edgar. A highly successful lawyer, Edgar was free with his criticism of Dwight's administration, and the two engaged in an ongoing debate. On November 8, 1954, Eisenhower wrote to Edgar: "Should any party attempt to abolish social security and eliminate labor laws and farm programs, you would not hear of that party again in our political history. There is a tiny splinter group, of course, that believes you can do these things. Among them are H. L. Hunt . . . and a few other Texas oil millionaires, and an occasional politician and businessman from other areas. Their number is negligible and they are stupid." Beyond an awareness that to position oneself beyond the boundaries of the New Deal consensus amounted to political suicide, Eisenhower himself was comfortable with that broad consensus. He believed in the maintenance of a basic welfare state; he believed that the government had a responsibility to maintain prosperity; and he believed in federal activity, as Republican senator Robert Taft put it, "where the objective is clearly beyond the power of the state or community to achieve." Indeed, Eisenhower had nothing but contempt for the right wing of his party and once scoffed that Frank Holman (the conservative president of the American Bar Association and an architect of the Bricker amendment) was "obsessed with saving the nation from Eleanor Roosevelt."

At the same time, Eisenhower had reservations about further expansions of the federal government. Near the end of his presidency, he summed up his views in a letter to Edgar's wife, Lucy Eisenhower. "Just about eight years ago," he wrote, "I finally decided I should come back to the United States to stand for the Presidency. I did so in the hope that I could stem what I thought was a clear drift towards paternalism, if not socialism, in our government's relation to its people. It has been a long, uphill struggle, and during the years I have learned some things. The first of these is that this country is not going to the right—that the economic and political affairs of our people are not going to be soon conducted as to take our nation back to the days of the 1890s. Indeed, this would be undesirable if we could do it."

Eisenhower searched for a catchy phrase to encapsulate his views. He tried "moderate progressivism," "progressive moderation," and "dynamic conservatism." All captured his intent, but none had the ring of Theodore Roosevelt's Square Deal, Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, or Harry Truman's Fair Deal.

During his first term, Eisenhower focused his attention on holding down government expenditures, balancing the budget, and reducing taxes. Shortly after taking office, he removed wage and price controls established by the Truman administration. He also made modest reductions in Truman's budget and the projected deficit. He resisted, however, conservative calls for a tax cut, because he believed the revenues were necessary, given the cost of the war in Korea. With the end of the Korean War, the economy entered a recession at the end of 1953. Eisenhower responded with a moderate Keynesian approach. Eventually, the combination of the administration's efforts to hold down expenditures and an expanding economy produced a small budget surplus in 1956.

In agriculture, Eisenhower attempted to cut back on the policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. By the time Eisenhower took office, the government had accumulated huge stores of surplus grain, cotton, tobacco, and other commodities, which itself had the effect of depressing agricultural prices. The Eisenhower administration adopted a policy of sliding price supports (ranging from 75 to 90 percent of parity) that was intended to move American farmers toward an open market and to reduce the surplus. Congress passed modest reductions in price supports in 1954, and in 1956 it passed an administration proposal to create a soil bank (the policy paid farmers for putting land into ungrazed grass, forest, or water storage). Agricultural interests aggressively opposed the reductions in subsidies, but, in fact, the Truman administration had never paid full parity prices. Under Truman, agricultural price supports had been pegged at 90 percent of parity. While reducing subsidies, Eisenhower left the basic program intact.

Eisenhower preferred to see the development of natural resources and the generation of power left to the states or private companies. He signed the Submerged Lands Act of 1953, which returned oil-bearing tidelands to the states. The administration reversed a decision, made during the Truman years, for the federal government to build a high dam at Hells Canyon on the Snake River. At the same time, the administration withdrew objections to a plan for the Idaho Power Company to build three low dams on the river. The Eisenhower administration also rescinded authorization of federally constructed dams on the Columbia River and the Coosa River. The latter project went to the Alabama Power Company, a rival of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA). Nevertheless, Eisenhower found it difficult to limit the growth of the TVA. The Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) proposed to sign a contract to purchase power from the Mississippi Valley Generation Company (formed by EDGAR H. DIXON, president of the Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE A. YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company), rather than the TVA. The decision infuriated advocates of public power and created a minor scandal when it came out that a consultant to the Bureau of the Budget had been simultaneously advising the Dixon-Yates company. When the city of Memphis decided to build its own municipal power plant, which freed up power from the TVA for use by the AEC, Eisenhower took the opportunity to cancel the Dixon-Yates contract and thus avoided a major controversy.

If Eisenhower wanted to stop the spread of statism in some areas, he advocated modest expansions of government activities in others. In his first State of the Union message, he called for expanding "safeguards against the privations that too often come with unemployment, old age, illness and accident." The president proposed broadening Social Security to cover self-employed farmers, doctors, dentists, lawyers, and others. The proposal also included an increase in monthly benefits and a provision to liberalize limits on retirement earnings. Congress took no action that year, but in 1954 Congress passed legislation extending Social Security coverage to self-employed workers, thus bringing 10.5 million additional workers into the system. It was the greatest expansion of Social Security since its creation. The law also increased benefits. In 1955 Eisenhower sought an increase in the minimum wage and signed into law an increase from 75 cents to $1 an hour, one of the largest percentage increases in history.

Eisenhower also supported expansions in federal programs for public health. He proposed a plan to expand health insurance coverage by creating a federal fund to underwrite the risks of private health insurance carriers that extended coverage to high-risk customers. Ever vigilant against what it regarded as socialized medicine, the American Medical Association lobbied aggressively against the proposal. Liberal Democrats, who advocated some form of a national health system, also opposed it, as did major insurance companies. The plan for health reinsurance died in committee. Eisenhower was more successful in gaining congressional approval for a federal role in the distribution of the Salk polio vaccine.

With respect to federally funded public housing, Eisenhower largely continued the policies he inherited from the Truman administration. Truman had never requested more than 75,000 units in a year, and the housing shortage had abated. Eisenhower initially proposed the construction of 35,000 units for fiscal 1954, but conservative opposition in Congress forced him to settle for 20,000. In 1954, Eisenhower requested legislation to guarantee the construction of 1 million units of housing during that year, largely through federal mortgage insurance, urban renewal, and lower requirements for down payments on federally insured loans for low-income housing. The proposal also called for the construction of 35,000 units of public housing in each of the next four years. Eisenhower resisted conservative demands for the elimination of all provisions for public housing and settled for a compromise that linked the number of new units of public housing to the number of units of slum clearance.

In some areas, Eisenhower expanded the legacy of the New Deal. His administration undertook several large public works projects. Eisenhower proposed, and Congress passed, legislation providing for the construction of the Saint Lawrence Seaway. The project was completed in 1959. The largest public works project of his administration was the interstate highway system. By the time Eisenhower became president, overland transportation in the United States was woefully inadequate. Railroads had faced financial difficulties since the end of World War II, and highways constructed by state and local governments had not kept pace with the increasing demands created by the growing reliance on automobiles and trucks. Eisenhower appointed a commission headed by Gen. LUCIUS CLAY to study the situation. The commission recommended the construction of a national highway system using both federal and state money but acknowledged that the federal government would have to bear most of the cost. Eisenhower overcame the opposition of conservatives in Congress by emphasizing the importance of such a system to civil defense. The project called for construction of 42,000 miles of controlled-access highways linking major cities.

By the time Eisenhower left office, 7,500 miles of the system were in use.

Another area in which Eisenhower proposed expanding the New Deal was federal aid to education. The baby boom placed an unmanageable burden on locally funded schools. Publicly funded schools were a jealously guarded responsibility of local government. Conservatives and many local officials objected that federal aid might become a means for the federal government to dictate what was taught in schools and who taught it. In an effort to circumvent such objections, the Eisenhower administration recommended federal aid for the construction of new classrooms. Conservatives nonetheless believed that any federal involvement with public schools threatened local control, and Southerners worried that the federal government might use federal funds, more specifically the threat to withhold them, as a means to dismantle segregation. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., lent substance to those fears when he proposed an amendment that would have prohibited federal aid to segregated schools. Even after the defeat of the Powell Amendment, Congress rejected Eisenhower's school construction bill.

Eisenhower also made substantial contributions to civil rights in his first term. He appointed unprecedented numbers of African Americans to positions in the executive branch and appointed some to positions that had previously been held only by whites. For instance, Fred Morrow became the first African American to hold an executive position in the White House; Lois Lippman became the first black secretary to work there. Eisenhower named African Americans as assistant secretary of labor and chief of the parole board. Although he had opposed a compulsory Fair Employment Practices Commission, Eisenhower appointed a committee to eliminate discrimination in employment by the federal government and by contractors with the federal government. Eisenhower also put into effect Truman's unfulfilled promise to desegregate the armed forces and took steps to desegregate Washington, D.C.

Those early initiatives in civil rights marked a considerable advance over the policies of the Truman administration. In 1954, however, the Supreme Court changed the context of civil rights when, in Brown v. Board of Education, it declared segregated public schools unconstitutional. By the time Eisenhower entered the White House, the Truman administration's Justice Department had filed an amicus curiae brief in the school segregation cases. Eisenhower's Justice Department took the same position in the reargument of the cases in the fall of 1953. Eisenhower's most significant contribution to the Brown decision, and a somewhat inadvertent one, was the appointment of EARL WARREN as chief justice. While many have criticized Eisenhower for failing to endorse the decision, he always took the position that it was not his job to pass judgment on decisions of the Supreme Court; his job was to enforce them. In truth, Eisenhower had reservations about the expansion of federal authority and judicial activism inherent in the decision. He did not, as has frequently been asserted, disagree with the basic principle articulated in Brown.

In the initial aftermath of the Brown decision, Eisenhower moved cautiously. Southern intransigence finally convinced him to permit Attorney General Herbert Brownell to submit to Congress a four-part civil rights bill in 1956, but the Democratic leadership of Congress wanted no part of an internecine battle over civil rights in an election year. LYNDON JOHNSON, the majority leader in the Senate, employed clever procedural maneuvering to bury the bill in committee.

The issue of internal communist subversion brought Eisenhower into direct confrontation with the right wing of the Republican party and, in particular, the red-baiting junior senator from Wisconsin, JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY. The president personally detested McCarthy and his methods. Nevertheless, he refused to confront the senator publicly or directly, although some of his aides and his brother, Milton, urged him to do so. As Eisenhower himself put it, he did not take this position because he failed to love a good fight. Rather, he believed that if he publicly attacked McCarthy it would serve only to generate more publicity for the senator and would prompt the Senate to rally around one of its own. In addition, such an attack would also enrage the right wing of his own party and threaten his entire legislative agenda. Then, too, as a personal matter, he preferred not to "get down in the gutter with that guy."

Instead, Eisenhower worked behind the scenes and cooperated with McCarthy's opponents in an effort to bring the demagogue down. Eisenhower did publicly, if somewhat obliquely, attack McCarthy (or McCarthyism, as the cartoonist Herbert L. Block dubbed hysterical anticommunism) in a speech at the commencement of Dartmouth College, in which he urged the graduates not to join the "book burners." The remarks clearly referred to two of McCarthy's aides, ROY COHN and G. DAVID SCHINE, who conducted searches for subversive literature in overseas libraries run by the State Department. The president also responded to an article by J. B. MATTHEWS, the newly named head of the staff of the Committee on Government Operations, which McCarthy chaired. In that article, Matthews charged that "the largest single group supporting the communist apparatus in the United States today is composed of Protestant clergymen." In a letter to the National Conference of Christians and Jews, Eisenhower denounced the attack on the ministry as "unjustifiable and deplorable."

Eisenhower did not disagree with McCarthy over the need for national security or the reality of the threat of communist subversion, but Eisenhower believed that such matters were best handled through orderly administrative and judicial proceedings, not through sensation-seeking hearings or reckless partisan attacks. Eisenhower replaced Truman's loyalty program with a loyalty and security program. Truman's Executive Order 9835 provided for the dismissal of a government employee if, "on all the evidence, reasonable grounds exist for the belief that the person involved is disloyal to the Government of the United States." Truman later revised the standard for dismissal to whether there was "a reasonable doubt as to the loyalty of the person involved." Eisenhower's Executive Order 10450, issued in 1953, denied employment to anyone whose employment was not "clearly consistent with the national security." In December 1953, Eisenhower suspended J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER's security clearance pending a full administrative review by the Atomic Energy Commission. The AEC found that Oppenheimer was loyal but a security risk and withdrew his clearance permanently.

The final break with McCarthy came after the senator launched an investigation of Eisenhower's beloved army. When McCarthy failed to find a spy ring he alleged existed at Fort Monmouth, he turned his attention to a dentist who had refused to answer routine screening questions but had, through an administrative error, been promoted before receiving an honorable discharge. McCarthy called Gen. RALPH ZWICKER before his committee and verbally abused the decorated war hero. ROBERT T. STEVENS, the secretary of the army, met with McCarthy and other Republican leaders in an effort to assure that future witnesses would be treated with respect, but McCarthy and the press portrayed the meeting as a capitulation on Stevens's part. At this point, Eisenhower moved more directly to bring down the senator from Wisconsin. He publicly lauded Zwicker's service, and the army released a chronology detailing attempts by Cohn and McCarthy to secure preferential treatment for Schine, who had been drafted. McCarthy countered by charging that the army was holding Schine hostage to hamstringing his investigation. During the Army-McCarthy hearings in 1953, the president cooperated behind the scenes with McCarthy's opponents. When McCarthy threatened to subpoena members of the White House staff, Eisenhower, claiming executive privilege, refused to allow members of his staff to testify about advice they had given him. In addition, without mentioning McCarthy by name, Eisenhower made several statements in March to the effect that "we can't defeat communists by destroying the things in which we believe." The president also supported Sen. RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.), who had publicly attacked McCarthy. Working closely with the army and McCarthy's opponents in the Senate, Eisenhower helped bring down the junior senator from Wisconsin. The president played no direct role, however, in the Senate's decision to condemn McCarthy in December.

On the night of September 23, 1955, Eisenhower suffered a "moderately severe" heart attack, from which he made a full recovery. Nevertheless, he had not decided to run for a second term, and the issue of his health further complicated the issue. Milton was concerned that a second term might kill his brother. Ultimately, however, Eisenhower concluded that he was the "only man" who could keep the nomination out of the hands of the right wing of the party. Knowland had already announced his intention to run if Eisenhower did not. By December, Eisenhower felt strong enough to run, but he held off on his decision until he got a clean bill of health from his doctors in February 1956. Although he toyed with the idea of replacing Nixon on the ticket, he ultimately decided that Nixon would again be his running mate.

Eisenhower ran on a platform that emphasized the peace and prosperity his first term had brought the country. His Democratic opponent, Adlai Stevenson, had difficulty finding an issue that resonated with the public. As Stevenson's prospects for a victory receded, he grasped onto the issue of the president's health. He attacked Nixon in increasingly personal terms and warned that a Republican victory would make Nixon president "within the next four years." Eisenhower's obvious physical well-being negated the issue.

Toward the end of the campaign, two foreign policy crises further strengthened the president's position. Egypt's autocratic ruler, Gamal Abdel Nasser, nationalized the Suez Canal after failing to obtain American support for a dam at Aswan on the Nile. In late October, Great Britain, France, and Israel responded with a joint assault on Egypt. The attack caught Eisenhower by surprise. The United States, working with the Soviet Union, obtained a UN resolution condemning the attack. Faced with overwhelming international pressure, the British, French, and Israelis agreed to a cease-fire. The second crisis stemmed from unrest in the Soviet-dominated countries of eastern Europe. Labor unrest in Poland developed into national resistance to Soviet domination in mid-1956, which Khrushchev put down with force. In late October, Hungary, led by Imre Nagy, sought to withdraw from the Warsaw Pact. The Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, sent in troops and tanks to restore Soviet rule. Hungarians took to the streets, throwing rocks and firebombs at the invading tanks; in the course of putting down the uprising, Soviets killed approximately 20,000 Hungarians. In spite of Republican talk of the need for "rollback" of communist influence during the campaign of 1952, Eisenhower could do little as the Soviets brutally repressed the Hungarian uprising. Nevertheless, these incidents reminded the American public of the dangerous state of the world and reinforced the public image of Eisenhower's sure hand at the helm of American foreign policy.

On November 6, Eisenhower won reelection by a landslide. He carried all but seven southern states, won nearly 58 percent of the popular vote, and swamped Stevenson in the electoral college by a vote of 457–74. In spite of the magnitude of Eisenhower's victory, the Democrats retained control of both houses of Congress. In fact, they picked up one seat in the Senate and two in the House.

Second terms tend to be less successful, and the first two years of Eisenhower's second term were beset with difficulties. The president's popularity reached a low point in 1958. However, his approval ratings rebounded in the last two years of his presidency. Some of Eisenhower's difficulties stemmed from a Democratic Congress that, freed from the prospect of another Eisenhower candidacy, became increasingly confrontational.

The president suffered a major defeat in the battle of the budget in 1957. Eisenhower submitted a budget for fiscal 1958 that called for grants for school construction, development of water resources, and a modest expansion of social welfare programs. The budget also provided for increases in defense and foreign aid. Conservative Republicans in Congress regarded Eisenhower's budget as a betrayal of traditional party values and demanded reductions in spending. They received support from Democrats who hoped to capitalize on public fears of inflationary spending. Thus, the Republican president found himself in the unusual position of asking the Democratic Congress to restore funds. Ultimately, Congress cut $4 billion in spending from the president's budget. Compounding his problems, a recession that began during 1957 and lasted into 1958 reduced tax revenues. This left the administration facing a projected $500-million deficit instead of a projected $1.8 billion surplus.

One of the most substantial blows to public confidence in Eisenhower's leadership came on October 4, 1957, when the Soviet Union launched Sputnik, Earth's first artificial satellite. Coming on the heels of the Soviet Union's successful test of an intercontinental ballistic missile, Sputnik dealt a devastating blow to the American sense of security, which, in turn, opened a debate over defense policy. Eisenhower faced open criticism from the military, which objected to his tight defense budgets. Military critics of the New Look, such as Gen. MAXWELL TAYLOR and Adm. ARLEIGH BURKE, joined by civilian critics such as HENRY KISSINGER, maintained that future conflicts would likely be limited wars and that greater numbers of conventional forces would be needed to fight them. Even the air force, the main beneficiary of the New Look, wanted to spend more money on an accelerated program to develop missiles and maintain U.S. superiority. Politicians, including STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.) and JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), sensed an issue that could restore a Democrat to the White House and warned that Eisenhower had allowed a "missile gap" to develop. In fact, America's capacity to deliver nuclear weapons remained far superior to that of the Soviets.

In the wake of Sputnik, some wanted a crash program in education to produce more scientists. Others demanded a massive commitment to achieve superiority over the USSR in astronautics. Eisenhower remained unalarmed. Since 1956, U-2 spy planes had provided information on Soviet military capabilities, and the president was well aware of America's superior nuclear capability. He cautioned that despite a "high sense of urgency," the United States should not "mount our charger and . . . ride off in all directions at once." The president appointed JAMES KILLIAN as special assistant to the president for science and technology. Further, the budget Eisenhower submitted in 1958 called for increased spending on the missile program and on scientific and technical education. Nevertheless, the president warned that "to amass military power without regard to our economic capacity would be to defend ourselves against one kind of disaster by inviting another." Eisenhower attempted to reassure the nation without revealing sensitive intelligence data. These efforts suffered another blow on November 3, when the Soviets launched Sputnik II. The following day, a group of civilian consultants to the National Security Council, headed by H. ROWAN GAITHER of the Ford Foundation, presented a classified report critical of American defense policies. Eisenhower regarded the report as alarmist and rejected many of its findings. However, portions of the report leaked to the press, giving the president's critics more ammunition.

Eisenhower wanted to reserve space exploration for peaceful purposes and therefore resisted recommendations to combine the missile and space programs. Despite protests from the air force, the president placed the space program under the auspices of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), a civilian agency he created in July 1958.

A recession that began in 1957 contributed to the president's political difficulties. As was the case with Sputnik, Eisenhower responded cautiously. He reversed cutbacks in defense spending and public works, accelerated federally funded projects already authorized, and liberalized restrictions on federally guaranteed mortgages. In addition, he asked for legislation to extend unemployment insurance from 26 weeks to 39 weeks, which Congress promptly enacted. However, Eisenhower resisted pressure from Democrats for massive spending on public works and from conservative Republicans for tax cuts. Although the recession had ended by April, Republicans suffered a devastating defeat in the congressional elections of 1958.

After the Democratic victory in 1958, it seemed that "the spenders" had gained the upper hand, but Eisenhower proved remarkably adept at holding down spending in 1959. After a record peacetime deficit of $12.4 billion in fiscal 1959, Eisenhower forged a coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats to hold the line on the budget. Making effective use of the veto, Eisenhower produced a budget surplus of $1.3 billion for 1960.

Exacerbating Eisenhower's political difficulties, in June 1958, a subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee alleged that SHERMAN ADAMS, the president's chief of staff, had used his influence on behalf of BERNARD GOLDFINE, an industrialist from New England who had tax and regulatory problems, in exchange for Goldfine paying some hotel bills for Adams. The brusque chief of staff assured Eisenhower that "I made a mistake, but I'm no crook." It turned out, however, that Adams had also accepted an expensive coat and other gifts from Goldfine. The day after Adams testified before the committee, Eisenhower issued a ringing endorsement of his aide. However, conservative Republicans in Congress, who had never liked Adams, began to demand his resignation. With the election on the horizon and Republican prospects looking grim, many in the party blamed Adams. It became clear that Adams had to go. He announced his resignation on September 22, and Eisenhower accepted it with "deepest regret."

Civil rights emerged as a prominent issue during Eisenhower's second term. In 1957, Eisenhower resubmitted the civil rights bill Brownell had recommended the year before, and this time the president unequivocally endorsed all four proposals. The legislation called for the elevation of the Civil Rights Section in the Criminal Division of the Justice Department to the status of a division, headed by an assistant attorney general. It also provided for the creation of a Civil Rights Commission. The most controversial provision, Title III, would have granted authority to the attorney general to enter civil suits on behalf of people whose civil rights had been violated. The fourth proposal protected voting rights. Lyndon Johnson played a central role in getting the legislation passed, but he also gutted the measure by eliminating Title III and adding a provision for jury trials for those convicted of interfering with the voting rights of others. Eisenhower somewhat reluctantly signed the watered-down bill. The president was particularly chagrined over the jury-trial amendment, but he had nonetheless obtained passage of the first civil rights bill since Reconstruction. Eisenhower went back to Congress and eventually obtained passage in 1960 of a second civil rights measure designed to protect black voting rights.

The most dramatic confrontation over civil rights came in 1957, when Governor ORVAL FAUBUS of Arkansas defied a federal court order and used the Arkansas National Guard to block the admission of nine black students to Little Rock's Central High School. Eisenhower nationalized the Arkansas National Guard and sent a thousand paratroopers from the elite 101st Airborne to enforce the court's order.

Eisenhower's most significant contribution to civil rights was his appointment of liberal and moderate judges to the federal judiciary in the South. These judges insured an ongoing process of desegregation. Moreover, these appointments stand in marked contrast to those of Truman and Kennedy. Two of Eisenhower's appointments to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, SIMON E. SOBELOFF and CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH, were confirmed in spite of determined opposition by segregationists.

In foreign policy, Eisenhower began his second term dealing with the aftermath of the Suez Crisis. Eisenhower and Dulles worried that the Soviet Union might attempt to fill the power vacuum left by the decline of French and British influence in the Middle East. In addition, Nasser's appeal to Arab nationalism threatened pro-Western regimes, and the Arab-Israeli conflict threatened to explode into war at any time. In January 1957, Eisenhower asked Congress to approve a resolution granting the president authority to use American forces to support nations facing "overt armed aggression by any country controlled by international communism." He also asked for $200 million in military and economic aid to the area. This policy came to be known as the Eisenhower Doctrine.

Although the Eisenhower Doctrine was directed at communism, Eisenhower recognized that the most immediate threat to American interests in the region was Nasserism. After pro-Nasser elements won the Jordanian elections in 1957, King Hussein dismissed the prime minister and declared martial law. The ousted prime minister fled to Syria, where he plotted a return to power. King Hussein appealed to Eisenhower for help against what he claimed was "communist" subversion. Eisenhower responded with $20 million in aid. The following year, anti-Western elements gained power in Iraq and threatened the governments of Lebanon and Jordan. Pro-Nasser forces overthrew Iraq's pro-Western monarchy on July 14, 1958. This alarmed the already shaky government of Lebanese President Camille Chamoun. The day after the Iraqi coup, in response to a request from Chamoun, Eisenhower sent troops to Lebanon to prevent a possible coup by supporters of Nasser. Two days later, the United States assisted the airlift of British paratroopers to Jordan to support a nervous King Hussein. Eisenhower managed to arrange a political settlement in Lebanon, which enabled him to withdraw American forces within a few weeks. The interventions managed to maintain pro-Western governments in Lebanon and Jordan but did not stem Arab nationalism. Therefore, the administration reconsidered its policy and decided to "work more closely with Arab nationalism and associate itself more closely with such aims and aspirations of the Arab people as are not contrary to the basic interests of the United States."

Just as the Lebanese crisis settled down, the Communist Chinese resumed shelling Quemoy and Matsu on August 23, 1958. Eisenhower resisted the advice of some advisers to use tactical nuclear weapons; instead, he ordered the Seventh Fleet to escort Nationalist supply ships. The shelling continued, and on September 11, Eisenhower gave a nationally televised speech in which he rejected "appeasement" but assured the country of his belief that "there is not going to be any war." Reaction to the speech was highly unfavorable. Neither public opinion in the United States nor any of America's allies supported a war over the islands. Some of those anxieties were misplaced; just as he had in the first crisis over Quemoy and Matsu, Eisenhower understood that the offshore islands had more psychological than strategic importance. In October, Dulles and Chiang reached an agreement that Chiang would not use force to regain the mainland. The Nationalist leader further agreed to withdraw some troops from the islands, and Eisenhower suspended escorts for Nationalist ships. The Communist Chinese responded to these signals by easing the bombardment of the islands.

The Suez Crisis left long-term strains on the Atlantic alliance. Although Eisenhower was able to restore relations with Great Britain, France (under Charles de Gaulle) embarked upon an independent foreign policy. This complicated matters when the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, issued an ultimatum regarding German reunification.

Khrushchev announced in November 1958 that, unless the West agreed to enter negotiations on a final settlement on Germany within six months, the USSR would recognize East Germany, and Western nations would have to deal with the East German regime for access to West Berlin. He also proposed withdrawing all foreign forces from Berlin and making it a free city under UN auspices. Eisenhower rejected advice to test Soviet intentions by sending American military forces through East Germany and into West Berlin. In public, the president initially took a firm stand. At the same time, he indicated to Khrushchev his willingness to negotiate. Khrushchev ultimately backed off his position and agreed to a foreign ministers conference in May 1959 and a trip to the United States in September. The foreign ministers conference recessed without resolving the outstanding issues.

Khrushchev's trip to the United States in September 1959 produced a thaw in relations between the superpowers. The visit attracted a good deal of publicity, but it produced little of substance. At a meeting between Eisenhower and the Soviet premier at Camp David, the two swapped war stories and discussed Berlin. Eisenhower consented to a summit conference the following spring and conceded that the allied position in Berlin was an "anomaly." In exchange, the Soviet leader agreed to put aside the separate treaty with East Germany and to begin negotiations over Berlin without a deadline. In many regards, it was a bravura performance by Eisenhower. He held the Western alliance together, conceded nothing of substance, and defused the crisis.

Pressure for a nuclear test ban had been building throughout the second half of the decade. In 1958, Eisenhower invited Great Britain and the USSR to enter into negotiations for a test ban treaty and also proposed suspending American testing for a year, provided that the Soviets did so as well. Khrushchev accepted. After a series of intense negotiations, in April 1959 Eisenhower proposed a ban on atmospheric testing as an interim step. Khrushchev rejected the offer. Both sides, however, seemed to be moving towards a test ban. The United States and USSR took the first step toward the limitation of nuclear weapons in December 1959, when they joined 10 other countries in signing the Antarctic Treaty, which established a nuclear-free zone in the Antarctic. This increased expectations for the Paris summit scheduled for May 1960.

After John Foster Dulles died of stomach cancer in May 1959, Eisenhower concentrated foreign policy in his own hands. He increasingly came to believe that his historic mission was to encourage a "just and lasting peace." As part of that mission, Eisenhower made a series of goodwill trips to Latin America, Asia, and Africa. He also made greater efforts to find an accommodation with the Soviets. By the middle of 1959, the press began to refer to the "new" Eisenhower. Indeed, both at home and abroad, Eisenhower rebounded from the difficulties of the first two years of his second term.

During the final two years of Eisenhower's presidency, preventing the expansion of communism in Latin America emerged as a major focus of administration policy. Toward that end, he initiated steps to bring down the government of Fidel Castro, the Cuban leader who had come to power in 1959. As Castro's revolution gathered strength, Eisenhower had attempted first to press Cuba's dictator, Fulgencio Batista, to institute reforms, and had then imposed an arms embargo and withdrawn political support. Although there were some concerns about communists within Castro's movement, the administration extended recognition to Castro's government in January 1959. Castro immediately proceeded to alienate the United States by purging liberals, his onetime allies, from his government, by staging mass executions, and by signing a trade and aid agreement with the Soviet Union. In response to the confiscation of American property in July 1959, Eisenhower cut Cuba's sugar quota by 700,000 tons. Later that year, he took steps to prohibit Cuban sugar from the U.S. market. In March 1960, he approved a plan by the Central Intelligence Agency to subvert Castro's regime and ultimately to replace it. The plan included support for the opposition in exile, propaganda, sabotage, and training a group of Cuban exiles to overthrow Castro's government.

In other parts of Latin America, however, the president focused his attention on preventing the expansion of communism through the use of massive and long-term economic aid. Sobered by the hostile reception to Vice President Richard Nixon's trip to the region in mid-1958, Eisenhower warned that the choice was "social evolution or revolution." The administration also began to place greater emphasis on promoting democracy in the region. MILTON EISENHOWER's fact-finding trip to the region reinforced the administration's new direction. In 1959 the Eisenhower administration supported a regional development bank, for which the United States provided most of the initial capital. In September 1960, the administration put forward a plan to assist health services, expand housing and educational facilities, and aid agriculture. It won the support of all Latin American nations except Cuba. These policies formed the basis for Kennedy's Alliance for Progress.

Two events marred Eisenhower's last months in office. In May, his summit meeting with Khrushchev was canceled after the Soviets shot down a U.S. intelligence plane over Soviet territory. Initial cover stories blew up when Khrushchev produced the pilot and spy equipment. Eisenhower took personal responsibility for the incident. Unappeased, Khrushchev issued a series of angry denunciations of American aggression. Perhaps the Soviet leader preferred to wait until a new president took office; perhaps he needed to appease hard-liners in his own country. At the opening session of the summit, Khrushchev angrily denounced the United States and demanded an apology for the U-2 overflights before he would move on to other issues. Even Eisenhower's assurance that he had suspended further U-2 overflights for the rest of his administration failed to satisfy the Soviet premier. The Soviets effectively walked out. The collapse of the Paris summit was one of the great disappointments of Eisenhower's presidency.

In June 1960, Eisenhower had to cancel a goodwill trip to Japan because anti-American riots erupted after the Japanese Diet ratified a defense treaty with the United States in January. The retention of U.S. military bases was especially contentious, and although the Japanese government managed to push the measure through the parliament, the prime minister was forced to resign.

Although Eisenhower had his reverses as well as his successes, he presided over eight years of peace and prosperity. In domestic affairs, his policies fell well within the New Deal consensus. He did not dismantle any basic structure he inherited from Roosevelt and Truman. In some areas, such as public housing, he essentially maintained existing policies. In other areas, for example farm subsidies, he cut but retained the basic program. In still other areas, he presided over expansions of the New Deal legacy. Examples included Social Security (an increase in benefits and expansion of the program), the minimum wage (one of the largest percentage increases in history), public works (the Saint Lawrence Seaway and the national highway system), public health (a federal role in the distribution of the Salk vaccine), and civil rights (the desegregation of the armed forces and Washington, D.C., attempts to eliminate discrimination in hiring by the federal government, and the passage of the first civil rights legislation since Reconstruction). On occasion, he proposed an expansion of the New Deal but failed to get the program through Congress. Health reinsurance and school construction were his most significant unsuccessful efforts in that regard.

In all, Eisenhower as president was a classic Tory reformer. He was willing to reform in order to preserve the basics of the system. Perhaps this was best illustrated by his reaction to the defeat of his health reinsurance program. "How in the hell," he asked, "is the AMA going to stop socialized medicine if they oppose bills such as this?" Most of all, as the first Republican president since the New Deal, he preserved and expanded the structures of government he inherited from Roosevelt and Truman. In doing so, he made the New Deal consensus genuinely bipartisan. The fact was that the Republican party had stopped running against the New Deal after 1936, but they had not held power until Eisenhower's victory in 1952.

In foreign policy as well, Eisenhower inherited a consensus from his predecessor. In the shadow of the Greek and Turkish crises of 1947, Truman had established a consensus in favor of containment of the Soviet Union. Here, too, Eisenhower functioned within the broad consensus he inherited. Nevertheless, if the basic objective remained the same, there were differences in style and approach. Eisenhower pursued the cold war as vigorously as Truman before him and Kennedy after him. However, he was less likely to seek confrontation than either Truman or Kennedy and sought to play down tensions with the Soviet Union. To grasp the difference, one need only compare Eisenhower's handling of Khrushchev's ultimatum on Berlin to Kennedy's response to the same ultimatum from the same Soviet leader. In addition, Eisenhower held the line on defense budgets.

Eisenhower played only a small role in the presidential campaign of 1960. Although he remained unenthusiastic about Richard Nixon, he accepted the vice president's nomination as inevitable. Still, he waited until March to give his vice president a somewhat less than enthusiastic endorsement. In his address to the Republican convention, Eisenhower spoke of the achievements of his administration rather than about Nixon's qualifications for the presidency. Yielding to Nixon's wishes, Eisenhower did not actively enter the campaign until the very last days. Facing the dilemma of all vice presidents who wish to succeed the president they served, Nixon wanted to establish his own identity. At the same time, he had to do so without criticizing the policies of the administration he served. This dynamic strained an already tense relationship between Eisenhower and Nixon. Whatever reservations he had about Nixon, however, Eisenhower regarded Kennedy as unqualified and was anxious to help his party retain the White House. Not until late October did Eisenhower campaign extensively for Nixon, but even then he talked about his administration's achievements and not about Nixon's experience or personal qualities. On election day, Kennedy defeated Nixon in one of the closest elections in American history.

In the waning days of his presidency, Eisenhower chose not to read his last State of the Union message and sent it to be entered in the Congressional Record. Instead, he went on national television to deliver a farewell address. In it, he warned against the danger of communism, "a hostile ideology—global in scope, atheistic in character, ruthless in purpose, and insidious in method." "Unhappily," he told the nation, "the danger it poses promises to be of indefinite duration." He also admonished the American people to guard against the "unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex." The "conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry," the old warrior observed, was "new in the American experience," and "the potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist."

Eisenhower retired to his farm near Gettysburg, Pa., but he could not escape an endless stream of requests for his time, his name, and his advice. Republicans prevailed on him to appear at fundraisers; candidates sought his advice and support; organizations appealed for his endorsement; historians wanted interviews and archivists permission to organize his papers. The General, as he preferred to be called, published a highly readable memoir of his presidency in two large volumes, Mandate for Change (1963) and Waging Peace (1965). He also published a more personal account of his early years, At Ease: Stories I Tell to Friends (1967). Both Kennedy and Johnson called on Eisenhower for his advice. The disastrous invasion at the Bay of Pigs reinforced his misgivings about his successor. Eisenhower often cited the advice of his old mentor, Fox Conner: "Always take your job seriously, never yourself." After one visit to the Kennedy White House, he commented that the people there functioned on a different principle: "Take yourself seriously, and to hell with the job." Immediately after Kennedy was assassinated, Eisenhower met with Lyndon Johnson, who later recalled that he "was deeply moved that the former president should go into such specific detail and give me his recommendations and his support." Eisenhower consistently opposed Kennedy's increases in defense spending and watched with dismay the policy of his successors in Southeast Asia. The former president opposed Kennedy's decision to increase the number of American "advisers" in South Vietnam; yet Eisenhower thought it important not to lose Indochina to communism. He regarded Johnson's policy of gradual escalation as military folly and the product of a lack of political will. By June 1966 he saw a stalemate developing, something that, as a military professional, he considered unacceptable, and began to discuss disengagement.

A heart attack in the fall of 1965 forced Eisenhower to cut back on the active schedule he had maintained. After that, his health began to fail. He had gallbladder surgery in December 1966, followed by congestive heart failure in February 1967 and a stroke two months after that. After another heart attack, he entered Walter Reed Army Hospital on May 14, 1968. From the hospital, Eisenhower issued a statement warmly endorsing Nixon for president. On August 5, the former president rallied to put on a suit to make a brief televised address to the Republican National Committee from his suite at Walter Reed. He died on March 28, 1969.

During the decades after Eisenhower left office, historians' assessments of his presidency changed. Throughout the 1960s, most professional historians, a group dominated by Democrats, criticized his formalist view of the presidency and his lack of an activist domestic agenda. Eisenhower tended to rank near the bottom of presidents in polls of historians, who portrayed him as an incompetent, genial former general who was utterly out of his depth as president. The American involvement in Indochina and the domestic unrest of the 1960s, however, prompted some to question the postwar liberal consensus and to reexamine the 1940s and 1950s from a different perspective. In that context, some historians found Eisenhower an appealing figure. He ended one war and did not begin another; he cut defense spending and warned of the military-industrial complex. The image of a military man as a man of peace held a strong attraction, particularly for historians who came of age during the war in Vietnam. That image was somewhat overdrawn, but it contributed to a fundamental reconsideration of Eisenhower's presidency. At the same time that political considerations were leading historians to reassess Eisenhower and his presidency, large collections of documents at the Eisenhower Library were opened to researchers. Initial explorations led most of these scholars to conclude that Eisenhower was more active, intelligent, informed, and competent than he had been generally regarded. A good number of these scholars also concluded that Eisenhower was more conservative than he had typically been portrayed. The opening of enormous collections at the Eisenhower Library in the mid-1970s, including Eisenhower's own papers as president, reinforced the view that Eisenhower was more literate and able than the early accounts gave him credit for being. However, these documents called into question the notion that Eisenhower was really an Old Guard Republican. Indeed, Eisenhower's private papers revealed him to be a fiscal conservative, but one whose politics fell well within the broad political consensus established by Roosevelt and the New Deal. By the early 1980s, a growing body of scholarship depicting Eisenhower as a competent and engaged leader had become known as "Eisenhower revisionism" and came to dominate scholarship on the 1950s. Even as it established itself as something of a new orthodoxy, however, Eisenhower revisionism came to encompass so broad a range of views that it became meaningless. Once they had demolished the image of the bumbling, befuddled ex-general, historians began to debate the nature and wisdom of Eisenhower's policies.

Whatever its limitations and failures, Eisenhower's presidency was not, as William V. Shannon described it, "the time of the great postponement." It was not even only, in the words of Charles Alexander, "a good job of holding the line." Eisenhower presided over a period of peace and prosperity, and, particularly compared to what came after him, that achievement should not be gainsaid. Perhaps that perspective led Stephen Ambrose to join in the judgment of "millions of Americans" who "felt that the country was damned lucky to have him."

Eisenhower, Milton S(lover)

(1889–1985) presidential adviser; president, Pennsylvania State University; president, Johns Hopkins University

Born in Abilene, Kans., on September 15, 1899, Milton Eisenhower, the youngest brother of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, enrolled at Kansas State University in 1919. Because he had to work to pay for his education, it took him six years to graduate. He earned money as a correspondent for the Kansas City Star and the Topeka Daily Capital, a contributor to the Kansas Farmer and the Iowa Farmer, and a proofreader for the alumni journal. Eisenhower was a member of Phi Kappa Phi (a scholastic honorary society for scientific schools), won several awards for public speaking, and was editor of the campus newspaper. Upon graduation, he became an instructor in the journalism school; he also took some graduate courses. After finishing first on an examination for the foreign service, Eisenhower received an appointment to a consular post in Edinburgh, Scotland. While there, he took courses at the University of Edinburgh.

When William M. Jardine, the president of Kansas State, became secretary of agriculture under Calvin Coolidge, he cabled Eisenhower and asked him to come to Washington as his assistant. Eisenhower hesitated to give up the security of the foreign service, so Jardine arranged for him to take a civil service examination. Eisenhower once again finished first and received an appointment in the Department of Agriculture in 1926. He became information director for the department two years later, and served under Jardine's successor, Arthur Hyde.

The advent of the Roosevelt administration brought a new secretary of agriculture, Henry A. Wallace. Eisenhower and Wallace quickly developed a strong mutual respect and a close personal relationship. Wallace, who was awkward and ill at ease in the social world of Washington, did not get on at all well with Roosevelt. Eisenhower, on the other hand, was by this time a polished veteran of official Washington and quickly established an easy rapport with the president. Wallace came to rely on Eisenhower to act as an intermediary with the president. Under the New Deal, the many agencies of the Agriculture Department promulgated often-conflicting policies. Wallace made Eisenhower coordinator of the Office of Land-Use Planning, a position "second in responsibility to the Secretary's" whose responsibility was to reconcile the various conflicts.

When Wallace became Roosevelt's vice president, Eisenhower clashed with the new secretary of agriculture, Claude R. Wickard. Eisenhower considered leaving the government, but Roosevelt kept him on board by giving him special assignments. Shortly after the attack on Pearl Harbor, the president asked Eisenhower to study all of the government's dissemination of information related to the war. Eisenhower recommended the creation of an Office of War Information. In March 1942, Roosevelt called Eisenhower in and told him that his new job would be to head the War Relocation Authority (WRA), which was responsible for relocating Japanese Americans from the West Coast to government relocation centers. Eisenhower would later recall this assignment as "the meanest, toughest, most unpleasant of my career." Less than a month after assuming his new post, Eisenhower wrote, "I feel most deeply that when the war is over . . . we as Americans are going to regret the avoidable injustices that may have been done." All attempts to humanize this inhumane program failed. Eisenhower reminded a meeting of governors from 10 western states that none of the Japanese Americans had been found guilty of anything. He proposed 50 to 75 small camps, modeled on the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC). Some of the internees would work in the camps, on reclamation projects, or in manufacturing; but he hoped that the majority would find work in the private sector. He pointed to the labor shortage in the intermountain states, especially in agriculture. The governors shouted down his proposals. Similarly, Eisenhower's hope that the Japanese Americans might be relocated to "small CCC sort of camps" gave way to objections by the army and War Department that larger camps took less manpower to keep under armed guard. Eisenhower was never comfortable with the assignment, and, after three months, Roosevelt relieved him of the burden and named him associate director of the Office of War Information (OWI). Before leaving the WRA, Eisenhower prepared a final report, in which he suggested that the president "issue a strong public statement in behalf of loyal American citizens" and urged "a more liberal wage policy" in the camps. Roosevelt ignored his recommendations. At the OWI, Milton played an important role in defending Dwight's reputation when many in the press criticized the general for a deal struck with Adm. Jean Darlan, deputy head of the Vichy government and commander in chief of its armed forces. Milton went to North Africa to oversee public relations, and the press coverage of Gen. Eisenhower became much more favorable.

When the president of Kansas State College stepped down in the spring of 1943, campus officials offered Eisenhower the position. After much deliberation, he accepted and took office on July 1, 1943. During his tenure, Eisenhower broadened the curriculum at Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science (which later became Kansas State University). He added elements of a liberal education to buttress the technical education at the school. In early 1950, the trustees of another land-grant college, Penn State College (later University), offered the presidency of that institution to Eisenhower. He accepted and assumed his new post after the end of the academic year. His experience at Penn State was similar in many ways to that at Kansas State. Eisenhower set about transforming Penn State "from a leading agricultural and scientific college into a distinguished international university."

During the postwar years, Eisenhower continued to serve the government in various capacities. In 1945, President HARRY S. TRUMAN asked Eisenhower to help the new secretary of agriculture, Clinton P. Anderson, merge the War Food Administration and the Department of Agriculture. The president offered Eisenhower an appointment as either a special assistant to the president or undersecretary of agriculture. Milton declined either title but agreed to commute for three months to tackle the assignment. Later that year, Truman named Eisenhower to a three-member fact-finding board in the wage dispute between General Motors and the United Auto Workers. In March 1946, Truman appointed him to the Famine Emergency Committee. That same year, Eisenhower declined an offer from Truman to become an assistant secretary-general at the United Nations. Also in 1946, Eisenhower became chair of the U.S. National Commission for the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), a position he would hold for four years. In that capacity, he attended the first international conference of UNESCO as the vice-chair of the American delegation and also became a member of UNESCO's executive board.

Milton initially counseled his brother against running for president in 1952. However, after Dwight met with Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) and the senator rejected the concept of mutual security in Europe, both brothers concluded that Ike ought to leave open the prospect of the Republican presidential nomination. No one else seemed able to stop Taft from getting the nomination. Further, Milton became convinced that his brother was the only Republican who could win the general election, and he thought a change in administrations necessary after 20 years of Democratic rule. From the earliest stages of Dwight's political career, Milton served as his brother's closest adviser. The two men had enjoyed an extremely close relationship throughout their adult lives. Dwight thought highly of Milton's intelligence, knowledge, and ideas. Further, the younger Eisenhower had years of experience in Washington. Milton became a key figure in the movement to draft Ike and in the campaign. In an official capacity, he was a member of the Eisenhower for President steering committee and played a role at the Republican National Convention in July 1952.

In spite of their intimate relationship, Milton held no high official position in his brother's administration. Both wanted to avoid any charges of nepotism. Ike often mused that he would have appointed Milton to the cabinet, either at Agriculture or State, had he not been the president's brother. At the same time, Milton's lack of an official position allowed him to serve as an adviser without portfolio. He had virtually unlimited access to the president, and he advised on virtually all matters; he helped write speeches, took on special assignments, and served as his brother's personal representative in Latin America. Most important of all, Milton functioned as his brother's sounding board. Ike trusted his brother's judgment and his ability to keep a confidence. For eight years, Milton spent most weekends at the White House. A direct line connected Milton's office at Penn State to the White House. During the week, he frequently wrote long letters to his brother on a wide variety of subjects. Throughout it all, Milton attempted to remain discretely in the background.

Sometimes Milton's role was more public. For instance, Ike named his brother, along with NELSON ROCKEFELLER and ARTHUR FLEMMING, to the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization (PACGO). The committee studied the federal government and made recommendations to eliminate unnecessary duplication and improve efficiency in the structure of government. The work of PACGO led to the creation of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare; the United States Information Agency; the Agency for International Development; the Small Business Administration; and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Milton served as his brother's special envoy to Latin America in 1954. A five-week trip convinced him that traditional foreign aid might strengthen the existing order but would not facilitate necessary social change. He recommended expanded trade and investment, increased technical aid, and cultural exchanges. Beyond that, he believed that the United States should not only help develop Latin America's economic infrastructure but also encourage democratic governments. Toward that end, he believed that U.S. aid should emphasize long-term development projects. He also stressed the need for better educational opportunities, better sanitation, and better health care. Milton made subsequent trips to Latin America in 1958 and 1960. He presented his views on inter-American relations in The Wine Is Bitter (1963). Influenced by Milton's initial report, the Eisenhower administration "doubled the flow of private and public capital," strengthened the role of the Organization of American States, promoted common markets, and established the Inter-American Bank (founded to make loans with conditions requiring social reform). The legislation and international agreements that JOHN F. KENNEDY would later call the Alliance for Progress were already enacted or well under way by the end of the Eisenhower administration.

When the president suffered a heart attack in 1955, a minor boomlet developed in support of Milton as the Republican candidate in 1956 if his brother could not run. The New York Herald Tribune, the Chicago Sun-Times, and three Republican governors came out in favor of Milton if Dwight were not available. A poll of Republican state chairmen indicated substantial support for Ike's younger brother. The president himself had long regarded Milton as "the most highly qualified man in the United States to be president," but Ike doubted that his younger brother was physically strong enough and thought that the American people would resent anything that appeared to create a dynasty. The boom proved embarrassing to Milton, and Ike's remarkable recovery put an end to speculation about the need for a successor.

As close as they were, the two brothers did not always agree. For example, Milton at times urged his brother to denounce Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). The president thought that such a course would elevate McCarthy, give him the publicity on which he thrived, and possibly rally the Senate to defend one of its own against the executive.

Despite his efforts to remain quietly in the background, Milton's role at times attracted public attention. He became a favorite target of conservative critics of the administration, who blamed him for what they regarded as the liberal bent of the administration. They pointed to his years of service to the New Deal as proof of his left-leaning views. McCarthy on several occasions attacked Milton's role in the administration. In January 1957, McCarthy denounced Milton as an "extreme radical" who "tops the list" of the "motley crowd" that influenced the president. Ironically, in his desperate search for an issue on which to attack the president in 1956, ADLAI STEVENSON, the Democratic nominee, charged that Milton used his influence to gain support for right-wing dictators in Latin America. Attacks on his brother, toward whom he had always felt protective, ignited Ike's legendary temper. In response to Stevenson's allegations, Ike broke from his usual practice of avoiding direct references to personalities and leveled a blast at Stevenson, who had failed to get his facts straight.

The death of his wife in 1955 left Milton devastated. He left Penn State in May 1956, and in July of that year accepted the presidency of Johns Hopkins University. During his years at Johns Hopkins, the school thrived, and Eisenhower enjoyed great popularity with the students, faculty, and trustees. On his watch, the endowment had doubled, the income tripled, and the university built and paid for buildings worth $75 million. When he retired in 1967 with the position of president emeritus, faculty salaries were fourth-highest in the nation, and the institution's place as one of the country's great universities was secure. These achievements brought him great satisfaction. Under Milton Eisenhower's unfortunate successor, the university's fortunes turned down. By 1971, the institution faced student unrest, a large budget deficit, salary freezes, and cutbacks in positions. The faculty revolted. The trustees asked Eisenhower to return to active leadership on an interim basis. Students and the faculty joined in urging Eisenhower to return. He did and turned the situation at Hopkins around within a year, at which point he stepped down again.

Milton's public service continued after his brother left the White House. During Kennedy's presidency, he negotiated with Fidel Castro for the release of prisoners taken at the Bay of Pigs. LYNDON JOHNSON chose him to chair the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence. Milton remained active in Republican politics and strongly opposed the more conservative direction it took beginning in 1964. He supported Sen. Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., a liberal Republican from Maryland, and endorsed John Anderson's bid for the presidency in 1980.

Eisenhower published something of a political memoir, The President Is Calling, in 1974, which he intended to advance his ideas about the need for structural reform in government. He died on May 2, 1985.

Ellender, Allen J(oseph)

(1890–1972) U.S. senator; chairman, Agriculture and Forestry Committee

Born in Montegut, La., on Sept. 24, 1890, Allen Ellender graduated from Saint Aloysius College in New Orleans and earned a law degree from Tulane University in 1913. While in his twenties, he served as district attorney of Terrebonne Parish and established himself as the area's leading potato farmer. In 1924, Ellender won election to the state House of Representatives as a Democratic opponent of Huey P. Long, but he soon allied himself with the governor's populist administration. Emerging as a key figure in the Long machine, Ellender was Speaker of the House when Long, then a U.S. senator, was assassinated in 1935. Long's widow filled his unexpired term, and Ellender won election to the vacant seat in 1936. In office, he was appointed to the Agriculture Committee and coauthored the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1937.

Abandoning Long-style populism early in his Senate career, Ellender became known chiefly as a spokesman for his state's wealthy sugar, rice, and cotton growers, whose interests he protected on the Agriculture Committee. As committee chairman during all but two years of the Eisenhower administration, he was particularly energetic in attempting to revise U.S. sugar marketing quotas to make them more favorable to domestic producers. In 1955, Ellender introduced legislation restricting the importation of lower-cost sugar from the Caribbean and thus guaranteed American growers a larger share of the domestic market. Five years later, in response to the confiscation of American-owned property by the Castro regime in Cuba, he helped secure the suspension of Cuban sugar quotas. Ellender also used his control of the Agriculture Committee to block the Eisenhower administration's attempt to lower price supports on basic farm commodities to bring them closer to world prices. Congress enacted most of the administration's program of flexible price supports in 1954. Two years later, Ellender pushed through a bill restoring high, rigid supports on basic crops, but Eisenhower vetoed the measure.

Although a staunch southern conservative on most domestic issues, Ellender was an advocate of closer relations with the USSR and a critic of defense spending. In 1957, after a 28-nation trip abroad, he issued a controversial report praising Soviet society and attacking the whole concept of foreign aid as an "abysmal failure."

During the 1960s, Ellender continued to play a major role in the shaping of agriculture policy, while leading southern opposition to civil rights legislation. His long tenure increased his power in the Senate, and in 1971 he resigned the chairmanship of the Agriculture Committee to become chairman of the key Appropriations Committee. At the time of his death in Bethesda, Md., on July 27, 1972, Ellender was president pro tempore of the Senate and third in the line of presidential succession.

Engle, Clair

(1911–1964) U.S. congressman and senator; chairman, Interior and Insular Affairs Committee

Engle was born in Bakersfield, Calif., on September 21, 1911. He received an LL.B. degree from the University of California in 1933. The following year, he won election as a county district attorney, the youngest in California's history. Reelected in 1938 and cited by state's attorney general, EARL WARREN, for his aggressiveness, Engle spent one term in the state Senate before successfully running as a Democrat for the U.S. House of Representatives in a special election in 1943. His district was the nation's largest, covering one-third of California from the Mojave Desert to Oregon. Engle specialized in water resources legislation and sponsored every expansion of the California Central Valley Reclamation Project between 1943 and 1957. In 1952, he wrote a pioneer authorization for research into conversion of salt water to fresh water. Engle was assigned to the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee in 1951. The following year, he chaired an Interior Affairs Subcommittee examining proposals to build a federal hydroelectric dam in Hells Canyon, Idaho. His astute questioning of witnesses on water rights resulted in the committee's unanimous vote against the power project. In 1953, he became ranking Democrat on the Interior and Insular Affairs panel.

Engle supported statehood for Hawaii in March 1953 and testified in its favor at Senate hearings. A strong opponent of racial discrimination, he supported the administration's civil rights bill in 1957. When President Eisenhower threatened to veto the measure in August after it had been weakened in the Senate, Engle charged that the chief executive was trying to maximize political mileage by appealing to both supporters and opponents of civil rights.

In 1955, Engle became chairman of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee and assistant Democratic whip. As chairman, he backed the development of public power. In June 1956, Engle said that, according to legal views cited by the Library of Congress, the federal government could build power projects in Hells Canyon even though the Federal Power Commission had given the right to a private company. His committee then passed a Hells Canyon bill, but opponents of public power killed it in the Senate. During the same year, Engle backed a bill authorizing $760 million for Upper Colorado River reclamation and a power project backed by the administration. The bill was signed into law in April 1956.

Engle entered the race in 1958 for the Senate seat vacated by WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND. In an election complicated by California's cross-filing system, which permitted candidates to run as both Democrats and Republicans, Engle defeated Republican Gov. GOODWIN KNIGHT for the Democratic senatorial nomination and in the November election. Sen. Engle was assigned to committees on armed services, small business, and interstate commerce. In January 1959, the liberal freshman participated in a move to limit anti-civil rights filibustering. This effort failed when the Senate leadership succeeded in substituting a much weaker measure that did not offend Southerners.

In 1960, Engle led opposition to the Senate's ratification of the U.S.-Soviet Antarctica Treaty, which pledged "peaceful use" of the frozen continent. Testifying in June before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Engle charged the pact did not insure against secret Soviet military operations and gave the USSR equal rights in an area where the United States had been predominant. Two months later, the Senate ratified the treaty.

Engle generally supported President JOHN F. KENNEDY's legislative program. He received a 100 percent rating from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action in 1961. Engle fell ill in 1963 and required repeated brain surgery. He voted from a wheelchair for the Johnson administration's landmark civil rights bill in June 1964. He died in Washington, D.C., on July 30, 1964.

Ervin, Sam(uel) J(ames), Jr.

(1896–1985) U.S. senator

Born in Morgantown, N.C., on September 27, 1896, Ervin received an A.B. degree from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1917. Following service in the army during World War I, he was admitted to the North Carolina bar in 1918. Ervin then enrolled at Harvard and obtained his LL.B. degree there in 1922.

Ervin returned to Morgantown, where he intermittently practiced law for 30 years. A Democrat, he was elected to the North Carolina General Assembly three times during the mid-1920s and early-1930s. After sitting on the Burke Co. Criminal Court from 1935 to 1937, he was appointed to the North Carolina Superior Court in 1937, where he served for six years. He returned to private practice in 1943. In January 1946, Ervin won a special election to fill a vacancy in the U.S. House of Representatives created by the death of his brother, but he did not run for reelection the following fall. In February 1948, he was appointed an associate justice of the North Carolina Supreme Court.

The governor of North Carolina appointed Ervin to fill a vacant Senate seat in June 1954. Because of Ervin's judicial experience, Minority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) tapped him to serve on a special six-member select committee created to investigate censure charges against Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Ervin did not participate extensively in the questioning of witnesses during the panel's hearings. In September he concurred with the committee's recommendation to censure McCarthy. On November 10, as the Senate began its deliberations on the committee's recommendation, McCarthy inserted in the Congressional Record a statement asserting that the panel "had done the work of the Communist Party" and had "imitated Communist methods." Eight days later, Ervin made an unusually sharp attack on his colleague from Wisconsin, declaring that, if McCarthy believed these charges, he had "mental delusions," and, if he did not, he was suffering from "moral incapacity."

A strict constructionist, Ervin regarded himself as a defender of the rights of individuals and of the states under the Constitution against encroachment by federal government. He opposed government attacks upon southern racial discrimination as threats to these rights. In 1956, Ervin asserted that segregation was "not the offspring of racial bigotry or racial prejudice" but the result of the exercise of "a fundamental American freedom—the freedom of selecting one's associates." In 1957, he opposed the Eisenhower administration's civil rights bill, designed to protect black voting rights, claiming that it infringed upon the constitutional right of the states to determine voter qualifications. Ervin succeeded in weakening the measure by amending it to guarantee a jury trial in the cases of those accused of violating a court order and intimidating or coercing voters. Three years later, he participated in a southern filibuster against another administration civil rights bill, designed to protect black voting rights, which he denounced as giving special privileges to racially defined groups. At the Democratic National Convention in July 1960, Ervin unsuccessfully fought against the inclusion of a civil rights plank in the party platform.

If Ervin's constitutional arguments seemed a mere rationalization for racial discrimination, he did, on occasion, vote with liberals on issues relating to civil liberties. In the Jencks decision of June 1957, the Supreme Court ruled that defendants were entitled to see statements of prosecution witnesses. Many members of Congress criticized the Court, but Ervin defended the ruling, and in August he voted against Sen. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN's (R-Ill.) proposals aimed at limiting the effects of the decision. In April 1958, Ervin joined a nine-to-five majority of the Judiciary Committee that rejected an amendment applying the federal security program to nonsensitive as well as sensitive jobs.

Ervin's commitment to civil libertarianism had narrowly defined limits, and he opposed the reversal of criminal convictions based on procedural technicalities. For example, in June 1957, the Supreme Court established the so-called Mallory rule when it overturned a rape conviction on the ground that there had been unnecessary delay before arraignment. Fourteen months later, Ervin unsuccessfully proposed that trial judges be empowered to determine whether delays were reasonable and to make their decisions binding on appellate courts if founded upon substantial evidence.

Ervin was generally unsympathetic to organized labor. He opposed the repeal of state right-to-work laws. In 1957, Ervin was appointed to the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, which investigated corruption in the Teamsters and other unions for the next three years. In 1959, he and Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) introduced a bill aimed at cleaning up the kind of labor racketeering and labor-management collusion exposed by the investigation. The measure contained provisions to eliminate corruption and ensure fair elections. Fearing that it would weaken support for the bill, the two men deliberately did not deal with major provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act affecting rights in collective bargaining. The Senate passed the measure with little modification in April. However, the House changed it dramatically. Finally enacted in September as the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, the bill also extended the Taft-Hartley Act's prohibitions against secondary boycotts.

During the early 1960s, Ervin opposed federal aid to parochial schools on the ground that it violated the constitutional separation of church and state. Although he continued to oppose most social welfare and civil rights legislation, Ervin earned the admiration of liberals in the late-1960s and early-1970s for his opposition to Richard Nixon's Omnibus D.C. Crime Bill, his probe of army surveillance of civilians, and his role in 1973 as chairman of the Watergate Committee. He declined to run for reelection in 1974. Ervin returned to North Carolina, where he practiced law and wrote. He died in Winston-Salem, N.C., on April 23, 1985.

Fairless, Benjamin F(ranklin)

(1890–1962) chairman of the board, United States Steel Corporation; president, American Iron and Steel Institute

The son of poor Welsh immigrants, Benjamin Williams was born in Pigeon Run, Ohio, on May 3, 1890. His parents sent him to live with his aunt and uncle, Sarah and Jacob Fairless, at the age of five to provide access to better schooling. The Fairless family later adopted him and legally changed his name to Fairless. Benjamin worked his way through Ohio Northern University and, following his graduation in 1913, went to work as a surveyor for the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railroad. Soon after, however, he joined the Central Steel Co. as a civil engineer. Fairless rose rapidly, becoming president and general manager in 1928. When his company and several others merged to form the Republic Steel Corp. in 1930, he became its executive vice president. Fairless became president of the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corp. in 1935. In January 1938, he was elected president and chairman of the executive committee of its parent company, U.S. Steel.

During World War II, Fairless served on various advisory boards, including the Iron and Steel Industry Advisory Committee and the War Production Board. In the postwar years, he defended U.S. Steel against government investigations of monopolistic trends. He criticized those who thought there was “something inherently vicious in bigness and growth and success” and described detractors of big business as people who “think small.” During 1952, Fairless helped negotiate the settlement of a 55-day strike that crippled the industry.

In May 1952, Fairless was elected chairman of the board and chief executive officer of U.S. Steel. He held these positions until May 1955, when he retired at the age of 65. He was subsequently named chairman of the executive advisory committee and continued as a member of the board. That same year, he became president of the American Iron and Steel Institute (AISI).

Fairless often represented the industry before government committees and served on various presidential committees. Early in 1955, he appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, during a “friendly” study of the stock market, to detail financial problems faced by U.S. Steel. He stressed restoration of “investor confidence” as a major concern. In late 1955, he served on a task force, established by presidential disarmament adviser HAROLD E. STASSEN, to study the role of the steel industry in determining disarmament policies. The steel industry executive also became a member of the presidential board of consultants to monitor and evaluate U.S. intelligence operations.

In 1954, Eisenhower named Fairless to head the Citizens Advisers on the Mutual Security Program. The panel was to study issues relating to the U.S. foreign-aid programs, especially those posed by a Soviet shift from direct intervention to the use of economic aid to extend its influence. During 1956–57, the committee made a 52-day tour of 21 countries. Its report, issued in March 1957, urged the continuation of the program. While acknowledging that military assistance was vital to prevent Communist expansion, the panel maintained that economic development was as important for future security. It recommended that economic aid be focused on long-term development and urged the formation of regional markets such as the European Economic Community. The advisers concluded that “foreign investment of private capital is far more desirable than investment by government” and urged increasing incentives for such investment “by providing more equitable taxation of foreign business income.” The report also urged that foreign-aid programs be presented to each Congress, rather than to each session, to permit more efficient planning and utilization of funds.

Fairless continued to represent big steel through the remainder of the decade and conferred with Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON in 1959 in an unsuccessful effort to avert a steel strike. He remained AISI president until his death in Ligonier, Pa., on January 1, 1962.

Farland, Joseph S(impson)

(1914–2007) ambassador to the Dominican Republic, ambassador to Panama

The son of a banker, Farland was born in Clarksburg, W.Va., on August 11, 1914. He graduated from West Virginia University in 1936 and earned his law degree from the same institution two years later. Admitted to the bar, he practiced law in West Virginia until he became an FBI agent in 1942. Commissioned an officer in the navy in 1944, he did research on strategic issues relating to Asia. In 1946, Farland returned to West Virginia and became president of his father-in-law's coal company, Christopher Fuel Corporation. He also founded Farland Fuel Company and Farland Coal Corporation.

In 1956, Farland, who had been active in Republican politics in West Virginia, became deputy director of the Mutual Security Agency. The next year, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER nominated Farland to be ambassador to the Dominican Republic. The Senate confirmed him in May 1957. Farland failed to establish good relations with the Dominican Republic's dictator, Rafael Trujillo.

The ambassador made little secret of his distaste for Trujillo's authoritarian regime and met with dissidents.

Because of Farland's inability to deal with Trujillo, Eisenhower removed him from the Dominican Republic in 1960 and named him ambassador to Panama. The Senate confirmed the appointment in June 1960. Farland sympathized with Panamanian peasants and found fault with American foreign-aid programs. The ambassador objected to the policy of granting foreign aid to governments rather than private groups, which he believed prevented money from reaching the local level. He also was impatient with the State Department's bureaucracy, which insisted on surveys and other procedures that Farland thought delayed aid. During his tenure, Farland built roads so that small farmers could get their produce to market. He also helped Panamanians build vocational schools, low-income housing, and medical facilities.

Farland continued as ambassador to Panama under the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY. The Kennedy administration rejected Farland's suggestion that Panamanians be given increased control of the Canal Zone, and the ambassador resigned in July 1963. Shortly after his departure, the New Republic praised him as “a figure from the romance of what we would like the American abroad to be.”

Upon leaving the State Department, Farland joined the Washington law firm of Surrey and Morse. In 1964, he headed an advisory panel on Latin American affairs for BARRY GOLDWATER, the Republican nominee for the presidency. After the campaign, Farland returned to his law firm. President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him ambassador to Pakistan in 1969. In that capacity, he participated in a ruse that kept secret the meeting in July 1971 between HENRY A. KISSINGER, Nixon's National Security Advisor, and Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai), the Chinese premier. That meeting laid the groundwork for Nixon's trip to China in February 1972. Farland became ambassador to Iran in 1972 and left the foreign service in 1973, after which he returned to the private practice of law. He died at his home in Winchester, Va., on January 28, 2007.

Fast, Howard M(elvin)(1914–2003) writer

Born to Jewish parents in New York City on November 11, 1914, Fast spent his youth in self-described “utter poverty.” He applied for service in the navy while still in his mid-teens but was rejected because of his age. Subsequently, he spent years drifting from job to job, mixing with multitudes of people, “fighting,” and, most of all, reading. In his autobiography, The Naked God, Fast marked 1932, a year when he worked in a Harlem branch of the New York Public Library, as the point when his career as a writer truly opened up. Between the years 1932 and 1944, he wrote 13 books, including novels, biographies, stories, and juvenile publications. He showed particular interest in writing historical novels that probed the American past for new perspectives. They included Two Valleys (1933), about the frontier during the American Revolution; Conceived in Liberty (1939), which dealt with a private at Valley Forge; The Unvanquished (1942), concerning the development of George Washington as a leader; Citizen Tom Paine (1943); and Freedom Road (1944), the story of an African American who becomes a member of Congress during Reconstruction. He also wrote Spartacus (1951), a best-seller, which in 1960 was made into a film starring Kirk Douglas and directed by Stanley Kubrick. By the early 1940s, Fast’s books were accumulating both critical praise and a substantial readership. During World War II, he worked for the Office of War Information.

In 1943, Fast became a member of the U.S. Communist Party, a commitment that drastically altered his career. Long before 1943, he had attended meetings of communist and radical groups, and in that year he firmly “came to accept the proposition that the truest and most consistent fighters in the anti-fascist struggle were the Communists.” His full commitment to the party came at a time when the majority of American writers on the Left had long since abandoned the organization.

In 1949, the Civil Right Congress, a communist front group, scheduled a fund-raising concert in Peekskill, N.Y., at which the black singer PAUL ROBESON was the leading attraction. In a speech he gave not long before the scheduled concert, Robeson urged African Americans not to fight in a war against the Soviet Union. The remarks touched off a firestorm. Led by the local American Legion, hundreds of World War II veterans blocked roads, rocked cars, and threatened would-be concert goers, leading to cancellation of the event. When the concert was rescheduled, the governor of New York, THOMAS E. DEWEY, sent hundreds of state police to protect the concert, which went on in spite of a furious protest by a mob of veterans. After the concert, the veterans stoned the cars of those leaving the event. Although the police arrested the local officers of the American Legion, a grand jury refused to indict. Fast claimed, somewhat nonsensically given the facts, that “the Peekskill affair was an important step in the preparation for the fascization of America and for the creation of receptive soil for promulgation of World War III.” After that time, Fast’s name was regularly invoked as “the public face” of American Communists. In 1950, he was called before the House Committee of Un-American Activities (HUAC) as a member of the Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee. He was charged with contempt for refusing to answer the committee’s questions and served a short time in prison in 1950. He ran a symbolic and futile campaign for Congress in 1952 on the American Labor Party ticket.

In 1953, Fast was called before Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY’s (R-Wis.) Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations to testify on such subjects as alleged subversive books in the U.S. State Department libraries and alleged sabotage of Voice of America (VOA) broadcasts in Europe. As a result of the hearings, his books were removed from the libraries. McCarthy admonished VOA officials for suggesting that a few of his works might be suitable for overseas readers.

Although often vilified in America during the early 1950s, Fast was a literary hero in the USSR. The Soviets credited him with creating true “proletarian heroes” in his books and with portraying American history in a light favorable to a communist perspective. By his own account, millions of his books were printed in the USSR, two of his plays were performed there, and one of his books was transformed into an opera. In addition, two book-length critical studies of his work were published in the Soviet Union. In 1953, the Soviet government awarded Fast the Stalin Peace Prize. Meanwhile,

Fast found himself blacklisted in the United States. His books generally went out of print, and he could not find publishers for his new works. Only certain of his earlier works were still deemed suitable reading according to reviewers and publishers.

A dedicated communist, Fast wrote for party publications, attended meetings and conventions, and contributed considerable sums to party coffers until 1956. At that time, he broke from the organization after the publicity over what he termed the “revelations” in Nikita Khrushchev’s report to the Russian Twentieth Congress, which detailed the atrocities of Stalin’s dictatorship. Fast made no public pronouncement of his renunciation of communism until 1957. Later that year, he published The Naked God, a loosely constructed autobiography that attempted to explain his journey from “fellow traveler” to “deserter.” He was called again to testify before HUAC in 1957 to serve as a public example of a “reformed” American communist.

During the late-1950s and the 1960s, Fast again found a market for his writing. He continued to publish novels, stories, and plays, worked in Hollywood, and contributed to mainstream American publications such as the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies’ Home Journal.

Fast published a memoir, Being Red, in 1990. He died in Greenwich, Conn., on March 12, 2003.

Faubus, Orval E(ugene)

(1910–1994) governor of Arkansas

The son of a socialist and liberal Democrat, Faubus was born on January 7, 1910, in Combs, a town in the Ozark mountains of northwestern Arkansas. He worked as a schoolteacher and itinerant fruit picker while attending State Vocational High School at Huntsville. Following graduation Faubus found employment in the lumber industry in Washington State. In 1936, he returned to Arkansas and ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic nomination for representative to the state assembly. He was elected Madison Co. circuit clerk in 1938 and reelected in 1940. Faubus served with distinction during World War II. He entered the army as a private in 1942 and left it in 1946 as a major. In May 1946, he became acting postmaster in Huntsville, Ark. He bought the Madison County Record in 1947. Serving as both editor and publisher, he built the paper into the third-largest weekly in the state. During the gubernatorial campaign of 1948, Faubus and his paper supported the liberal Sidney McMath. After winning the election, McMath appointed Faubus to the state highway commission and to a salaried position as an administrative adviser to the governor. In March 1951, McMath named Faubus director of the Arkansas Highway Department. When McMath lost the Democratic primary in 1952, Faubus returned to his newspaper.

Denouncing incumbent Gov. FRANCIS CHERRY as the tool of special interests, Faubus defeated him in the Democratic gubernatorial primary in August 1954 and went on to win a two-year term in November. As governor, he instituted a populist program of social reform and economic development. Under his direction, the legislature reformed welfare laws, established a conservation commission, increased mental health facilities, and formed the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission, chaired by Winthrop Rockefeller, to encourage the industrialization of the state. Under Faubus, Arkansas also began complying with the Supreme Court’s decision of 1954 that struck down segregation in public schools. Six out of seven state colleges were desegregated, as were schools in Fayetteville, Hoxi, and Charleston. Faubus cautiously avoided taking any position on desegregation.

Seeking a second term in 1956, Faubus faced a segregationist, Jim Johnson. Faubus began to modify his stand on racial integration. Following a statewide survey indicating that 85 percent of the people opposed desegregation, he announced that he “could not be a party to any attempt to force acceptance of change to which the people were so overwhelmingly opposed.” During the fall, the governor campaigned for a law giving the state power to assign pupils to school by race and a resolution interposing state law against federal acts deemed illegal. Both measures passed, and Faubus won reelection. Faubus openly opposed forced integration and favored local option. Yet none of his proposals would have penalized communities that integrated their schools, and he consistently rejected calls to nullify the Supreme Court’s decision.

Following the Little Rock School Board's decision to integrate Central High School in the fall of 1957, the Capital Citizens' Council launched an intensive propaganda campaign demanding that the governor intervene to prevent bloodshed and preserve segregation. On the other hand, Little Rock's school superintendent, VIRGIL BLOSSOM, asked the governor for a public commitment to law, order, and peaceful desegregation. Faubus steadfastly refused to take a public stand on the issue. Behind the scenes, he unsuccessfully attempted to persuade the Justice Department to intervene to delay desegregation.

Fearing that the matter would injure his chance for election to a third term, Faubus adopted a more extreme position. After attempts to delay desegregation through court action had failed, he ordered the National Guard to prevent the admission of black students to Central High School on September 2. Two days later, the Arkansas National Guard blocked the entry of nine black students. At this point, Judge Ronald N. Davies invited the Justice Department to join the case as a friend of the court. Lawyers from the Justice Department filed a petition requesting a preliminary injunction against Faubus and the commanding officers of the National Guard. Davies granted a temporary restraining order and set a full hearing for September 20.

In the meantime, Rep. BROOKS HAYS (D-Ark.), a moderate who represented the district that included Little Rock, offered to act as an intermediary between Faubus and the president. His efforts led to a meeting between Eisenhower and Faubus on September 14. Eisenhower believed that he had reached an accord with Faubus that the governor would instruct the guard to preserve order but to permit the black students to enter the school. Faubus first proved himself untrustworthy in the public statement he released after the meeting. Moreover, Faubus neither withdrew the guard nor changed their orders. After the hearing on September 20, Davies enjoined Faubus and officers of the guard from interfering with the court's order to desegregate Central High. Faubus withdrew the guard.

On the following Monday, September 23, a large mob converged on Central High. Authorities slipped eight black students past the mob and into Central High. News that the black students had entered the school intensified the rioting, and after three hours, the mob threatened to overwhelm the police guarding the school. Authorities decided to withdraw the black students. That evening, Eisenhower went on national television and condemned "the disgraceful occurrences of today." The orders of a federal court, he warned, could not "be flouted with impunity." He then issued a proclamation commanding "all persons engaged in such obstruction to cease and desist." The next morning, a mob once again gathered at Central High. After conferring with the White House, Mayor Woodrow Wilson Mann sent a wire requesting federal intervention. Eisenhower federalized the Arkansas National Guard and sent a thousand paratroopers from the 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock. On September 25, federal troops escorted the black students through a white mob and into the school. The highly trained, battle-hardened veterans of the 101st controlled the mob, and no one was seriously injured. Federal troops remained in Little Rock through November, but the guard remained throughout the school year.

Faubus took an increasingly demagogic position on school desegregation and easily won the Democratic primary in July 1958, assuring that he would be the first governor of Arkansas in 50 years to serve a third term. In August, the state legislature passed several bills granting the governor broad authority to prevent integration. On September 12, the Supreme Court, sitting in special session, ruled against a request by Little Rock's school board to delay desegregation. Faubus responded by signing the segregation bills passed by the state legislature and invoking the authority they granted him to close Little Rock's public schools. In late September, the citizens of Little Rock voted to close their schools rather than integrate them. The city's schools remained closed for a year. By early 1959, civic and business elites in Little Rock mobilized against the school closings. In a recall election, three moderates won reelection to the school board and three segregationists lost. The new school board voted to reopen the city's schools.

His defiance of federal authority made Faubus a hero to segregationists and a celebrity; he won reelection in 1960, 1962, and 1964. After retiring in 1967, Faubus attempted comebacks in 1970 and 1974 but lost both times in the Democratic primary. He died on December 14, 1994, in Conway, Ark.

Ferguson, Homer

Ferguson was born on February 25, 1889, in Harrison City, Pa. He attended the University of Pittsburgh from 1910 to 1911 and received a law degree from the University of Michigan in 1913. Upon graduation, he was admitted to the bar and began to practice law in Detroit. He ran unsuccessfully for the state senate in 1926, but was appointed to a vacant judicial position on the Wayne County Circuit Court in 1929. He won election to that position the following year and reelection in 1935 and 1941. During this time, he also taught at the Detroit College of Law (1929–39). In 1939, he was appointed to sit as the sole member of a special grand jury to investigate corruption in the municipal government. His investigation resulted in over 300 indictments and the convictions of, among others, an ex-mayor, many high police officials, and a number of underworld figures. Ferguson emerged from the investigation with a reputation as an honest, dogged, and effective prosecutor. In 1942, he narrowly defeated the Democratic incumbent, Prentiss M. Brown, for a seat in the U.S. Senate.

In the Senate, Ferguson established himself as an aggressive investigator but an undistinguished legislator. In 1943, he was appointed to the Special Senate Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program, chaired by HARRY S. TRUMAN. Ferguson also served on the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack in 1945–46. He joined with Sen. Ralph Owen Brewster (R-Maine) in a minority report challenging the majority's conclusion that blame rested with the military field commanders. Ferguson and Brewster contended that "high authorities in Washington" shared responsibility. During his early years in the Senate, Ferguson opposed most New Deal and Fair Deal measures proposed by Franklin D. Roosevelt and Truman. On foreign policy, he tended toward isolationism and protectionism. All in all, he was a typical Midwestern conservative Republican. He won reelection in 1948.

As the cold war took shape, Ferguson became one of the first senators to raise the issue of communist subversion in government. He also supported legislation to require the registration of members of the American Communist Party. His efforts, however, were soon overshadowed by more spectacular anticommunists, most notably Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Although Ferguson initially supported McCarthy, he refrained from the sensational tactics favored by the junior senator from Wisconsin.

When ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) died and WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) replaced him as majority leader, Ferguson assumed the chairmanship of the Republican Policy Committee in June 1953. By this time, Ferguson had begun to distance himself from McCarthy, and he voted for the resolution to condemn McCarthy in December 1954. As part of the Republican congressional leadership, Ferguson moved closer to the administration's positions on many issues. For example, he initially led the opposition to the confirmation of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the USSR. A career diplomat, Bohlen had served as an adviser at the Yalta Conference in 1945. Like other conservative Republicans, Ferguson regarded him as a symbol of what they believed to be a "sellout" at Yalta and a representative of the "Truman-Acheson crowd" in the State Department. When it became clear, however, that the administration would not withdraw the nomination, he voted in favor of confirmation. Similarly, Ferguson reversed his position on the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the power of the executive to enter into treaties and other international agreements. Ferguson had supported the measure since it was first introduced by JOHN W. BRICKER (R-Ohio) in 1951. Faced with determined opposition from President Eisenhower, Ferguson worked with Knowland to find a compromise. The Senate narrowly rejected the Bricker amendment and then rejected the proposals put forward by Knowland and Ferguson. Ferguson also came to support the administration on foreign aid, immigration of refugees, and trade policy.

Ferguson narrowly lost his bid for reelection in 1954 to PATRICK V. McNAMARA, a union official who had the support of Michigan's labor organizations. He served briefly as a legal consultant to the Department of Defense until Eisenhower named him ambassador to the Philippines in March 1955. In February 1956, Eisenhower appointed him an associate judge on the U.S. Court of Military Appeals. He took senior judge status in 1971. As a judge on the Court of Military Appeals, he consistently supported the constitutional rights of members of the armed services. Ferguson retired in 1976 and moved to Grosse Pointe, Mich., where he lived until his death on December 17, 1982.

Fiedler, Leslie A(ron)

(1917–2003) writer, educator

The son of a Jewish pharmacist, Fiedler was born in Newark, N.J., on March 8, 1917. He began his interest in politics as a child. At 12, he read Thoreau and the following year Marx. As a student, Fiedler took part in pacifist and labor demonstrations, but he described his involvement as “tourism” that entailed no risks. Fiedler attended New York University, graduating magna cum laude with a B.A. in English in 1938. He did his graduate work at the University of Wisconsin, receiving his Ph.D. in English in 1941. That year he joined the faculty of Montana State University (later the University of Montana). During World War II, he served as a Japanese translator in the Pacific theater.

After the war, Fiedler returned to Montana State, where he immediately established a reputation for iconoclasm, offering a unique perspective on the American literary past that was both scorned and admired. In three collections of essays—An End to Innocence (1955), Love and Death in the American Novel (1960), and No! In Thunder: Essays on Myth and Literature (1960)—he traced patterns in American literature and contended that the bulk of American novelists clearly had been unable to write convincingly of mature, heterosexual love because they, like most Americans, were crippled by adolescent views of sexuality. American readers were often presented with an “innocent, homoerotic relationship between a white and a non-white male.” American writers—mostly white males—clung to this “last believed-in stronghold of life without passion” in order to justify their hatred of the “Fallen Woman” (one who feels and demonstrates passion). Concurrently, the portrayal of such relationships assuaged the guilt these writers felt for America's destruction of its non-whites. In the absence of such a relationship, readers were likely to find themes of pathological obsessions—rape, murder, betrayal—but rarely fully realized, honest, loving relationships.

Fiedler's view of the hypocrisy in American literary claims to innocence extended to his perspectives on American political events. Always politically minded as an author and educator, he wrote numerous articles in the 1950s that helped shape the general intellectual climate. Fiedler argued that members of the communist party were agents of a foreign power, rather than members of a legitimate dissenting group. Thus, he regarded Truman's Loyalty Program as an unfortunate necessity. He also charged that liberals as well as radicals were deluded by a “dream of innocence” that held “the man of good will is identical with the righteous man.” Fiedler called on them to cast off their political innocence.

Perhaps Fiedler's most influential articles were three collected in An End to Innocence: “Hiss, Chambers and the Age of Innocence” (1950), “Afterthoughts on the Rosenbergs” (1953), and “McCarthy and the Intellectuals” (1954). The evidence against the Rosenbergs, wrote Fiedler, was “overwhelming.” Only those who felt a need to elevate them into martyred “victims of the class struggle and the Cold War” could ignore their “palpable guilt.” Fiedler was repelled by what he perceived to be the inauthenticity of the Rosenbergs. They had turned their lives and, indeed, their deaths, into “official clichés.” At the same time, he deplored the execution of the Rosenbergs as a violation of the principle of human mercy.

Fiedler disdained the refusal of the Rosenbergs or Hiss to confess. One might, he thought, have expected them “to cry out their faith proudly before the tribunal.” Instead, contrary to “their own early writings,” they pleaded that “they had never advocated revolution.” The betrayal of Hiss went beyond that. Fiedler regarded him as an ambitious member of the American elite who donated time to the Soviet Union to demonstrate that he had not “sold out” to the bourgeois world in which he was making a splendid career.” The fact that he profited immensely from the society he wanted to destroy made him Machiavellian rather than revolutionary. Further, for Fiedler, there was something juvenile about Hiss’s refusal to confess. “The qualifying act of moral adulthood,” wrote Fiedler, “is precisely this admission of responsibility for the past and its consequences.” Hiss, Fiedler pointed out, was on trial for perjury and not treason. He “need not even have gone to prison,” but, typical of the “Popular Front mind,” he preferred to “pose as the Victim.” Fiedler extended his indictment of Hiss to the whole generation of romantic liberals and radicals who were guilty not of struggling for a better world, “but for having substituted sentimentality for intelligence in that struggle.”

Although disgusted by Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), Fiedler declared that “to assess McCarthyism justly means to admit that good and evil are divided.” Fiedler rebuked liberals for intellectual arrogance, for the supposition that they were immune to “political error,” when, in fact, they had been wrong about communism. Liberals, wrote Fiedler, could not accept the “unpalatable truth” that “buffoons and bullies, those who know really nothing about the Soviet Union at all, were right—stupidly right. . . accidentally right, right for the wrong reasons, but damnably right.”

Increasingly unhappy at Montana State University, Fiedler left in 1963 to become a professor at the State University of New York at Buffalo. There he continued his prodigious output of literary and cultural criticism, novels, and short stories. In 1967, he was arrested and convicted of “maintaining a premise” where marijuana was used. The New York Court of Appeals overturned the conviction in 1972. In spite of his long hair and beard, Fiedler maintained a detached and wary view of the counterculture. Further, he had little patience with what he regarded as the political cant of the New Left. Revolutionary communism, which attracted some academics in the late 1960s, held even less appeal for Fiedler; he had his fling as a Trotskyist and Schachtmanite in his youth. In 1972, SUNY Buffalo created a special chair for Fiedler, making him the Samuel Langhorne Clemens professor of English. He died in Buffalo on January 28, 2003.

Finletter, Thomas K(night)

(1893–1980) attorney

A member of a prominent Philadelphia family and the son of a judge, Finletter was born in Philadelphia on November 11, 1893. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1915. After serving in the army during World War I, he received a law degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1920. Upon gaining admission to the New York Bar in 1921, he joined the elite Wall Street firm of Cravath, Henderson & DeGersdorff. Finletter moved to Coudert Brothers in 1927 as a partner. He joined the State Department as a special assistant to the secretary of state in 1941. Two years later, he was appointed executive director of the Office of Foreign Economic Coordination, which supervised economic planning in Allied-controlled areas. During World War II, Finletter was also a consultant to the committee laying the foundation for the UN. In 1945, he attended the San Francisco conference, at which the UN was founded, as an aide to ADLAI STEVENSON.

In July 1947, President Truman appointed Finletter chairman of the Air Policy Commission (later known as the Finletter commission), formed to study all phases of national aviation policy in relation to security needs. The committee report, issued in 1948 as “Survival in the Air Age,” predicted that by 1952, the Soviet Union would achieve nuclear and air parity with the United States. To meet the challenge, the report recommended that the United States expand the air force.

In May 1948, Finletter became chief of the Economic Administration Mission in London. He returned to Coudert Brothers in June 1949 but returned to government in April 1950 as secretary of the air force, a position he held until the end of the Truman administration. Although a supporter of a coordinated defense, Finletter emerged as the administration’s leading advocate of air power as a first deterrent.

Finletter supported Stevenson for president in 1952. In the years following Stevenson’s defeat, he headed an informal advisory panel, known as the “Finletter Group,” which met regularly to discuss issues and suggest positions Stevenson should take as “leader of the loyal opposition.” The group, which included ARTHUR SCHLESINGER JR., JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH, and CHESTER BOWLES, provided Stevenson with material on such issues as civil rights, foreign affairs, and civil liberties. Although Stevenson did not want this group considered his personal brain trust, as the election of 1956 drew closer, the panel started preparing positions for the upcoming campaign and policies for a potential Stevenson administration. During the campaign of 1956, Finletter headed the New York State Stevenson for President Committee.

In January 1957, Democratic National Chairman PAUL BUTLER organized the Democratic Advisory Council with Finletter as one of its members. The group was created to limit the power of congressional leaders Rep. SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and give liberals a greater voice in shaping legislative policy. However, the congressional leaders refused to join the panel, and so the council had little influence on legislation.

Finletter again actively supported Stevenson for president in 1960. He helped organize a draft-Stevenson movement and prepared speeches for the former governor, hoping they would get him the publicity needed to capture the nomination. Despite massive demonstrations for him at the convention, Stevenson never formally declared his candidacy, and his backers failed to win sufficient delegates to prevent Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY's (D-Mass.) nomination on the first ballot.

Throughout the 1950s, Finletter spoke and wrote on foreign policy and defense issues. His book, Power and Policy (1954), criticized what he regarded as a failure of leadership that forfeited America's nuclear superiority. Predicting that by 1956 the Soviet Union would have enough nuclear weapons to totally destroy the United States, he urged the Eisenhower administration to build up a massive nuclear deterrent to discourage attack. He argued against cuts in the defense budget and recommended increased spending, particularly for the air force, which would bear the main burden of defense. Finletter's conclusions about the relative strength of the United States and USSR were mistaken.

In 1955, Finletter came out in opposition to the administration's disarmament proposals, which called for a reduction, first in conventional forces and then in nuclear weapons, supervised by an elaborate inspection system. The former air force secretary questioned whether such a system could ever be effective in dealing with a large country such as the Soviet Union, which was also controlled by a secretive government. Instead, he advocated enforced disarmament backed by a UN military force strong enough to compel compliance. The United States would give up its major deterrent—nuclear weapons—only after the enforcement system was completely developed.

At the end of the decade, Finletter continued to attack the administration, claiming that the Russians were ahead of the United States in defense and space research. He was one of the Democrats who claimed that a "missile gap" existed between the United States and the Soviet Union, and he urged Americans to reorient their priorities to regain their superiority. According to Finletter, money had to be channeled from consumer goods to education, science, natural resource development, and armaments. In his opinion, this could best be accomplished if the United States were led by a liberal Democrat. Once again, Finletter's claims of Soviet superiority were unfounded. His position derived either from erroneous information, excessive partisanship, or both.

During the 1950s, Finletter was extremely active in New York politics. He sought the Democratic nomination for senator in 1958 but was turned down by Tammany boss CARMINE DESAPPIO. To fight what they considered a blatant exercise of machine power, Finletter, HERBERT LEHMAN, and ELEANOR ROOSEVELT organized the New York Committee for Democratic Voters the following year. In 1961, the reform candidate for mayor, ROBERT WAGNER JR., defeated Arthur Levitt, DeSapio's handpicked nominee, effectively ending the boss's power in New York.

President Kennedy appointed Finletter ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in 1961. He held that post until 1965, when he returned to law practice with Coudert Brothers. He retired in 1970, and died in New York City on April 24, 1980.

Flanders, Ralph E(dward)

(1880–1970) U.S. senator

Born into a family of modest means on September 28, 1880, in Barnet, Vt., Flanders moved with his parents to Rhode Island and attended public schools in several communities. After graduating from a country school, he became an apprentice machinist in Providence. He learned mechanical engineering and drafting in the shop and studied mechanical drawing at night school. He also studied engineering through a correspondence school. A working engineer, Flanders also published articles on machine designing. His articles led to an appointment in 1905 as associate editor of Machinery, a position that took him to New York. Flanders published a book, Gear-Cutting Machinery, in 1909. He returned to Vermont in 1910 to work for the Jones and Lamson Machine Company. In 1933, he succeeded his father-in-law as president of the company. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, he established a reputation as an industrialist who was concerned about economics and social problems. He advocated a responsible capitalism that would avoid drastic swings in production and employment and would provide higher standards of living for workers.

Flanders ran in the Republican primary for a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1940 but lost to GEORGE AIKEN. During World War II, he served in a number of federal agencies, including the Office of Price Administration, the Economic Stabilization Board, and the War Production Board. He was president of the Federal Reserve Board of Boston from 1944 to 1946. When Warren Austin (R-Vt.) resigned from the Senate in 1946, Vermont's governor appointed Flanders to fill the remaining months of Austin's term; later that year, he won election for a full term. He was reelected in 1952. While identified with the liberal wing of the Republican party, Flanders took a variety of positions that made him difficult to type. Although elected with the backing of organized labor, he supported the Taft-Hartley law, which labor opposed. In general, however, his record on domestic issues was liberal. A strong proponent of public housing, he voted for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing act. He also supported the Civil Rights Act of 1957. In 1954, he cosponsored, with Sen. IRVING IVES (R-N.Y.), a bill advocated by the administration to provide federal subsidies to reduce the cost of private health insurance. He also supported the Eisenhower administration's plan to provide aid to depressed areas. In foreign policy, he joined internationalist Republicans in supporting the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, the Selective Service Act of 1948, the nomination of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union, the Eisenhower Doctrine, and the Atoms for Peace Treaty. However, he opposed the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Treaty and supported the Bricker amendment, which would have restricted the treaty-making power of the president and which Eisenhower strongly opposed.

A strong anticommunist, Flanders was nevertheless appalled by the reckless charges of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). He criticized McCarthy in private but for the most part remained publicly silent. However, in early March 1954, after McCarthy turned his attack on the army, Flanders gave a speech in which he ridiculed the junior senator from Wisconsin: "He dons his war paint. He goes into his war dance. He emits his war-whoops. He goes forth to battle and proudly returns with the scalp of a pink army dentist." On June 1, with the Army-McCarthy hearings underway, Flanders compared McCarthy to Hitler and denounced him for spreading division and confusion. Flanders recognized that any move by the Senate to discipline McCarthy would have to be initiated by a Republican to avoid the appearance of partisanship. After giving notice to McCarthy, Flanders introduced a resolution on June 11 to strip McCarthy of his committee chairmanships. Many senators, including the Republican leadership and southern Democrats, opposed the measure on the ground that it would impinge on the seniority system. When the Senate Republican Policy Committee declared its unanimous opposition to the resolution, Flanders announced on July 16 that he intended to change his resolution to one calling for censure.

On the night of July 30, Flanders submitted a resolution charging McCarthy with refusing to answer questions about his finances before the Rules and Administration's Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections in 1952, with responsibility for the "irresponsible conduct" of two of McCarthy's aides (ROY COHN and G. DAVID SCHINE), and with abusing Gen. RALPH W. ZWICKER when the general appeared before McCarthy's subcommittee. Flanders and other senators subsequently added additional charges. The Senate voted on August

2 to refer the resolution to a special bipartisan committee. In November, the panel introduced a resolution to censure McCarthy for his refusal to appear before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections and for his abuse of Gen. Zwicker. The following month, the Senate voted to condemn McCarthy by a vote of 67-22. Flanders did not take a leading role in the debate.

Flanders chose not to seek reelection in 1958 and retired to Vermont to become a pig farmer. He published an autobiography, Senator from Vermont (1961), and lived quietly until his death in Springfield, Vt., on February 10, 1970.

Flemming, Arthur S(herwood)

(1905–1996) director, Office of Defense Mobilization; secretary, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

Born in Kingston, N.Y., on June 12, 1905, Flemming attended public schools and, after graduating from high school, worked for a year as a reporter before enrolling at Ohio Wesleyan University, from which he graduated in 1927. He then received a master's degree in political science from American University, where he taught government and served as debate coach. Flemming earned a law degree from George Washington University in 1933. The following year, he became director of American University's School of Public Affairs. He remained at this position until 1938, when he became executive officer of the university.

In 1939, Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Flemming to the Civil Service Commission. He held this position until 1948. During World War II, Flemming also served as chief of labor supply for the Office of Production Management and member of the War Manpower Commission. In 1947, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Flemming to the Hoover Commission, charged with evaluating the structure of the executive branch. Flemming left government service in 1948 to accept the presidency of Ohio Wesleyan University. Three years later, however, he took a leave of absence to become assistant to the director of Defense Mobilization, CHARLES WILSON, and chairman of the Manpower Policy Committee of the Office of Defense Mobilization (ODM). Both agencies supervised the organization of the nation's resources to fight the Korean War.

When President Eisenhower took office, he made ODM a permanent government agency and appointed Flemming its acting head. In June 1953, Flemming reluctantly accepted the directorship on a permanent basis. At that post, he prepared a comprehensive plan for national mobilization in the event of nuclear war. This included proposals for industrial mobilization, rationing, wage and price controls, and personnel training. He also prepared contingency plans in case of an oil shortage during the Suez Crisis of 1956. In February 1958, Flemming resigned his position with ODM and returned to Ohio Wesleyan as president. Throughout the Eisenhower administration, Flemming served on the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization. He chaired that body from 1958 to 1961.

Upon the resignation of MARION FOLSOM in mid-1958, Eisenhower appointed Flemming secretary of health, education, and welfare (HEW).

Arthur S. Flemming, secretary of health, education, and welfare, 1958–1961 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Eisenhower's selection drew the praise of many liberals and moderates who were impressed with Flemming's commitment to the social welfare programs of the past administrations. Conservatives were nevertheless satisfied because of his administrative skills and his support for a balanced budget.

Flemming's background and attitudes differed from those of many of the men in the president's cabinet, which was drawn largely from the ranks of business. A quiet, withdrawn man, he had risen through the government bureaucracy. Although described as an "endurable do-gooder" and "spender," Flemming was adept at political maneuvering and in dealing with Congress.

As secretary of HEW, Flemming advocated increased federal aid to education to meet what he viewed as America's weakness in science and mathematics after the Soviet launching of Sputnik during the fall of 1957. The National Defense Education Act, passed one month after Flemming took office, offered loans to college students, particularly those interested in teaching, as well as matching grants to schools of all levels for laboratories, textbooks, and other facilities. It also provided fellowships for graduate students. Flemming backed the measure but urged the repeal of the loyalty oath requirement for the loan program. Not satisfied with the scope of the bill, Flemming, in 1959, proposed a program to spur school construction through $5 billion in loans and matching grants over a five-year period. Flemming's bill and several more ambitious Democratic-sponsored measures were debated in Congress in 1959 and 1960, but none ever passed.

Soon after becoming secretary, Flemming became embroiled in the school desegregation crisis. In September 1958, he warned areas practicing segregation that federal installations in the areas might be shut down if the schools were not integrated. In December, he denounced the closings of schools in Virginia and Arkansas as "indefensible."

Flemming opposed recommendations for medical care for the aged financed through Social Security. In May 1959, he offered the administration's own proposal calling for state programs subsidized by the federal government to provide health care for persons over 65. The states would have collected fees from those who could afford payments while the aged on relief would have free coverage.

Eligible persons would have been given the option of purchasing private insurance plans, which the federal and state governments would have subsidized up to 50 percent. Congress never passed the administration's proposal.

During his tenure as secretary of HEW, Flemming called for increased efforts to combat air and water pollution and the use of color additives in foods, drugs, and chemicals. In November 1959, he precipitated a national scare when he warned that certain cranberries from the Pacific Northwest had been contaminated by weed-killers linked to cancer. Occurring right before Thanksgiving, Flemming's action produced bans in numerous states. He defended his announcement by saying, "My position all along has been that when we in the government develop information of this nature, we have an obligation to make it available to the public."

Flemming became president of the University of Oregon in 1961 and remained there until 1968, when he assumed the presidency of Macalester College in St. Paul, Minn., which he held until 1971. Flemming remained active in public life, as well. He served as a consultant to Kennedy on Medicare and as a member of the Peace Corps National Advisory Commission under Kennedy and Johnson. In the late 1960s, he called for an increased commitment to the War on Poverty. During the Nixon administration, Flemming chaired the White House Conference on Aging in 1971 and served as a commissioner on aging. He chaired the U.S. Civil Rights Commission from 1972 to 1981.

A deeply religious man, Flemming was an active Methodist layman and headed the National Council of Churches of Christ in America. His career combined compassion for those in need with bureaucratic competence. His last years were devoted to advocacy on behalf of Social Security. He died in Alexandria, Va., on September 7, 1996.

Flesch, Rudolf F(ranz)

(1911–1986) educational researcher and critic

Born in Vienna, Austria, on May 8, 1911, Flesch received a doctorate in law from the University of Vienna in 1933. After emigrating to the United States in 1938, he earned a Ph.D. in library science from Columbia University in 1943. The following year, he became an American citizen. Flesch began his career in educational research with the Readability Laboratory of the American Association of Adult Education at Columbia Teachers College. First in the scholarly Marks of Readable Style: A Study in Adult Education (1943) and then in the popular The Art of Plain Talk (1946), Flesch proposed a scientific method for writing easily understandable prose. He recommended a plain style, short paragraphs and sentences, and the use of colloquial English. Further, he drew a connection between such direct expression and liberal politics. His work won an audience not only among educators but among journalists, advertising copywriters, and business people. Shortly after World War II, Flesch moved to Dobbs Ferry, N.Y., and worked as a freelance writer, lecturer, and consultant. In 1951, he produced the influential AP Writing Handbook for the Associated Press, How to Write Better, and The Art of Clear Thinking.

Perhaps Flesch's most influential work was Why Johnny Can't Read: And What You Can Do about It, a polemic published in 1955. In it, Flesch contended that illiteracy and near-illiteracy were widespread and increasing in the United States, and he blamed the schools. Johnny could not read, according to Flesch, "for the simple reason that nobody ever showed him how." Flesch focused his criticism on what he maintained was the prevailing method of teaching children to begin to read. He contended that the universal acceptance of the sight or "look-and say" method (teaching children the meaning of whole words) accounted for the problem. He recommended instead the phonics approach, or teaching the correspondence of letters and sounds. Concern over the American education system grew exponentially after the Soviet launch of Sputnik in the fall of 1957. This brought the work of Flesch and other critics of public education to the attention of a broad public. Indeed, Why Johnny Can't Read had more influence on the public than it did on the educational establishment. However, it joined works by ARTHUR BESTOR and JAMES B. CONANT as focal points in the debate over education in the late 1950s.

After achieving considerable fame with Why Johnny Can't Read, Flesch continued to lecture, publish articles, and write books. His works included How to Be Brief (1962), The ABC of Style (1965), Say What You Mean (1972), and How to Write Plain English: A Book for Lawyers and Consumers (1979). In 1981 he joined yet another round of debate over education with the publication of Why Johnny Still Can't Read: A New Look at the Scandal of Our Schools. As he had a quarter of a century earlier, he focused his attack on reading instruction and once again advocated phonics. Flesch died on October 5, 1986, in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.

Folsom, James E(lisha)

(1908–1987) governor of Alabama

Born on a farm in Coffee Co., Ala., on October 9, 1908, Folsom grew up in rural southeastern Alabama. After his father, a county official, died in 1919, the family suffered economic hardship. Folsom attended the University of Alabama and Howard College (now Samford University) and then joined the merchant marine. He returned to Alabama, where family connections helped him obtain a post in the Civil Works Administration in 1933. He then went to work in Washington, D.C., where he attended night classes at George Washington University.

Folsom returned to Alabama, settled in Cullman Co. in the northern part of the state, established himself as an insurance salesman, and entered electoral politics. His size (he stood six feet eight inches tall and weighed 245 pounds) earned him the nickname "Big Jim." His habit of kissing every woman on the campaign trail won him another nickname: "Kissing Jim." Folsom lost the first four elections in which he ran. In 1933, he failed to win a seat at the state Prohibition convention. He ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 1936 and 1938 and for governor in 1942. As a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1944, he split with the Alabama delegation and supported Henry Wallace for the vice presidential nomination.

Folsom developed a political style that made effective use of populist and rural symbols. When he campaigned for governor in 1946, a string band accompanied him on the campaign trail. He brandished an old mop and a galvanized pail to symbolize his promise to clean out the Capitol. He attacked the Big Mules, the large planters and industrialists who, according to Folsom, controlled the state. He promised legislative reapportionment, old-age pensions, aid to schools, repeal of the poll tax, the construction of highways to connect farms to markets, better pay for teachers, workers' compensation, and unemployment insurance. Folsom believed that race-baiting diverted attention from more important social issues, and adopted a moderate position on racial matters. He surprised the state's political establishment by winning a plurality in the Democratic primary and handily defeating his opponent in the runoff. In Alabama, the winning Democratic nomination was tantamount to winning the office, which he did in the general election.

In office, Folsom could not deliver on most of the promises he made during the campaign. He managed to achieve passage of a highway program and an increase in teachers' salaries, but the legislature blocked most of his program. Aside from opposition in the legislature, Folsom suffered from alcoholism, which undermined his effectiveness. As governor, he refused to engage in race-baiting and treated African Americans with respect. He opposed the Dixiecrat movement in 1948 and in 1949 pushed through the legislature a law, directed at the Ku Klux Klan, banning the wearing of masks in public. In his Christmas message of 1949, Folsom said, "Negroes constitute 35 percent of our population in Alabama. Are they getting 35 percent of the fair share of living? Are they getting adequate medical care to rid themselves of hookworm, rickets and social diseases?" Further, he denounced the "stirring of old hatred and prejudices and false alarms." Under state law, he was unable to succeed himself, and he returned to private life in 1951.

Folsom easily won a second term as governor in 1954, the year the Supreme Court handed down its decision in Brown v. Board of Education. Issues of civil rights and desegregation dominated that term. Folsom was not an integrationist. He preferred separate-but-equal facilities and once promised that Alabama would be the last state to integrate. Nevertheless, he maintained that the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools was the law and that integration was inevitable. At the Southern Governors' Conference in 1954, he declined to sign a pledge to use every constitutional means to maintain segregation. In 1955, Folsom prevented the enactment of most bills introduced in the legislature designed to continue segregation. He ignored a resolution calling for Congress to curtail the federal judiciary and threatened to veto any measure censuring the Supreme Court. Folsom also vetoed three anti-NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) measures. Nevertheless, a pupil placement act, which enabled local authorities to assign pupils on the basis of nonracial criteria that had the effect of impeding desegregation, became law without his signature.

Folsom failed to respond adequately when, in 1956, a federal court ordered the admission of AUTHERINE LUCY, a black student, to the University of Alabama. Her presence on campus led to three days of rioting. During this time, Folsom was on a weeklong drunken binge in Florida. That same year, Folsom infuriated his opponents by inviting a black member of Congress, ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.), for a drink at the governor's mansion. When Folsom convened a special session of the legislature to deal with reapportionment, the lawmakers passed a series of segregationist measures, including a resolution interposing the state's authority between the people and the supposedly illegitimate exercise of federal authority and nullifying the Supreme Court's decision. The governor called the measure "hogwash" and likened it to "a hound dog baying at the moon and claiming it's got the moon treed." The legislature also enacted two constitutional amendments permitting the state to abandon its public school system.

By this time, the growing influence of the White Citizens' Council had changed political realities. In 1956, Folsom spoke in favor of segregation and signed a bill providing for private schools where districts had abandoned their public schools. At the same time, Folsom continued to call for moderation. In April 1956, he ran for Democratic national committeeman against Charles McKay, who chaired the White Citizens' Council, and suffered a crushing defeat. By 1957, Folsom offered only limited opposition to segregationist measures and signed a resolution nullifying the Brown decision. Although unable to succeed himself, Folsom suffered another political defeat in 1958 when his protégé, George Wallace, lost the Democratic nomination for governor to attorney general JOHN PATTERSON, a staunch segregationist.

Folsom attempted a comeback in 1962, but he lost to Wallace, who ran as a segregationist. In a televised appearance on election eve, Folsom was incoherent, perhaps because he was drunk. He never recovered. He ran for governor unsuccessfully in 1966, 1970, 1974, 1978, and 1982, receiving fewer votes in each election. In his last years, he suffered from heart disease and a series of strokes. He died in Cullman, Ala., on November 21, 1987.

Folsom, Marion B(ayard)

(1893–1976) undersecretary of the treasury; secretary, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

Born in McRae, Ga., on November 23, 1893, Marion Folsom graduated from the University of Georgia in 1912 and received an M.B.A. from Harvard University two years later. He served in the army during World War I. In 1921, he became assistant to George Eastman, president of Eastman Kodak Co., and in 1935 was made treasurer. During the 1930s, Folsom developed the old-age pension plan for Kodak, which was later expanded to include 13 other firms under the title “the Rochester Plan.”

Because of the wide interest in this program, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Folsom to the President’s Advisory Council on Economic Security in 1934 and to the Federal Council on Social Security in 1937. During World War II, Folsom served as a member of the War Manpower Commission and of the Committee for Economic Development (CED), headed by PAUL HOFFMAN. As a member of the CED, Folsom developed plans for the reconversion of the wartime to a peacetime economy with the objective of ensuring maximum production and full employment.

Eisenhower appointed Folsom undersecretary of the treasury in January 1953. During his tenure, he represented the Treasury on a cabinet committee to determine how federal employee benefits compared with private industry. As a result of the investigation, Folsom sponsored a life insurance program for civil service employees underwritten by private industry. The plan provided that federal employees would pay the rate generally contributed by workers in the private sector, and the Treasury would pay the remaining one-third of the cost. In August the president signed the bill making civil service life insurance mandatory unless an employee signed a statement saying he did not want to be covered. Between 1954 and 1961, the program covered almost 2.5 million employees.

Marion Folsom, secretary of health, education, and welfare, 1955–1958 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

In 1954, he worked with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare on a study of old-age and survivors’ insurance, which became the basis for a series of proposed changes in Social Security that Eisenhower recommended to Congress. Later that year, Congress acted on the recommendations and amended the Social Security Act to include self-employed workers and to increase benefits.

Folsom also helped revise the federal corporate income tax. The Income Tax Revision Act of 1954 enabled industry to make larger provisions for depreciation during the early years of an asset. According to Folsom, it contributed to the generally high level of private investment after 1954.

In 1955, Folsom succeeded OVETA CULP HOBBS as secretary of health, education, and welfare. The new secretary continued to support the Salk polio vaccine program instituted in 1955. He coordinated the effort to ensure that the country's demand for the vaccine was met, and in December 1956, he announced that there was no longer a shortage but a surplus of 17 million doses. During Folsom's tenure, federal support for medical research and for the training of nurses and public health personnel increased.

In 1956, Folsom served—along with Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY, and Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL—on the cabinet committee investigating narcotics traffic. In February, the committee disclosed that there were 60,000 addicts in the United States, 13 percent of them under the age of 21. The panel recommended that the states develop treatment programs and increase penalties for drug pushers and that the United States work with international agencies to control drug traffic.

From 1955 to 1958, Folsom lobbied for passage of the national defense education bill. The secretary believed that the United States lagged behind other major nations in the teaching of sciences and languages, and he calculated that there would be an inadequate supply of Ph.D.s over the next 10 years. He therefore called on Congress to pass a bill providing fellowships and loans to graduate students, grants to gifted high school students, and aid to states for teaching languages, mathematics, and the sciences. The bill also gave assistance to colleges and universities to establish training programs for teachers of modern, especially rare, languages. The National Defense Education Act became law in September 1954. It authorized the expenditure of $1 billion over a four-year period.

After resigning as secretary in 1958, Folsom, along with Henry T. Herald, president of the Ford Foundation, and John W. Gardner, president of the Carnegie Foundation, served on the New York State Committee on Higher Education. In December 1959, the panel recommended to Gov. NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER that the state increase its funds for public undergraduate and graduate education, limit expenditures for private institutions, and discontinue tuition-free higher education except for rebates to needy students. It also proposed making 11 state teachers colleges into liberal arts colleges and establishing a new state university system that included two graduate schools.

From 1958 to 1968, Folsom was director of Kodak. He also served as chairman of the Advisory Committee for Personnel for the U.S. Public Health Service in 1961 and 1962, and was chairman of the National Commission on Community Health Services from 1962 to 1967 and vice chairman of the White House Conference on Health in 1967. Folsom died in Rochester, N.Y., on September 28, 1976.

Ford, Gerald R(udolph)

Born in Omaha, Neb., on July 14, 1913, and raised by his stepfather in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ford was a football star at the University of Michigan, where he received a B.A. degree in 1935. Subsequently Ford studied law at Yale University and received an LL.B. degree in 1941. He briefly practiced law with a firm in Grand Rapids before joining the navy in 1942. After his discharge four years later, Ford returned home to resume his legal career.

In 1948, Ford's stepfather, a Republican county chairman, and Sen. Arthur H. Vandenberg (R-Mich.) urged Ford to challenge incumbent isolationist Rep. Bartel J. Jonkman (R-Mich.) in the Republican congressional primary. Ford won easily and went on to defeat his Democratic opponent with 61 percent of the vote. In subsequent elections, he never won less than 60 percent of the vote. Ford generally supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy while opposing most of his domestic social welfare programs.

Although Ford's views and voting record were conservative, he was a political pragmatist and a party loyalist. In 1952, he was an early backer of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Republican presidential nomination, partly because he believed that Eisenhower would run better in Michigan than his conservative opponent, Sen. ROBERT H. TAFT (R-Ohio). Although Ford was a strong anticommunist, he did not join Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.)

in criticizing the Eisenhower administration for allegedly tolerating subversives in its midst. According to Congressional Quarterly, in the 83rd and 84th Congresses (1953–54, 1955–56), Ford was among the five House Republicans who most frequently supported President Eisenhower.

Ford served on the Appropriations Committee and, as a member of that panel's Department of Defense Subcommittee, became an expert on military spending. A supporter of high defense appropriations, he unsuccessfully sought to add $80 million to the army's budget in 1957. Ford also strongly backed military assistance to friendly countries. In 1956, he deplored Congress's 33 percent cut of the president's request for foreign military aid. The following year, Ford criticized similar reductions, asserting that "we have made [them] in the wrong areas. . . . We ought to increase the [foreign aid] funds related to our own security and reduce the funds in those other non-military areas." In 1960, Ford headed a task force of the House Republican Policy Committee that produced recommendations—based on papers written by academic, professional, and legislative experts—for a comprehensive national security strategy.

During the 1950s, Ford's reputation for candor and honesty earned him the respect of his fellow Republicans. A congenial man, he also maintained cordial relations with the Democratic House leadership. In 1959, he was chosen to serve on a select committee that examined the budget of the Central Intelligence Agency. Hoping someday to become House Speaker, Ford turned down opportunities to run for the Senate in 1952 and 1954 and for governor of Michigan in 1956. However, the Republican Party's failure to win the congressional elections of 1954, 1956, and 1958 made him more receptive to other possibilities. In 1960, he allowed a group of Michigan Republicans to conduct a campaign on his behalf for the vice presidential nomination, but the Republican presidential nominee, RICHARD M. NIXON, chose HENRY CABOT LODGE as his running mate. Believing that many Midwestern Republicans would find Lodge too liberal, Ford did not think the choice a good one. As a party loyalist, however, he acceded to Nixon's request that he second Lodge's nomination at the national convention.

In January 1963, a group of young Republican representatives led a revolt against Minority Leader CHARLES A. HALLECK (R-Ind.) and chose Ford to replace Rep. Charles B. Hoeven (R-Iowa) as chairman of the Republican Conference Committee. Two years later, Ford defeated Halleck in a contest for minority leader, a position he held until 1973. In 1963, President LYNDON JOHNSON named Ford to the Warren Commission, which was formed to investigate the assassination of JOHN F. KENNEDY. After the resignation of Vice President Spiro Agnew in October 1973, President Richard M. Nixon nominated Ford to fill the vacancy. Ford won congressional approval and was sworn in as vice president on December 6. When Nixon resigned in the wake of the Watergate scandal, Ford became president on August 9, 1974. A month later, Ford granted a "full, free and absolute pardon" to Nixon. In retrospect, many have concluded that it was an act of statesmanship that helped the country move past the scandal and ensuing constitutional crisis; but at the time, Ford's action was widely criticized. After turning back a stiff challenge for the Republican nomination from Ronald W. Reagan, a former governor of California, Ford lost the general election in 1976 to Jimmy Carter.

In the years after he left the White House, Ford occasionally spoke out on major issues, published a memoir in 1979, and served on the boards of several major American corporations. He died at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on December 26, 2006.

Ford, Henry II

(1917–1987) president, Ford Motor Company

The grandson of pioneer auto manufacturer and industrialist Henry Ford and the son of the president of Ford Motor Company, Edsel Ford, Henry Ford II was born in Detroit on September 4, 1917. He was groomed from an early age for leadership in the family's enterprises. Henry Ford II attended Yale University but left before earning a degree. In August 1940, he took a job with Ford Motor Company as a mechanic. He became an ensign in the U.S. Naval Reserve in April 1941 and was on active duty during World War II. Although he volunteered for it, he never served overseas. When Edsel Ford died in 1943 and the elder Henry Ford resumed control of the company. Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox worried that the 80-year-old Ford might no longer be capable of running a company essential to the war effort. Knox therefore discharged Henry Ford II so that he could help run the company. In September 1945, the elder Ford reluctantly stepped aside to let his grandson assume the presidency at the age of 28.

When Ford took over from his grandfather, the company was losing $9 million a month. The elder Henry Ford had been an autocratic manager. Unlike its rival, General Motors, which had developed formal administrative structures for running a large and diversified manufacturing operation, the Ford Company lacked such a structure. Indeed, the company did not even use modern accounting techniques to control costs. In addition, Ford Motor suffered from terrible labor relations. Finally, the company had failed to adapt to changing customer preferences. The younger Ford responded by reorganizing the company, delegating authority, and bringing in a management team known as the "Whiz Kids" for their successful administration of the mobilization of resources for the air force during World War II. The new management team, which included Robert S. McNamara (later secretary of defense in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations), modernized the firm's production facilities and marketing techniques. Ford also adopted a more flexible policy toward the demands of the United Auto Workers (UAW).

After government restrictions on auto production were lifted following the Korean War, Ford embarked on a campaign to overtake GM in production and sales. Ford and his "team" sought to move the company—hitherto essentially a producer of one popular car, the Ford, plus the less successful Lincoln and Mercury—into more diversified production. With the unprecedented demand for passenger cars in the early 1950s and with profits reaching an all-time high as a result, Ford thought the time ripe to break GM's domination of the middle-priced car market. In 1957, Ford introduced the Edsel, which proved to be one of the biggest marketing failures in corporate history. It lost the company about $350 million. Ford was more successful in offering other new models during the 1950s, but the company failed to achieve first place among the Big Three auto makers.

Prior to the auto industry contract talks in 1955, UAW president WALTER REUTHER launched a campaign for a "guaranteed annual wage" to protect auto workers against interruptions in employment and selected Ford as the target company. The company refused to pay the guaranteed annual wage but, after first offering to sell workers stock on liberal terms and then advance them interest-free loans on the stock during layoffs, it devised a system of unemployment compensation to supplement government insurance. Ford's Supplemental Unemployment Benefit plan (SUB) was accepted by the union and later adopted by other automakers.

During the early 1950s, Henry Ford II was a leading advocate of "free trade" in the auto industry, calling for the abandonment of high tariffs on foreign car imports. With increasing competition from foreign-made small cars in the latter part of the decade, however, he began to reverse his position. A strong supporter of the Eisenhower administration, Ford was named by the president in 1953 to serve as an alternate delegate to the United Nations. In the fall of 1960, however, he came into conflict with the White House over the issue of trade policy. Despite pleas by the administration to cut down overseas spending, Ford proceeded with its plans to pay out $360 million to European stockholders for the public shares in its British affiliate. Secretary of the Treasury ROBERT ANDERSON personally urged Ford to hold up the stock purchase, but the company leadership refused to cooperate. The week the purchase went through, U.S. gold reserves dropped by $204 million.

Ford was president of Ford Motor Company from 1945 to 1963, except for a brief period in 1960 when McNamara held the position. In addition, Ford served as chairman of the board of directors from 1960 until he stepped down in 1980. Even after that, he continued to exercise considerable influence as chairman of the board's finance committee. In 1961, JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed him to the Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy. Ford, however, was an outspoken critic of Kennedy's intervention in the 1962 steel crisis. The auto magnate broke with a lifelong loyalty to the Republican party to support LYNDON B. JOHNSON's presidential candidacy in 1964. During the 1960s, Ford supported civil rights organizations and endorsed Johnson's antipoverty programs. In 1968, Johnson appointed him to be the first chairman of the National Alliance of Businessmen. The following year, Johnson awarded Ford the Medal of Freedom. RICHARD M. NIXON named him chairman of the National Center for Voluntary Action in 1970. Ford died of pneumonia in Detroit on September 29, 1987.

Foster, William C(hapman)

(1897–1984) chief delegate, Geneva Conference on the Prevention of Surprise Attacks

Foster was born in Westfield, N.J., on April 27, 1897. He left the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at the end of his junior year to serve as a lieutenant and military aviator in World War I. After returning from military service, he graduated from MIT in 1918. In 1922, he joined Pressed and Welded Steel Products Company, where he was secretary-treasurer and later president. He remained with the company until 1946. Impressed by Foster's knowledge of the problems of small business, Secretary of Commerce W. AVERELL HARRIMAN convinced President HARRY S. TRUMAN to appoint Foster, a Republican, to be undersecretary of commerce in 1946. Two years later, when Harriman was named ambassador at large to western Europe to oversee the first operations of the Marshall Plan, Foster went along as general deputy in charge of the Paris headquarters. In June 1949, Foster became deputy administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA). The following year, he became administrator. As undersecretary of defense from 1951 to 1953, Foster headed a panel that prepared a secret report on the comparative military strengths of the United States and USSR. Foster resigned in 1953 to become president of the Manufacturing Chemists Association. He joined Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. in 1955 as executive vice president. Concurrently, he was chairman of the board of Reaction Motors and a director of Detroit Edison.

Foster returned to government service in 1958 to head the U.S. delegation to the Geneva Conference on the Prevention of Surprise Attacks. With only two months' notice, Foster familiarized himself with the U.S. position, which focused on technical matters: the definition of the "instruments of surprise attack" and the application of inspection and observation techniques to the problem.

Throughout the conference, convened in November, the Western and Eastern blocs differed significantly on what should be discussed. Foster, working on the premise that the major threat to security arose from long-range missiles and manned aircraft carrying thermonuclear weapons, stressed the need for technical weapons control. He therefore outlined a proposal for the development of a comprehensive inspection system to deal with existing weapons. In addition, he noted the danger of inadequate partial inspection, believing it could give one nation a temporary advantage, and cautioned that any step-by-step implementation of inspection systems would require careful negotiations to circumvent that problem.

The Soviets, on the other hand, emphasized disarmament rather than control, maintaining that the two could not be separated. Assuming that the chief danger of surprise attack came from concentrations of conventional forces, they demanded the liquidation of military bases on foreign soil, the reduction of conventional arms and troops, and the abolition of nuclear weapons. The Soviets were particularly anxious to create a nuclear-free zone in central Europe to prevent the rearming of West Germany. The USSR rejected the call for a comprehensive inspection system because it might compromise its security, and offered a system of self-inspection instead.

The conference ended in December with no agreement. Yet it did have long-range benefits. The technical papers the United States prepared for the meeting provided valuable data on weapons and inspection technology for future negotiations. More important, it marked the first time the United States had developed concrete proposals rather than vague principles for weapons control. It also was a major turning point in U.S. thought on the issue of disarmament and arms control. Instead of focusing on control of fissionable materials, the United States stressed the elimination of nuclear warfare through the control of the means of delivery of nuclear arms. Testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament in January 1959, Foster said the conference had shown him the need to define the issues involved in control and disarmament more clearly. It had also given him valuable experience in dealing with the Soviets and in understanding the importance they placed on defending their security.

In September 1961, Foster was appointed director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. At that post, he was involved in the negotiation of a partial nuclear test ban treaty, which the Senate ratified in September 1963. During the Johnson administration, Foster helped negotiate the nuclear nonproliferation treaty in 1968. He left office in January 1968 and became president of Porter International Co. in 1970. He died in Washington, D.C., on October 14, 1984.

Frankfurter, Felix

(1882–1965) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

Born in Vienna, Austria, on November 15, 1882, Felix Frankfurter emigrated to the United States with his family at the age of 12. He graduated from the City College of New York in 1902 and, after serving a year on the city's tenement house commission, he entered Harvard Law School, from which he graduated first in the class of 1906. Upon graduation, he briefly worked for the prestigious law firm of Hornblower, Byrne, Miller & Potter before joining the staff of Henry L. Stimson, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. Frankfurter managed the campaign and wrote speeches for Stimson's unsuccessful campaign for governor on a Progressive-Republican ticket in 1910. A year later, President William Howard Taft named Stimson secretary of war, and Frankfurter became his special assistant. When Frankfurter accepted a position at Harvard Law School in 1914, he became the first Jewish member of its faculty. During World War I, Frankfurter took leave to serve as a special assistant to the secretary of war, Newton D. Baker. During his 25 years at Harvard, Frankfurter established a reputation as a noted scholar on the Supreme Court, the Constitution, and administrative law. He also maintained a wide range of activities that won him a reputation as a leading liberal. He served as an adviser to the NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union, supported labor unions, and fought to have the convictions of Italian anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti overturned. Frankfurter sent many of his law students to clerk for Louis D. Brandeis, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Benjamin Cardozo, and Learned Hand. During World War I, Frankfurter established a relationship with Franklin D. Roosevelt, then assistant secretary of the navy. When Roosevelt became governor of New York in 1929, he sought Frankfurter's advice about legislation and people who might serve in his administration. When Roosevelt became president, Frankfurter advised him on legislation, appointments, and speeches. Frankfurter and his protégés exerted a powerful influence on New Deal legislation, particularly the Securities Exchange Act, the Social Security Act, and the Fair Labor Standards Act. Roosevelt named Frankfurter to the Supreme Court in January 1939.

On the Court, Justice Frankfurter became the leading advocate of judicial restraint. Legislatures, he had long contended, were the policymaking bodies in a democratic society, and the Court must defer to their judgments and sustain laws that did not clearly violate the Constitution, however unwise the justices might think them to be. On the Court, Frankfurter consistently upheld legislation regulating the economy. Deferring to the legislative branch, he also voted on a number of occasions to uphold laws curtailing civil liberties. Although it sometimes meant voting against causes he had earlier championed, Frankfurter insisted that judges must be disinterested and detached and must not read into the Constitution their own notions of good policy. Unlike fellow Roosevelt appointee Justice HUGO BLACK, Frankfurter did not give First Amendment rights any preferred position over other constitutional guarantees; nor did he consider any provisions in the Bill of Rights absolute. He insisted that the Court must balance the conflicting interests in each case, making its judgments without any doctrinaire presuppositions.

Frankfurter wrote the opinion for the majority in Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940) upholding the suspension for public school of Jehovah's Witnesses because they refused to salute the flag, an action they maintained violated their right to free exercise of religion. Three years later, when the Court reversed that decision in West Virginia v. Barnette (1943), Frankfurter dissented. Frankfurter held that, in time of war, the courts should uphold the claims of government, if based on a reasonable construction of the Constitution.

Despite his commitment to judicial restraint, Frankfurter did not necessarily vote to uphold legislative encroachments on individual liberties. He spoke for a unanimous court in Butler v. Michigan (1957), which struck down a Michigan law banning obscene books unfit for young people. Frankfurter observed that the law attempted to “quarantine the general reading public against books not too rugged for grown men and women in order to shield juvenile innocence.” “Surely,” he concluded, “this is to burn the house to roast the pig.” He therefore held that the law in question was “not reasonably restricted to the evil with which it is said to deal.” Given his background as a professor, Frankfurter was particularly sensitive to matters of academic freedom. He voted with the majority in Slochower v. Board of Higher Education of New York City (1956), a decision that reversed the dismissal of a professor at Brooklyn college because he had invoked the Fifth Amendment before a congressional committee. In Sweezy v. New Hampshire, the Court overturned the contempt conviction of a professor in New Hampshire who, when called before the state’s attorney general sitting as a one-man investigative committee, had refused to answer questions relating to the Progressive Party and about a lecture he gave at the University of New Hampshire. In a separate concurring opinion, Frankfurter delivered a powerful defense of academic freedom.

Frankfurter had a mixed record dealing with the loyalty and security cases of the 1950s. When he did vote against the government, he usually did so for narrow procedural or statutory reasons, rather than on broad constitutional grounds. In Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), he joined five other justices in overturning a Pennsylvania law outlawing sedition against the United States on the ground that Congress had preempted the field with the Smith Act. Frankfurter also joined the majority in Watkins v. U.S. (1957) in ruling that congressional investigations had to be clearly related to a legitimate legislative purpose. On a number of occasions, Frankfurter voted to uphold governmental action taken in the name of security, even though that action conflicted with claims of individual freedom. In Beilan v. Board of Education (1958), Frankfurter voted with the majority to uphold the dismissal of a Philadelphia schoolteacher discharged for “incompetence” after the teacher had refused to answer questions from the superintendent about possible affiliations with the communist party. The teacher had also invoked the Fifth Amendment before HUAC. The Court found that the dismissal was not for specific charges of disloyalty. That same year, the Court upheld the dismissal of an employee of New York’s subway system who refused to answer questions under the protection of the Fifth Amendment (Lerner v. Casey). Once again Frankfurter joined the majority in a decision that turned on the fact that the plea of the Fifth had not been the key point in the dismissal.

The justice was far more willing to have the Court take an active role in overseeing federal criminal procedure and was especially exacting regarding search and seizure and confessions. Building on an opinion he had written in 1943, Frankfurter ruled in Mallory v. U.S. (1957) that when there was any unnecessary delay between the arrest and arraignment of a defendant, a confession obtained during that period was inadmissible in federal courts. However, Frankfurter contended that the Constitution placed fewer limits on state criminal procedures, and so he applied less rigid standards to the states.

Throughout his judicial career, Frankfurter voted in support of black Americans’ claims for equality under the law. As a Jew and a naturalized citizen, Frankfurter had an unbounded faith in assimilation and cherished the ideal of a meritocratic social order. Racial discrimination appalled him. He actively promoted the careers of Charles Hamilton Houston and William Hastie, who had been his students and played major roles in guiding the NAACP’s legal battle against segregation. In addition, Frankfurter hired the Court’s first black law clerk, William Coleman, Jr., in 1948. He made a significant contribution to bringing about the Court’s unanimous May 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education, which held segregated public schools unconstitutional. Frankfurter believed a unanimous opinion would be best for the Court and the country, and so he sought to delay a final decision until the Court had reached a consensus. He also was influential in separating the decision invalidating school segregation from the remedy. Frankfurter circulated several memos among the justices on the question of how to implement the decision. The Court's final decree, issued in May 1955, followed the gradualist approach Frankfurter favored and called for school boards to make a "prompt and reasonable start" toward desegregation and proceed "with all deliberate speed," a phrase the justice had suggested in one of his memos. When state officials later attempted to forestall school integration in Little Rock, Ark., Frankfurter joined in the Court's order in September 1958 mandating the resumption of school desegregation in that city. He also wrote a special concurring opinion affirming the supremacy of the law and condemning defiance and obstruction of its enforcement.

Frankfurter's views on racial issues never moved beyond the NAACP's original position that called for nondiscrimination and a color-blind legal system. He expressed grave doubts about the growing militancy of southern black college students and the sit-in protests. Regarding a case involving black protestors who had been jailed for trespassing on private property, Frankfurter remarked that "it will not advance the cause of constitutional equality for Negroes for the court to be taking short cuts to discriminate as partisans in favor of Negroes or even to appear to do so."

Throughout the postwar era, Frankfurter became increasingly estranged from fellow Roosevelt appointees Hugo Black and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS. Moreover, by the 1960s, the Warren Court increasingly came to reject Frankfurter's approach to jurisprudence. He lost perhaps his greatest battle with Black over the incorporation of the Fourteenth Amendment (the application of the Bill of Rights to state governments through the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause). Frankfurter's dissents in Mapp v. Ohio (1961) and Baker v. Carr (1962) expressed his commitment both to judicial restraint and to coordinate federalism. His retirement in 1962 and replacement by ARTHUR GOLDBERG marked a major turning point. Goldberg provided a dependable fifth vote for the liberal wing of the Court. Virtually none of Frankfurter's major constitutional decisions survived the ensuing two decades.

As a professor of law and Supreme Court justice, Frankfurter made substantial contributions to debates over policy and jurisprudence. The scholarly consensus on his tenure as a justice, however, has not been kind. In the minds of many, Frankfurter's commitment to judicial restraint, particularly in the field of civil liberties, "uncoupled" him "from the locomotive of history," as Joseph Lash put it. Nevertheless, his commitment to judicial restraint and federalism constituted a significant legacy to the Court and to justices who would follow him on it. He died in Washington, D.C., on February 22, 1965.

Freeman, Orville L(orthrop)

(1918–2003) governor of Minnesota

The son of a storekeeper, Freeman was born in Minneapolis on March 9, 1918. He graduated magna cum laude from the University of Minnesota in 1940. Following service with the marines during World War II, he returned to the university to obtain his law degree in 1946. While practicing law, he joined HUBERT HUMPHREY and other liberals in effecting a merger of the Democratic and Farmer-Labor parties in 1944. Freeman became the state chairman in 1948 and managed Humphrey's successful campaign for the Senate that year.

Freeman ran unsuccessfully for state attorney general in 1950 and for governor in 1952. He won election as governor in 1954 and reelection in 1956 and 1958. A fine administrator, he was responsible for major improvements in education and welfare: building schools, increasing space in state mental hospitals, and expanding state aid to local school districts. To finance this program, he had to raise property taxes to an all-time high and attempt to install pay-as-you-go income taxes. Freeman's tax policies and his decision to send state militia to close a strikebound meatpacking company contributed to his failure to win a fourth term in 1960.

As governor, Freeman opposed Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON's policy of reducing price supports on agricultural commodities, which, the secretary maintained, aided only the larger farmers who could control production. In 1959, Freeman created the Minnesota Farm Policy Committee, composed of agricultural economists, to evaluate the Benson program. Its report called for the establishment of a national food policy with production goals set for domestic and foreign use. Once the production goal was determined, marketing allotments would be distributed to farmers on a graduated basis, with the largest farms receiving the proportionately largest reductions. The report also advocated the reduction of agricultural surpluses through overseas sales, the establishment of school lunch programs, and the granting of aid to depressed areas.

Freeman and Humphrey were early supporters of ADLAI STEVENSON for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1956 and assured their candidate of Farmer-Labor support in the Minnesota primary. Therefore, Stevenson campaigned very little in the state. Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.), running on the proposition that Freeman and Humphrey were political bosses, won an upset victory that slowed down Stevenson's drive for the nomination and damaged the governor's prestige. Following Stevenson's defeat in the November election, Freeman joined the Democratic Advisory Council, a panel of leading Democrats who prepared position papers for the party on important issues. He was considered one of the most liberal members of the panel, especially on agriculture, civil rights, and foreign-policy issues.

Freeman supported Humphrey for president in 1960, and after the senator's withdrawal from the primary race, he endorsed Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). At the Democratic National Convention, the Minnesota delegation split between supporters of Kennedy and Stevenson. Freeman and Humphrey led the pro-Kennedy forces against the Stevenson supporters, headed by Sen. EUGENE MCCARTHY (D-Minn.). Gov. Freeman placed Kennedy's name in nomination, calling him a "proven liberal" and a demonstrated leader. In the early part of the primary race, Kennedy considered Freeman a leading contender for vice president. However, he was reluctant to choose a northern liberal and instead selected Sen. LYNDON, JOHNSON (D-Tex.) as his running mate.

Freeman served as secretary of agriculture during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and put into practice many of the recommendations his Farm Policy Committee made in 1959. He helped to establish the food stamps and school breakfast programs. He also worked to expand global markets for American farmers, promoted loans and grants for water and sewer systems in rural areas, and lobbied Congress to strengthen food safety regulations. Freeman served until the end of the Johnson administration, when he became chief executive of EDP Technology, a consulting company. He headed Business International Corporation from 1971 to 1985 and worked for a law firm in Washington, D.C., from 1985 to 1995. He returned to Minneapolis in 1995, where he was a visiting scholar at the Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota. He died in Minneapolis of complications from Alzheimer's disease on February 20, 2003.

Fritchey, Clayton

(1904–2001) deputy chairman, Democratic National Committee

Born in Bellefontaine, Ohio, in 1904, Fritchey moved with his family to Baltimore in 1906. He began his career in journalism as a reporter for the Baltimore American in 1924. Three years later, he became city editor of the Baltimore Post. After working briefly for the Pittsburgh Press, he returned to the Baltimore Post as managing editor in 1931. He subsequently worked for the Cleveland Press and became editor of the New Orleans Item in 1944. Fritchey served as director of the Department of Defense's public relations bureau from 1950 to 1952. In that post, newsmen rated him as "competent, but not outstanding." An outspoken liberal Democrat, he was appointed an assistant to President HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1952. After the National Democratic Convention in July, Fritchey served as liaison between Truman and the presidential nominee, ADLAI E. STEVENSON. The Democratic National Chairman, STEPHEN MITCHELL, appointed Fritchey deputy chairman in December 1952. Fritchey served in that post until 1957, concerning himself principally with editing the national committee's official magazine, Democratic Digest.

Fritchey took a "no-holds-barred" approach to politics. In 1953, in an effort to draw attention to flimsy charges of corruption against HERBERT BROWNELL, Fritchey recklessly accused the attorney general of attempting to "divert attention" from those charges by alleging that communists had infiltrated the Truman administration. Further, in 1954, Fritchey paid a private investigator named Paul Hughes $2,300 for a 94-page report, filled with fabricated memos and documents, pertaining to purported "illegal activities" of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.) and the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. Fritchey's role came out at Hughes's trial for perjury in 1956.

Fritchey's aggressiveness was rewarded in August 1956, when Stevenson, making his second run for the presidency, named him press secretary for the campaign. As the campaign progressed, some accused Fritchey of spending too much time with Democratic officials and not enough with reporters. When Stevenson lost in November, Fritchey resigned his party post.

In 1957, Fritchey and three associates bought the Arlington Sun and renamed it the Northern Virginia Sun. Fritchey served as the publisher until 1961, when Stevenson became chief United States delegate to the United Nations and Fritchey accepted a position as director of public affairs for the United States mission. Upon Stevenson's death in 1965, Fritchey left the UN and began writing a syndicated column for Newsday. He retired in 1984 and died in Washington, D.C., on January 23, 2001.

Fulbright, J(ames) William

(1905–1995) U.S. senator

The son of a wealthy banker and prominent businessman, Fulbright was born in Sumner, Mo., on April 9, 1905. He grew up in Fayetteville, Ark., in the northwestern part of the state. He graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1925 and spent the next three years at Oxford on a Rhodes scholarship. Upon his return to the United States in 1928, Fulbright entered George Washington University law school. Following his graduation in 1934, he worked as an intern in the Justice Department's anti-trust division, where he helped prosecute Schechter Poultry Corp. v. U.S. (1935). Fulbright left government service after a year to accept a position as law instructor at George Washington University.

In 1936, Fulbright returned to Fayetteville, where he combined teaching at the University of Arkansas with managing the family's businesses. Three years later, Fulbright, then 34, was appointed president of the university. He was the youngest university president in the United States. As president, he first gained national attention by raising university standards. He also spoke out in opposition to isolationists. When Homer Adkins was elected governor in 1940, he dismissed Fulbright from his post.

In 1942, Fulbright won a seat in the House of Representatives, where he was assigned to the Foreign Affairs Committee. Several months after taking his seat in Congress, he defended Franklin D. Roosevelt's war policies against an attack by Rep. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE (R-Conn.). In June 1943, Fulbright introduced a resolution supporting American participation in a postwar international organization dedicated to preserving peace. The resolution passed both houses of Congress by large margins.

Fulbright won a seat in the Senate in 1944. His campaign emphasized Fulbright's conservative positions on domestic issues. In the Senate, he continued to support internationalism and multilateralism in foreign policy and conservative, politically safe, positions on domestic affairs. He proposed that the UN be empowered to limit armaments and nuclear weapons and recommended abolition of the veto in the Security Council. He also advocated a stronger World Court, with power to make binding decisions. In addition, he became increasingly critical of the Truman administration for its hard line toward the USSR. Fulbright shifted his position, however, after the Soviets rejected an American plan to internationalize atomic weapons. He supported the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty. Domestically, he opposed civil rights legislation and supported several measures opposed by organized labor, including the Taft-Hartley Act.

In September 1945, Fulbright offered a bill for the educational exchange program that would bear his name. The bill passed in 1946.

Fulbright's relations with the Truman administration deteriorated further after Republicans won control of both houses of Congress in 1946, and Fulbright suggested that the president appoint Sen. ARTHUR VANDENBERG (R-Mich.) secretary of state (making him next in line to the presidency) and resign. Truman responded by calling the senator an "overeducated Oxford S.O.B." After winning reelection in 1950, Fulbright chaired a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, which conducted an investigation that uncovered substantial influence peddling in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC).

During the Eisenhower administration, Fulbright continued to support the economic interests of the South. He supported the Dixon-Yates power combine and opposed an increase in the minimum wage. Yet Fulbright was not a conservative who feared and wished to restrict government action. He instead wanted to reorient government from a concentration on defense and highway spending to an emphasis on housing, education, and antitrust programs.

Fulbright was an early critic of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). In the early 1950s, McCarthy and Fulbright clashed over McCarthy's acceptance of $10,000 for writing a pamphlet for a company financed by the RFC (and therefore under the supervision of the Banking and Currency Committee, on which McCarthy served) and Truman's nomination of Philip C. Jessup to be a delegate to the United Nations. In 1953, Fulbright defended the Fulbright Fellowship program, which McCarthy charged with supporting pro-communists. Early in 1954, when McCarthy was at the height of his power, the Senate voted on further appropriations for McCarthy's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. Only Fulbright opposed the bill.

Fulbright played a leading role in the Senate's condemnation of McCarthy in 1954. Because McCarthy's conduct in the Army-McCarthy hearings of the spring had alienated many important senators, Fulbright thought it would be an appropriate time to act against him. Believing that it would be best if a Republican took the lead, Fulbright approached Sen. RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.), who agreed to sponsor a censure resolution. Fulbright helped Flanders prepare the measure, which stated simply that McCarthy had brought discredit to the Senate. Fulbright also did the bulk of the research on the legal and historical precedents for the censure action and handled negotiations with the Democratic leadership. When the original measure proved too vague to attract support, Fulbright amended it with a bill of particulars. In early November, a select committee, headed by Sen. ARTHUR WATKINS (R-Utah), recommended McCarthy's censure. When the final debate began at the end of the month, Fulbright took the Senate floor to denounce the hatred and fears engendered by McCarthy. On December 2, the Senate voted to condemn the senator from Wisconsin.

Fulbright remained an opponent of integration throughout the 1950s. In March 1956, he joined 18 other senators and 82 representatives in signing the "Southern Manifesto," which denounced the Supreme Court's 1954 decision outlawing segregated public schools. The congressmen maintained that the Court had "substituted naked power for established law" and laid the basis for interracial strife. They, therefore, pledged to resist integration by "any lawful means." Although considered inflammatory by many liberals, the statement was more moderate than the one originally proposed by Sen. STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.). That proposal had endorsed the theory of interposition (the use of state power to nullify the Court's decision) and had branded the Court's action illegal and unconstitutional. Fulbright had opposed that extreme language, and the manifesto was modified to gain his support. He voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

During the 1950s, Fulbright frequently clashed with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES over U.S. foreign affairs. He urged a reorientation of U.S. policy from one based on an ideological confrontation with the Soviet Union to one resting on big-power interests. He stressed the need to supply economic and technical rather than military aid to U.S. allies and questioned the administration's dependence on nuclear weapons for defense.

Fulbright also opposed the president's emphasis on the formation of defense pacts with underdeveloped nations. He disapproved of the Southeast Asian Treaty of 1954, which established the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), and the Formosa Resolution of 1955, giving the president the right to use force to defend Formosa (Taiwan) and the Pescadores. In 1957, the senator opposed the Eisenhower Doctrine, which authorized the president to use the armed forces to aid a Middle Eastern nation resisting "armed attack from any country controlled by international communism." Fulbright used the hearings on the resolution to denounce Eisenhower's approach, which he claimed would weaken Western influence in the Middle East. He regarded the Eisenhower Doctrine as disastrous to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and damaging to U.S. friendship with Great Britain and France. A resolution supporting the Eisenhower Doctrine passed the Senate in March 1957. Fulbright was one of 19 senators who voted against it.

Fulbright assumed the chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1959. He held the chair until 1975, making him the longest serving chair of that committee in history.

Fulbright supported LYNDON B. JOHNSON for the presidency in 1960. When JOHN F. KENNEDY won the election, he considered Fulbright for secretary of state, but the senator's record as a segregationist effectively disqualified him. Throughout the 1960s, Fulbright urged an end to foreign policy based on the notion that the United States and USSR were locked in an inevitable ideological conflict. He argued that relations with the Soviets should be seen in terms of a traditional great-power rivalry. In spite of that perspective, he urged a belligerent response during the Cuban missile crisis of 1962. Fulbright became increasingly critical of the war in Vietnam. His friendship with Johnson gave way to hostility as he split with the president first over the intervention in the Dominican Republic and then over Vietnam. By the end of the decade, Fulbright had emerged as the leading symbol of congressional discontent with the war.

In his bid for a sixth term in 1974, Fulbright lost the Democratic primary to Dale Bumpers. After leaving the Senate, Fulbright went to work for the Washington law firm of Hogan & Hartson, where he lobbied for the interests of the governments of Japan and the United Arab Emirates. He retired from the firm in 1994 and died in Washington, D.C., on February 9, 1995.

Funston, G(eorge) Keith

Born in Waterloo, Iowa, on October 12, 1910, G. Keith Funston grew up in Sioux Falls, S.Dak., where his father owned the International Savings Bank. Funston won a scholarship to Trinity College in Connecticut and graduated as class valedictorian in 1932. After earning an M.B.A. from the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration in 1934, he worked from 1935 to 1940 for the American Radiator Co., where he set up a sales incentive plan. In 1940, he joined the Sylvania Electric Products Co. as sales planning director. He then became director of purchasing. Funston left Sylvania to become a dollar-a-year man during World War II, serving at the War Production Board as special assistant, first to former investment banker Sidney Weinberg and then to chairman Donald Nelson. In 1944, he entered the U.S. Naval Reserve as a lieutenant commander. He was assigned to the Industrial Readjustment Branch of the Office of Procurement and Material. That same year, he was chosen president of Trinity College, a position he could not take up until the end of the war. A successful fund-raiser, Funston raised $5 million in six years for the small institution. Funston also served on the boards of directors of seven corporations until 1951, when, upon Weinberg's recommendation, he was selected as president of the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE).

The NYSE provided the physical environment for the buying and selling of stocks, but it also was responsible for "self-regulation," policing its members' ethical behavior in areas outside the purview of the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). The 40-year-old Funston had no background in the securities business when he took the $100,000-a-year post of NYSE president, but his wholesome image and success in selling and public relations equipped him for the task of representing the stock exchange to Washington and the public.

Funston undertook a crusade to improve the public image of the stock market that still suffered from the crash of 1929. Funston proclaimed himself “salesman of shares in America” and used the atmosphere of the cold war to link stock ownership with patriotism. During Funston’s tenure at the NYSE, the number of investors in corporate stocks grew from more than 6 million in 1951 to more than 22 million in 1967. He touted the benefits of owning stocks through a massive advertising campaign. Not all of his innovations, however, were successful. In 1954, he introduced the Monthly Investment Plan (MIP) to encourage small investors by enabling them essentially to buy stocks on an installment basis for as little as $40 a month. The plan proved cumbersome, and high commission costs as well as competition from mutual funds limited the appeal of and participation in the MIP.

As the official spokesman of the NYSE’s 1,300 members, Funston was quick to defend a free market in securities whenever the government attempted to tighten regulation. On January 4, 1954, the Federal Reserve Board raised the margin requirement from 50 percent of a stock’s price to 60 percent. The next day, Funston criticized the board’s action as “hard to understand” because “it comes at a time when industry is seeking new funds to build new plants and equipment.”

During a speculative boom in 1955, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee conducted a study of the stock market. In March Funston testified that, despite the recent sharp rise in speculation, the market was healthy, for the high price level was “not the product of undue extension of credit or of unsound market activity but reflects the confident appraisal of the general public.” Funston dismissed alarms that the current market conditions were similar to those that had caused the crash in 1929, and he opposed proposals to raise margin requirements.

Funston’s tenure coincided with the largest bull market to that point. During the 1960s, he found it increasingly necessary to defend the exchange against criticisms of its “private club” exclusiveness, abuses in stock trading, and the laxity of its performance as self-regulator. He left the NYSE in April 1967 to become chairman of the Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp., a position he held until 1972. He died in Greenwich, Conn., on May 15, 1992.

Gaither, H(orace) Rowan, Jr.
(1909–1961) president, Ford Foundation; presidential adviser

Born in Natchez, Miss., on November 23, 1909, H. Rowan Gaither obtained his B.A. from the University of California at Berkeley in 1929 and a law degree there four years later. He then moved to Washington, D.C., to serve as a special assistant to the Farm Credit Administration. In 1936, Gaither returned to California to practice law and teach at Berkeley's law school. During World War II, Gaither served as assistant director of the Radiation Laboratory of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Following the war, he returned to private law practice. He helped to establish the RAND Corporation, an independent, nonprofit organization to carry out research on national defense, initially for the air force. When RAND got under way in 1948, Gaither became chair of the board of trustees, a position he held until his death. At RAND, Gaither worked closely with the Ford Foundation, which funded many of the corporation's projects. In 1951, the Ford Foundation appointed Gaither associate director in charge of the investigation of human behavior and conduct. Two years later, he was elected president.

In 1954, the House Special Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations heard testimony on charges that the Ford, Rockefeller, Carnegie, and other foundations supported subversive activities. On July 24, Gaither charged that the committee "maligned" the foundation with irresponsible testimony and called its accusations "erroneous and baseless . . . sheerest nonsense."

Gaither asked for an opportunity to appear before the committee to avert a damaging effect on the "morale, initiative and freedom of scientific, educational and charitable organizations." However, public hearings ended before representatives of the foundations were heard.

In December, the majority on the committee issued a report maintaining that, while the foundations did not support communist organizations, they "have directly supported 'subversion' in the true meaning of that term, namely, the process of undermining some of our vital protective concepts and principles." Gaither joined DEAN RUSK, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, in calling the report biased and unfounded.

Gaither took over the Ford Foundation at a time of turmoil and conflict. His skill at conciliation and his ability to forge consensus proved incapable of resolving fundamental disagreements at the foundation. In 1956, Donald David replaced him as president, and Gaither was elevated to chairman of the board.

In the spring of 1957, Gaither headed a study, commissioned by the National Security Council (NSC), of Soviet offensive capabilities and American defense requirements. Gaither fell ill with cancer as the committee's work got under way and was unable to participate in the preparation of the committee's report. Nevertheless, the committee became known as the Gaither Committee and its findings as the Gaither Report. The report was presented to the National Security Council in early November, three days after Gaither had briefed the president. The Gaither panel presented a grim evaluation of the relative strengths of the United States and Soviet Union. The Soviet gross national product, although roughly one-third that of the United States, was growing at a faster rate. Moreover, Soviet military spending roughly equaled that of the United States. The Gaither group predicted that, because of increased Soviet military spending, the USSR would be able to launch 100 intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) carrying nuclear warheads against the United States by 1959. The report further warned that American manned bombers of the Strategic Air Command, except for those on alert status, would be vulnerable. The report recommended a comprehensive revision of defense policies and a substantial increase in military spending. Specifically, the report called for expanded missile programs, rapid development of an ICBM early warning system, and development of a national system of fallout shelters to protect the civilian population. The panel also predicted that future conflicts were more likely to be limited wars rather than all-out nuclear ones. Therefore, the panel recommended an expansion of conventional forces. Eisenhower regarded the report as unduly pessimistic and rejected many of the panel's findings. For example, he contended that American overseas bases provided a great capacity for dispersion of forces. Moreover, Eisenhower particularly objected to the $40-billion price tag for the committee's recommendations.

Amid the near hysteria over the Soviet launch of Sputnik on October 4, 1957, parts of the highly secret report were leaked to the press in November 1957. Despite growing demands for the release of the full report, led by Senate Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Eisenhower refused to do so, a position which Gaither supported. Moreover, Gaither refused to make public any information from the report. Subsequently, president JOHN F. KENNEDY also refused to release the report. Gaither died of cancer in Boston, Mass., on April 7, 1961.

Galbraith, John Kenneth

(1908–2006) economist

Born on a farm near Iona Station, Ontario, Canada, on October 15, 1908, John Kenneth Galbraith received a B.S. from Ontario Agricultural College in 1931 and his Ph.D. in economics from the University of California at Berkeley in 1934. After working over the summer for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, he took a job as an instructor in the economics department at Harvard in the fall of 1934. He remained at Harvard until 1939. In the fall of 1937, he became a United States citizen, just before he went to Cambridge University for the 1937–38 academic year on a Social Science Research Council Fellowship in agricultural economics. In 1939 he became an assistant professor of economics at Princeton. After a year at Princeton, he went to Washington, D.C., to serve as economic adviser to Chester Davis, the agricultural member of the National Defense Advisory Committee. In 1941, Galbraith moved to the Office of Price Administration as director of price controls. He resigned in 1943 under fire from a variety of business and congressional critics. Later that year, HENRY LUCE hired Galbraith as an editor of Fortune magazine. Galbraith continued to work for Fortune, with interruptions, until 1948. In 1945, Galbraith directed the United States Strategic Bombing Survey, the purpose of which was to assess the effects of the air war against Germany and Japan. After the war, he served as director of the State Department's Office of Economic Security Policy, which controlled the economic affairs of the former Axis powers.

Galbraith returned to Harvard as a lecturer in economics in 1948. He became a full professor a year later and Paul M. Warburg professor of economics in 1959. During the 1950s, he published a number of highly influential analyses of the American economy. Through his trenchant expression and witty debunking of what he referred to as "conventional wisdom," Galbraith attracted a wide audience for his advocacy of Keynesian economics and liberal politics.

In American Capitalism: The Concept of Countervailing Power (1952), Galbraith argued that the classical model of small competing units did not apply to the modern American economy. Large corporations, he maintained, had come to dominate the American economy because only they could afford to make the large-scale investments in new processes, expensive equipment, and basic research necessary to sustain economic growth.

Nevertheless, he argued, big business would not go unchecked, because trade unions, farm organizations, consumer groups, and big government acted as “countervailing powers.” For Galbraith, big government acted as the protector of social units too weak or unorganized to maintain a fair equilibrium. Galbraith’s essentially sanguine picture of the structure of the American economy had enormous influence on perceptions of American society during the 1950s.

In 1955, Galbraith published The Great Crash: 1929, a lively account of the stock market crash that marked the beginning of the Great Depression. According to Galbraith, the cause of the market’s collapse was the “speculative orgy” that preceded it. Galbraith argued that the crash did not cause the depression but that it helped to trigger the larger economic crisis. He maintained that had the economy not had grave underlying weaknesses, such as a severe maldistribution of income and a bad banking structure, the crash probably would not have precipitated such a deep depression. Galbraith’s emphasis on “maldistribution,” by which he meant the unequal distribution of wealth, ignored the fact that the distribution of wealth was more unequal in the first decade and a half of the 20th century than it had been in the 1920s, and no depression ensued. Moreover, Galbraith’s analysis overlooked the significance of the fact that the economy of the 1920s was driven by sales of consumer durables.

In March 1955, Galbraith appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee investigating that year’s stock market boom. He told the committee that the speculative hysteria was unhealthy and was one of several factors that disturbingly resembled conditions preceding the crash in 1929. He urged raising margin requirements on stock purchases to 100 percent, a proposal sharply at variance from the recommendations of the stock exchange officials who testified. The stock market dropped the day after Galbraith’s testimony, but the crash he predicted never came.

Galbraith’s testimony infuriated the committee’s senior Republican, Sen. Homer Capehart (R-Ind.), who later accused the economist of disparaging the American economy and “praising communism.” In a public telegram, Galbraith accused the senator of taking some sentences from a pamphlet Galbraith had written out of context. In addition, the economist charged Capehart with omitting passages in the pamphlet critical of communism. The dispute flared briefly on the front pages and then died. Galbraith’s most important work of the decade was The Affluent Society (1958), a critique of national priorities. In it, Galbraith questioned the national consensus that greater production and an abundance of goods provided adequately for America’s needs. Liberals and conservatives, he maintained, agreed that unlimited economic growth, spurred by Keynesian demand management, could maintain high levels of employment, eliminate poverty, and provide an alternative to Marxist demands for redistribution of wealth. Galbraith concurred with other economists that the “uncertainties of economic life” that had dominated earlier eras had either been eliminated or were less “serious” in the United States after World War II. However, he saw different dangers: inflation and consumer debt. Further, Galbraith derided the American preoccupation with the variety and quantity of consumer goods, a craving he believed owed more to advertising than real need. In contrast to the affluent private sector, Galbraith painted a picture of squalor in the public sector. He pointed to the deterioration of the infrastructure of America’s cities, as well as inadequate spending on schools, hospitals, libraries, parks, playgrounds, museums, and police, as examples of public undertakings neglected in pursuit of private abundance. Galbraith called for a rearrangement of national priorities and specifically urged an increase in progressive taxation and in spending on the public sector.

Galbraith returned to the topic of inflation in an essay in The Liberal Hour (1960). In his analysis, inflation resulted largely from price increases in a few highly concentrated industries, such as steel, automobiles, rubber, and machinery. Because of the power of the “largest and strongest firms” and the “largest and strongest unions,” prices rose in an inflationary spiral, irrespective of market fluctuations. “Modern inflation,” he wrote, “is not neutral.” “Because of its inevitable identification with economic strength,” Galbraith concluded, “it is inequitable, regressive, and reactionary.” Galbraith rejected monetary adjustments as an ineffective response. Another possible solution, fiscal policy, he contended, severely cut demand, output, and employment and was therefore “worse than the disease.” Instead, he proposed wage and price restraints applied to what he regarded as unwarranted increases in highly concentrated industries.

Throughout the 1950s, Galbraith lent his support to various liberal causes and the Democratic party. As a member of ADLAI STEVENSON’s presidential campaign staff in 1952 and 1956, his primary function was to tutor the candidate in Keynesian economics. From 1956 to 1960, Galbraith chaired the Democratic Advisory Council’s economic panel. An early supporter of Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY’s (D-Mass.) presidential nomination, Galbraith was rewarded after Kennedy won the presidency in 1960. The economist served as an unofficial economic adviser to the Kennedy administration and as ambassador to India from 1961 to 1963.

Returning to Harvard in 1963, he spent four years producing The New Industrial State (1967), another analysis of the political economy of the United States. In it, he argued that large corporations made up a “technostructure” necessary for continuing technological advances. However, they did not focus on maximizing profit in the way neoclassical economists believed. Rather, they controlled consumer demand through advertising and marketing. In addition, big business and government worked together to maintain economic stability. Thus, he concluded that the American economy did not differ all that much from Soviet economic planning and that the two systems might converge. For his own part, Galbraith argued for the nationalization of some industries, including defense contractors, and for a system of wage and price controls.

During the administrations of LYNDON B. JOHNSON and RICHARD M. NIXON, Galbraith continued to reach a broad readership with his books and polemical essays. Although he served as an advisor to Johnson, Galbraith split with him over the Vietnam War and emerged as an outspoken critic of the war and a prominent figure in the left wing of the Democratic party. He supported the candidacies of EUGENE MCCARTHY in 1968 and George McGovern in 1972.

Galbraith published Economics and the Public Purpose (1973), in which he argued for a new socialism. The free enterprise system, he maintained, no longer could support certain industries. His new socialism, however, would not nationalize banks and high-technology industries, as socialists had previously intended. Rather, it would nationalize housing, health, and other public service industries. Further, Galbraith called for public support of the arts and the conversion of some corporations and military contractors into public corporations. Ever the partisan Democrat, Galbraith criticized the economic policies of the Nixon administration and blamed the president for the economic downturn of the 1970s.

After retiring from Harvard in 1975, Galbraith continued to write and participate in Democratic party politics. His books from this period included Annals of an Abiding Liberal (1979), A Life in Our Times (1981), A Journey through Economic Time (1994), and The Good Society: The Humane Agenda (1996). Even as the political climate moved away from the sort of liberalism he espoused, Galbraith never changed his approach or attempted to distance himself from the label of liberalism. In a 1992 article in Modern Maturity, the magazine of the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP), he asserted that “there is no hope for liberals if they seek only to imitate conservatives, and no function, either.” Galbraith died in Cambridge, Mass., on April 29, 2006.

Gardner, Trevor

(1915–1963) assistant secretary of the air force for research and development

Born in Cardiff, Wales, on August 24, 1915, Gardner became an American citizen in 1937 and received a B.S. degree in engineering from the University of Southern California during the same year. After earning his M.B.A. in 1939, Gardner became general manager and executive vice president of the General Tire and Rubber Co. of California in 1945. Three years later, he was named president of the Hycon Co., a manufacturer of electrical parts.

In the spring of 1953, Air Force Secretary HAROLD TALBOTT appointed Gardner special assistant to look into air force research and development. Gardner quickly found an area of particular interest in the long-range missile program. Through both official and unofficial efforts, he enormously speeded development of the nation's first intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) over the next few years.

While the budget-minded Republican administration was interested in reducing defense spending, Gardner questioned whether enough money was being allocated to develop a workable ICBM ahead of the Soviet Union. In June 1953, Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON joined Talbott in asking Gardner to widen his probe of the long-range missile program. However, while the defense secretary had economy in mind, Gardner was contemplating a crash development program for the Atlas missile estimated at $2.75 billion. By the fall of 1953, Gardner had created the Strategic Missiles Evaluation Committee (SMEC), a review committee chaired by Dr. John von Neumann of Princeton University. In February 1954, SMEC reported that an operational ICBM could be produced within six to eight years, but only if the project were accorded "the highest national priority." Gardner agreed with the panel's conclusions. He also urged Secretary Talbott to create a new, separate agency to oversee development of the ICBM. Gardner failed to get a separate agency, but he did get a new western development division within the air force's Air Research and Development Command to oversee the ICBM project. Gardner also successfully backed the appointment of Gen. Bernard Schriever to head the division. Nevertheless, Gardner and Schriever encountered resistance from the air force bureaucracy, which placed greater emphasis on the new B-52 bomber.

President Eisenhower nominated Trevor Gardner to be assistant air force secretary in August 1954. Sen. BOURKE HICKENLOOPER (R-Iowa) blocked confirmation because of allegations that Gardner had supported nuclear scientist Dr. J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER in a dispute with the loyalty review board the same year. Talbott announced he would retain Gardner as his special assistant. In February 1955, President Eisenhower resubmitted the nomination; Hickenlooper withdrew his objection, and Gardner was quickly confirmed.

In the spring of 1955, Gardner and Schriever took their case to Congress. In testimony before a congressional committee, they told of the bureaucratic obstacles they faced and warned that the Soviets might be winning the race to build an ICBM. After two members of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy sent a letter to Eisenhower in June urging a crash program to develop the ICBM, the president had Gardner and Schriever present a special briefing on the ICBM to the National Security Council. After their presentation, Eisenhower authorized the NSC to give the ICBM "the highest national priority," which enabled Gardner and Schriever to overcome any bureaucratic impediments. Still, Eisenhower refused to authorize a cash program or to create either a separate agency or overall czar of the missile program.

The ICBM program also faced competition from intermediate range ballistic missiles (IRBMs). In March 1954, Eisenhower asked a panel of his scientific advisory committee to study defense in a thermonuclear age. The panel, headed by JAMES KILLIAN, the president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, reported its findings in February 1955. Although it supported the ICBM program and deemed progress on it "satisfactory," the report warned that ICBMs would not be militarily significant for perhaps 10 years. Therefore, it recommended the development of IRBMs. Eisenhower granted the IRBM program the same priority status as the ICBM program. Gardner, who believed that the government's efforts should be concentrated on developing an ICBM, disagreed with the president's decision.

In November 1955, Secretary Wilson created a Ballistic Missiles Committee within the Defense Department to preclude interservice rivalries from interfering with the development of ballistic missiles. The air force also established its own ballistic missile committee to work around the air staff, which still gave preference to the B-52.

Gardner believed the ICBM program should be more generously funded. In January 1956, he requested an additional $120 million in research funds for fiscal year 1956 and an additional $250 million for 1957. Air Force Secretary DONALD A. QUARLES rejected Gardner's proposal twice, and Gardner resigned in February. President Eisenhower accepted his resignation within a few days. Gardner then publicly stated he did not believe the United States could maintain military superiority over the Soviet Union at current spending levels. In a post-resignation appearance on television's Meet the Press, Gardner asserted that the Soviet Union led the United States in ICBM development and warned that the military budget for 1957 "guaranteed this nation the second-best air force in the world." He repeated these charges in June, testifying before the Senate Armed Services Committee's Air Force Subcommittee, chaired by Sen. STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.).

Following his resignation, Gardner returned to the presidency and chairmanship of the Hycon Co. From 1960 to 1961, he chaired the Air Force Space Task Force. Gardner died in Washington, D.C., on September 28, 1963.

Gates, Thomas S(overeign), Jr.

The son of an investment banker who later became president of the University of Pennsylvania, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., was born in Germantown, Pa., on April 10, 1906. He received his B.A. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1928 and joined his father's firm, Drexel and Co. The younger Gates became a partner in 1940. During World War II, Gates served in the Navy. He graduated from the Quonset Point Air Intelligence School in Rhode Island and helped organize naval air intelligence in Europe. Gates rose to the rank of lieutenant commander before being released from active duty in October 1945. After the war, he returned to Drexel.

Nominated by President DWIGHT EISENHOWER to be undersecretary of the navy in October 1953, Gates removed himself from an active role in banking and was confirmed without difficulty. Naval division heads reported directly to the undersecretary, and in 1955 Gates settled a dispute over the relationship between the navy and Marine Corps commands. Gates actively promoted a naval nuclear strike force as part of Eisenhower's "New Look" defense policy. In November 1956, he defended aircraft carriers under construction as more mobile and thus safer for launching aircraft than land-based runways.

Eisenhower named him secretary of the navy in March 1957. Days after his confirmation, Gates stated that aircraft carriers would be the navy's principal strike force. He accurately forecast the future importance of atomic submarines armed with missiles. Gates sacrificed funds for conventional vessels to begin building the nation's first atomic carrier.

After the Soviet Union launched Sputnik on October 4, 1957, the missile programs of the U.S. armed services faced mounting criticism. In response, Gates revealed plans for the submarine-based Polaris missile system. Following his own previous example, the secretary sacrificed projects on which the navy had spent over $680 million for the success of Polaris over the next two years.

Unhappy with the reorganization of the Defense Department in 1958 that increased the power of the secretary of defense at the expense of the service secretaries, Gates resigned from the navy in February 1959. In a resignation-eve speech, he pointed to the increased communist capacity to wage limited war and called for building the capacity of the navy and Marine Corps to counter limited aggression.

Gates became deputy defense secretary the following June. The next month, he testified before the House Armed Services Committee investigating charges that a "munitions lobby" heavily staffed by retired Pentagon officials sought to influence the awarding of defense contracts. Gates upheld the right of former officers to work in defense industries, denied feeling lobbying pressure, and said he closely watched for conflict of interest among ex-officers.

When NEIL McELROY resigned as defense secretary in December, President Eisenhower appointed Gates to succeed him. Although expected to exercise a caretaker's role during the final year of the Eisenhower administration, Gates plunged into promoting greater cooperation between the Joint Chiefs of Staff and their civilian superiors. Much of Gates's year as defense secretary was devoted to defending the administration's $41-billion defense budget against Democratic charges of inadequacy and a "missile gap." In January 1960, Sen. STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.) led the attack, claiming the Soviets would soon boast a three-to-one missile lead over the United States. He called for a step-up in all missile programs and for an around-the-clock airborne bomber alert. Symington was supported by Strategic Air Command commander in chief Gen. Thomas Power. In hearings before the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and the Senate Armed Services Committee, the defense secretary countered by revealing new intelligence estimates of a much smaller gap and asserting that an adequate defense did not hinge on a missile-to-missile ratio. Although the Democratic Congress approved a defense budget roughly in line with the administration's requests in April, charges of a missile gap continued throughout the election year.

The Department of Defense was embarrassed in May when a U-2 spy plane was shot down over Soviet airspace. The incident came on the eve of summit talks between the United States and the USSR and led Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev to break off the meeting. Called before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee the following month, Gates defended the flights, which, he asserted, produced a wide range of vital information. He termed a military alert he had ordered during the summit as "absolutely essential" and denied that it was provocative.

After the elections of November 1960, the press reported that President-elect JOHN F. KENNEDY seriously contemplated retaining Gates as defense secretary but eventually nominated Robert S. McNamara, the president of Ford Motor Co. Not wishing to commit McNamara to last-minute decisions made by the Eisenhower administration, the outgoing secretary suspended navy and air force projects for new supersonic aircraft and eliminated the proposed Skybolt missile system from the defense budget in January 1961.

Upon retiring, Gates joined Morgan and Company in New York, which later became Morgan Guaranty Trust Company. He became president in 1962 and chairman and chief executive officer in 1965. President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him to chair the Advisory Commission on an All-Volunteer Force. In 1976 President GERALD R. FORD chose Gates to serve as chief of the United States Liaison Office in the People's Republic of China. Gates died in Philadelphia on March 25, 1983.

Gavin, James M(aurice)

(1907–1990) chief of research and development, Army General Staff

Born of uncertain parentage in New York City on March 22, 1907, Gavin was adopted in 1909 by a coal miner and his wife, taken to live in Mount Carmel, Pa., and given their name. In 1924, he enlisted in the army as a private; the following year, he was admitted to U.S. Military Academy at West Point, from which he graduated in 1929. Gavin began his military career in the infantry but became an expert in air operations while teaching tactics at West Point in 1940. He became convinced of the importance of airborne warfare and became a paratrooper in 1941. After the United States entered World War II, Gavin entered an accelerated course at the Command and General Staff School. Upon completing the course in 1942, he was promoted to colonel and appointed chief of military operations of the Airborne Command at Fort Bragg, N.C. The following year, Gavin led the 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment in the invasion of Sicily. Promoted to brigadier general at age 36, he led the 82nd Airborne in the Normandy landing. Gavin was given command of the 82nd Airborne in August 1944 and led the division through the Battle of the Bulge and the Allied drive across Germany. In December 1945, he returned to Fort Bragg with his division, which he continued to command until he became chief of staff of the Fifth Army in 1948. In 1949, he was assigned to the Defense Department's Weapons Systems Evaluation Group. Two years later, he became chief of staff of allied forces in southern Europe. He returned to Germany in 1952 to command the VII Corps. In 1954, Gavin was appointed assistant chief of staff for plans and operations and was given the temporary rank of lieutenant general. He became chief of research and development for the army general staff, with the rank of deputy chief of staff, in 1955.

Gavin soon emerged as a prominent opponent of the Eisenhower administration's "New Look," which emphasized the nuclear deterrent and air power at the expense of conventional forces. Like Gen. MAXWELL TAYLOR, another famous paratrooper, Gavin argued for expanded conventional forces to fight limited wars. Gavin advocated the development of an antimissile missile and joined Taylor in urging that the army's Nike-Zeus missile be armed with nuclear warheads and developed to destroy incoming ICBMs. In defending this plan against opposition from the air force, Gavin contended that the Strategic Air Command did not provide a sufficient deterrent and that, in the future, missiles would prove more effective. However, Gavin also intensely disliked Taylor, the army chief of staff, with whom he had a long-standing rivalry.

Gavin stirred a political controversy in January 1958 by announcing that he would retire on the grounds that he "could do more on the outside for national defense than on the inside." Gavin also suggested that his chances for promotion had been jeopardized by the position he had taken. However, Gavin denied that his decision was a result of difficulties over promotion and said that his real reason was his inability "to get something done about the deteriorating position of the army." In final testimony before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee, chaired by Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), Gavin denounced the administration's policy, maintaining that army leaders "were asked to lead men into battle but denied necessary weapons." Gavin again warned that U.S. retaliatory power was declining in the face of Soviet missile production. Despite requests from Johnson and other powerful members of Congress that he remain, Gavin resigned effective March 1958.

Following his resignation, Gavin joined the industrial research and management consulting firm of Arthur Little, Inc., but continued as a prominent critic of Eisenhower's defense policy. In 1958, he published War and Peace in the Space Age, which warned that the United States would need to develop more flexible military policies to fight future wars, Gavin cautioned that America's reliance on strategic nuclear weapons had left it incapable of fighting limited wars. This, in turn, would lead to a series of political and military defeats and "invite general war." "Such a war," he predicted, "is one that no one will win."

In 1958, Gavin joined a group advising Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), who was planning a bid for the presidency. The following year, Gavin supported the contention that a "missile gap" existed between the United States and the USSR.

Kennedy later used the allegation in his presidential campaign.

In 1961, Kennedy appointed Gavin ambassador to France. He resigned the post in 1962 because of the high personal expenses of running the embassy. Gavin returned to Arthur Little. As the United States escalated its military commitment, Gavin became a prominent critic of the Vietnam War. He had opposed intervention when he was in the army and, as the 1960s progressed, grew increasingly critical of American strategy and tactics. Gavin maintained that the United States had committed too large a portion of its resources to the war at the expense of other commitments. Further, he advocated an "enclave strategy," which would have limited American ground forces to defensive operations, as a prelude to withdrawal. In 1968 he coauthored Crisis Now with Arthur Hadley; the book called for an end to the war and a reallocation of resources to rebuild America's cities and to aid the poor. He retired in 1977 and published an account of his experiences during World War II, On to Berlin, in 1978. Gavin died in Baltimore on February 23, 1990.

Genovese, Vito

(1897–1969) organized crime figure

Born in Rossiglione, Italy, on November 27, 1897, Vito Genovese immigrated to New York in 1913. He was arrested for the first time when he was 19, and he served a short prison term for carrying a pistol. During Prohibition, Genovese moved up in the underworld as an ally of Charles "Lucky" Luciano. The ambitious gangster preferred to maintain a low profile, hiding his illicit income behind a legitimate front. In 1925 he set up the Genovese Trading Co. Throughout his life, he portrayed himself as an honest junk dealer.

During the 1930s, Genovese rose in the hierarchy of the underworld. His primary activities involved gambling and extortion. He and Luciano were involved in a series of murders related to a struggle for power within the Italian underworld. After THOMAS E. DEWEY obtained a conviction against Luciano in 1936 for compulsory prostitution, the special prosecutor turned his attention to Genovese, particularly to the murder of Ferdinand Boccia in 1934. Genovese, who had become a naturalized citizen in 1936, fled the country the following year. He donated $250,000 to Italy's fascist government and received that country's highest civilian award from Benito Mussolini. After the Allied invasion of Italy, Genovese offered his services as a translator. He was jailed in 1944, when an investigation of black marketing turned up his role in the black market. While he was being held, word came of his indictment in the United States for the murder of Boccia. Military authorities returned Genovese to Brooklyn to stand trial, but the state's chief witness was found poisoned in jail, and prosecutors had to drop the charges.

In 1950–51 Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) chaired sensational televised hearings into organized crime. The hearings identified Genovese as a major figure in the Mafia. Genovese tried to establish a stronger position within the Mafia in 1957, at least allegedly, through the attempted assassination of FRANK COSTELLO, reputed to be Luciano's successor, and the murder of ALBERT ANASTASIA, said to be Costello's "muscle." Costello retired after the attempt on his life.

In November 1957, Genovese convened an underworld conference in Apalachin, N.Y., to declare himself head of New York's organized crime. On the agenda was a directive from the Mafia's 12-man national commission, of which Genovese was a member, ordering the mob out of narcotics because of the high arrest risk. Police broke up the Apalachin meeting and arrested Genovese along with roughly 60 other underworld figures.

Genovese was summoned before the Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field in July 1958 to answer questions on his narcotics activities. He invoked the Fifth Amendment 150 times. Genovese was arrested five days later for conspiracy to transport and deal in narcotics. At his trial in 1959, he received a 15-year sentence. Genovese continued directing his criminal operations from Atlanta's federal prison.

During the 1960s, Joseph Valachi, a convicted mobster and member of Genovese's gang, went to the authorities claiming Genovese was trying to have him killed. In retaliation, Valachi testified before the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee for 10 weeks starting in September 1963. He sketched a nationwide crime syndicate in what Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY called the biggest intelligence breakthrough of the century. Valachi also testified that Genovese continued to run a large criminal empire from behind bars. Federal authorities transferred Genovese to Leavenworth, in Kansas. With his health failing, Genovese was transferred to the medical facility at Springfield, where he died on February 14, 1969.

George, Walter F(ranklin)

(1878–1957) U.S. senator; chairman, Foreign Relations Committee; ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization

The son of a tenant farmer, Walter George was born near Preston, Ga., on January 29, 1878. He distinguished himself in intercollegiate oratorical contests while attending Mercer University, a Baptist institution, from which he graduated in 1900. He received his law degree from the same institution a year later. In 1901, he moved to Vienna, Ga., and set up a law practice there. He became solicitor general for the Cordele Judiciary Circuit in 1907 and a judge of that circuit's Superior Court in 1912. George took a seat on the Georgia Court of Appeals (the state's highest court) in 1917. He resigned from the court in 1922 to run for the Senate seat left vacant by the death of the fiery populist Tom Watson. Supported by Atlanta business interests as well as South Georgia Watsonites, George was elected by a landslide and reelected in each of five subsequent contests.

In the Senate, George gradually rose to power through diligence, seniority, and quiet promotion of conservative policies. He became a member of the Finance Committee in 1927 and over the years established himself as the Senate's expert on taxes. Although a supporter of some early New Deal measures, including the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Social Security Act, and the Wagner Labor Relations Act, by Roosevelt's second term he had emerged as a leading foe of reform legislation. He mobilized opposition to housing and wage-hour bills and managed the defeat of Roosevelt's "court-packing" plan. In the election of 1938, Roosevelt campaign against George in the Democratic primary as part of the so-called purge of key congressional conservatives obstructing his program, but the strategy backfired. George won reelection over a supporter of the New Deal, Lawrence Camp, and a rural demagogue, Eugene Talmadge.

George initially favored neutrality legislation and helped kill Roosevelt's request for cash-and-carry sales to European democracies in the event of a war. Hitler's invasion of Poland changed his mind, and, upon assuming the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee in November 1940, George helped win passage of the president's lend-lease program. In August 1941, he resigned the Foreign Relations chairmanship to take over that of the Finance Committee. Except for the 1947–48 session, he held that position until 1953. During the Truman years, he was a powerful foe of the Fair Deal. George provided crucial support for Truman's foreign-policy initiatives, however, backing Greek-Turkish aid, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty.

When the 83rd Congress convened in January 1953 with Republican majorities, the chairmanship of the Finance Committee passed to Sen. EUGENE MILLIKIN (R-Colo.) George remained the ranking Democrat on the Finance and Foreign Relations Committees, and his 30 years of service made him the Senate's most senior member. By the first term of the Eisenhower administration, George had become a pillar of the Senate "establishment." He carried himself with the manner of a southern aristocrat, in spite of his decidedly nonaristocratic background. George did not speak frequently on the floor of the Senate, but when he did, his thorough preparation and resonant voice compelled the respectful attention of his colleagues.

George played an important role in the controversy over the Bricker amendment, designed to limit the power of the president in making foreign policy and vigorously opposed by the Eisenhower administration. In response to criticism that a clause in the amendment would necessitate approval by every state for all foreign agreements, George proposed a substitute removing that requirement while mandating that all executive agreements win Senate ratification. The Eisenhower administration opposed George's version as well. In February 1954, George's bill fell one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass the Senate.

For the most part, however, George served as an influential ally of the Eisenhower administration on matters of foreign policy. When Sen. WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) called for a blockade of mainland China in November 1954 in order to secure the release of 13 captured Americans, George endorsed the administration's refusal to take such action. After the Democrats won control of both houses in the election of 1954, George assumed the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee. In January 1955, he sponsored a resolution giving the president unlimited authority to use U.S. armed forces to protect Taiwan and the Pescadores islands off China. The Senate passed the measure overwhelmingly.

Increasingly concerned about the peaceful settlement of international disputes, George spurred preparations for a four-power summit conference with his call for such a conclave during an appearance on Meet the Press on March 20, 1955. The White House and the State Department responded favorably to his suggestion that the summit meeting need not be put off until the Soviets made peaceful gestures in "deeds, not words," as the administration had previously demanded. The conference, involving the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and France, took place in July 1955.

In April 1955, George declared that "we ought to be willing to talk" with the Communist Chinese "because we certainly owe a high obligation to all mankind everywhere." Two months later, he proposed resumption of trade between Japan and China. Referring to complaints he had received from southern textile manufacturers about trading concessions made by the United States to Japan, he maintained that resumption of Japan-China trade would relax "cutthroat competition" against American companies.

George provided valuable service to the Eisenhower administration in the congressional battle over foreign aid in 1956. In June he led the effort in the Foreign Relations Committee to restore $1 billion cut by the House from the administration's $4.8-billion request. The committee refused to restore the total sum but did agree to put back $600 million. George then successfully steered the measure past efforts to reduce it on the Senate floor. The absence of any U.S. financial support for Egypt's Aswan Dam project was due partly to George's opposition. He based his stand on his objection to long-term aid commitments and to the possibility that the Aswan Dam would make 2 million acres available for cotton-growing, thereby cutting into U.S. cotton exports.

Republican control of the Senate in 1953–54 and George's growing preoccupation with foreign affairs meant that he had less influence on economic policy than he had enjoyed as chair of the Finance Committee. However, he continued to exert considerable influence on behalf of fiscal conservatism. In January 1953, he responded to the $78.5-billion budget submitted by the outgoing Truman administration by stating that "the principal duty of this Congress and the new administration is to see to it that the budget is cut." In March 1955, he voted against a temporary tax cut of $20 per taxpayer offered by his fellow Democrats. He was among the half-dozen southern Democrats providing the Republicans with the 50-44 margin by which the cut was rejected.

A lifelong segregationist, George opposed every civil rights measure, including antilynching bills. He was one of the leaders of the movement behind the "Southern Manifesto" of 1956. The strategists met in George's office to draft the statement, and George acted as the group's spokesman, presenting the declaration in the Senate on March 12. Signed by 19 senators and 77 representatives, the manifesto denounced the Supreme Court's decision on public school desegregation and pledged resistance to it by "all lawful means."

Facing a stiff primary challenge by white-supremacist HERMAN TALMADGE, George announced in May 1956 that he would not seek reelection. In July, in an unexpected move, he sponsored an amendment to a Social Security bill to qualify totally disabled workers for full Social Security benefits at age 50. The measure, which never would have passed without the southern conservative's surprise blessing, carried by a 47-45 vote.

In January 1957, President Eisenhower appointed George ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. George served only briefly;

he died of heart disease in Vienna, Ga. on August 4, 1957.

Ginsberg, Allen

(1926–1997) poet

Born in Newark, N.J., on June 3, 1926, Ginsberg's childhood was scarred by the harrowing experience of watching his mother's psychological deterioration, first at home, then in a mental hospital. He expressed his anguish and love for her in the elegy, "Kaddish for Naomi Ginsberg" (1961). His father, Louis, was a teacher and poet of a more traditional style who was critical of Ginsberg's first attempts at poetry. The younger Ginsberg entered Columbia College in 1943 after briefly attending Montclair State College. While at Columbia, Ginsberg became good friends with the writers William S. Burroughs and JACK KEROUAC. He graduated in 1948. Ginsberg worked as a market research consultant between 1951 and 1953 while writing in his spare time.

In 1953, Ginsberg decided to move to San Francisco and devote himself completely to his poetry. Ginsberg became acquainted with such writers as Kenneth Rexroth, Michael McClure, and Gary Snyder, who shared his need to divorce himself from traditional styles and develop a new type of poetry.

The result of Ginsberg's search for a poetic voice was the long epic poem Howl!, one of the major literary and social documents of the 1950s. It both attacked American spiritual stagnation and affirmed personal joy. The famous opening of Howl!, which became Ginsberg's best-known poem, powerfully expressed the Beat perspective: "I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness, starving hysterical naked,/dragging themselves through the negro streets at dawn looking for an angry fix."

The poem, with Kerouac's On the Road, signified the beginning of the San Francisco Renaissance and the Beat Generation, cultural and literary movements that, a decade later, powerfully influenced the counter culture of the 1960s. On the Road and Howl! seemed to galvanize the feelings of those who deplored American materialism and sought to restore a deep sense of community to their lives. Most literary reviewers scorned Howl!, rejecting its exuberant use of sexual and scatological language. A few applauded what they termed the important, “messianic” voice of the poem. Meanwhile, Ginsberg won a wide American audience. Lawrence Ferlinghetti published Howl! And Other Poems in 1956. The open celebration of homosexuality and drug use in Howl! led to its impoundment by U.S. Customs agents, and Ginsberg was tried on obscenity charges in 1957. After a long trial, at which a series of witnesses testified to the poem’s literary merit, Judge Clayton Horn ruled that the poem met the test of “redeeming social importance.”

Ginsberg wrote prolifically, and his poems appeared in both smaller and established publications during the late-1950s. He emerged as a cultural spokesman for a segment of American youth and left-oriented individuals in the 1960s. During those years, he advocated the liberalization of laws against nonaddictive drugs and proselytized for unrestricted sexual freedom. He also organized antiwar demonstrations and initiated efforts to halt ecological destruction and the spread of nuclear weapons. In 1974, Ginsberg’s achievements as a poet were recognized with a National Book Award for his collection of poetry, The Fall of America.

From the 1960s through the 1980s, Ginsberg seemed to be in the forefront of whatever movement was fashionable. He championed the sexual revolution, the counterculture, and the antiwar movement in the 1960s. He demonstrated against the CIA and the Shah of Iran in the 1970s and protested against nuclear weapons and President Ronald Reagan in the 1980s. The publication of an anthology of his work, Collected Poems, in 1985 firmly established Ginsberg’s reputation as a major American poet. He went on a book tour and appeared frequently on television, but instead of his familiar Beat or countercultural clothing, he wore a suit and tie. He acknowledged that his political judgments had not always been sound. “I thought,” he admitted, “the North Vietnamese would be a lot better than they turned out to be.” He further mused that “I shouldn’t have been marching against the Shah of Iran because the mullahs have turned out to be a lot worse.”

Even as he involved himself in a myriad of activities, he continued to write. Over the years, he published Wichita Vortex Sutra (1966), Wales Visitation (1967), Don’t Grow Old (1976), Composed on the Tongue (1980), Illuminated Poems (1996), and Luminous Dreams (1997). Ginsberg died at his home in the East Village of Manhattan, on April 5, 1997.

Gold, Ben

(1898–1985) president, International Fur and Leather Workers Union of the United States and Canada

Born in Bessarabia, Russia, on September 8, 1898, Gold immigrated to the United States in 1910 and joined the International Fur Workers Union of the United States and Canada (IFWU) two years later. He became a member of the Socialist Party in 1916. Gold joined the Communist Party at the time of its founding in 1919. He was elected manager of the IFWU’s New York Joint Board in 1925. Two years later, in an effort to remove the communist influence, the American Federation of Labor (AFL) dissolved the Joint Board and expelled its leaders. However, the communists retained the loyalty of the rank-and-file fur workers. Led by Gold, the New York furriers affiliated with the communist-led Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union in 1929. When this group was disbanded in 1935, Gold and the fur workers returned to the IFWU. In 1937, Gold was elected president of the IFWU, which then left the AFL and joined the new Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). The IFWU merged with the National Leather Workers Association in 1939, and Gold became president of the International Fur and Leather Workers Union (IFLWU). Gold was an active and open member of the Communist Party and ran for the New York state assembly in 1931 and 1936 on the Communist ticket.

The IFLWU’s opposition to the Marshall Plan and the Truman Doctrine, as well as its endorsement of Henry A. Wallace, alienated the union from Philip Murray, the president of the CIO. Murray condemned the leaders of the furriers’ union at the CIO convention in October 1949. The CIO expelled the furriers and other communist-dominated unions in 1950.

Although the IFLWU easily repelled challenges to its hold on the fur trades in New York, the IFLWU decided to submit to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act in order to protect locals outside of New York against raids by other unions. Therefore, in 1950, the IFLWU instructed its officers to sign the noncommunist affidavits required by the Taft-Hartley Act. Gold publicly quit the party and signed the affidavit; in his statement, however, he proclaimed his continuing loyalty to the party's objectives. Two years later, he refused to tell the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) whether his affidavit was truthful. He also refused to deny that he had supported the Communist Party after signing the affidavit. Federal authorities brought charges against Gold for lying on his noncommunist affidavit. A federal grand jury indicted him for perjury, and in April 1954, he was convicted and sentenced to one to three years in jail. The month after his conviction, he was reelected as president of the IFLWU. As a result, the NLRB prohibited the union from making use of its services in collective bargaining. Worried about the effect this ruling would have on the union, Gold resigned the presidency in October.

An equally divided U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld Gold's conviction on March 9, 1956. A Supreme Court ruling, however, held that a union could not be deprived of NLRB services because a leader had falsified a noncommunist affidavit. In January 1957, the Supreme Court ordered that Gold be given a new trial because FBI agents had contacted three members of Gold's jury in relation to another investigation. In May, the Justice Department moved that the indictment against Gold be dismissed because "certain material evidence . . . [was] not available." Gold died in North Miami Beach, Fla., on July 23, 1985.

Goldberg, Arthur J(oseph)

(1908–1990) general counsel, Congress of Industrial Organizations; general counsel, United Steelworkers of America; secretary of labor; associate Supreme Court justice

Born in Chicago on August 8, 1908, Goldberg was the youngest of 11 children of Russian-Jewish parents on Chicago's West Side. He graduated from a public high school at the age of 16 and attended Crane Junior College and took classes at DePaul University before enrolling in Northwestern University's law school, where he compiled the best academic record in the school's history to that point. He was editor of the law review and earned his B.S.L. (bachelor of science in law) in 1928 and J.S.D. the following year. In spite of Goldberg's stellar academic performance, Chicago's elite firms did not hire Jews. He joined Pritzger & Pritzger, a successful Chicago firm founded by highly assimilated German Jews. Although successful, he found his work there unsatisfying and in 1933 left to start his own practice. He was active in the local Civil Liberties Committee, which later became the Illinois Division of the American Civil Liberties Union. Although drawn to liberal causes, he rejected political radicalism and became an ardent supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. This led the Chicago branch of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) to ask him to represent them during a newspaper strike in 1938. The CIO sent other labor cases to Goldberg, who became well established as a labor lawyer. During World War II, he served with the Office of Strategic Services. He resumed the private practice of law in 1944.

With the cold war under way, liberals and radicals competed for control of the CIO. As the liberals gained the upper hand in 1948, the CIO ousted its general counsel, the radical Lee Pressman, and Philip Murray, president of the CIO, named Goldberg to replace him. Murray also named Goldberg general counsel for the United Steelworkers of America. Goldberg helped establish procedures by which the CIO expelled communist-dominated affiliates. In 1949, he negotiated a pension plan for the Steelworkers that served as a model for other unions. Over the next decade, he also became a leading lobbyist for organized labor. In 1955, Goldberg and J. Albert Woll, counsel for the American Federation of Labor (AFL), negotiated a merger of the AFL and CIO. The organizations agreed to retain previous organizing jurisdictions for each member union and to recognize the equal legitimacy of craft and industrial unions. A joint convention in December formally proclaimed the merger. Although Goldberg wanted the job of AFL-CIO general counsel, some leaders of the combined unions did not have full confidence in him, and he was made special counsel instead. He also served as general counsel for the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department.

During 1957 and 1958, the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), investigated corruption in organized labor. Goldberg helped formulate the AFL-CIO's ethical practices code, which led to the expulsion of the Teamsters and other scandal-ridden unions. In the course of the McClellan committee's work, Goldberg worked closely with Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) in crafting moderate labor reform legislation that provided for full public disclosure of union finances. He also attempted to forestall the more extensive measures that were ultimately included in the Landrum-Griffin Act, including a ban on "hot cargo" contracts (under which union members were allowed to refuse to work with non-union materials), prohibition of secondary boycotts, restrictions on picketing, and expanded federal regulation of internal union affairs.

Throughout the 1950s, Goldberg continued to represent the United Steelworkers. Murray's successor as the union's president, DAVID McDONALD, had neither the ability nor the skill to lead a large industrial union. He handled public relations and left important decisions to Goldberg. It was Goldberg who conducted the negotiations during a 116-day steel strike in 1959 and won important concessions from the industry on wages and working conditions. The new contract, signed in January 1960, also included Goldberg's proposal for a Human Relations Committee, composed of representatives of the union, the industry, and the public, that was intended to prevent future strikes.

Goldberg played a leading role in mobilizing labor behind Kennedy's campaign for the Democratic nomination. In December 1960, the president-elect chose Goldberg as his secretary of labor. The president of the AFL-CIO, GEORGE MEANY, had nominated five elected union officials for the post. Kennedy picked Goldberg because he was "from the unions but not of them" and could therefore be relied on to enforce the reform provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

As secretary of labor, Goldberg intervened frequently in labor-management disputes to secure noninflationary wage settlements. He also worked to provide federal support for public-employee unionism and to aid the growth of unions in Latin America. As a result of his support for wage restraints, Goldberg's relations with organized labor began to deteriorate. Partly for this reason, Kennedy nominated him to a seat on the Supreme Court in 1962 upon the retirement of FELIX FRANKFURTER. On the Court, Goldberg consistently supported civil rights and the expansion of legal protections for criminal defendants and suspects. Perhaps his best-known opinion was Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), in which the Court overturned a conviction for murder on the ground that police had continued questioning a suspect and prevented him from speaking to his lawyer after he had repeatedly requested to do so. Goldberg also voted for legislative reapportionment. He spent only 34 months on the bench, during which time he continued to advise presidents Kennedy and LYNDON B. JOHNSON on national labor problems. In July 1965, Johnson persuaded a reluctant Goldberg to leave the Court to become ambassador to the United Nations. Goldberg hoped to negotiate a settlement to the Vietnam War, but Johnson ignored Goldberg's advice to end escalation of the war and seek a negotiated peace. Frustrated with his limited influence, Goldberg resigned in 1968 and resumed the practice of law with the New York firm of Paul, Weiss, Goldberg, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. He worked for HUBERT HUMPHREY's campaign for the presidency in 1968 and spoke out in opposition to American policy in Vietnam. Goldberg ran as the Democratic candidate for governor of New York in 1970. After losing the race by a lopsided margin to the incumbent, NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER, Goldberg returned to Washington, D.C., and practiced law until his death there on January 19, 1990.

Goldfine, Bernard

(ca. 1889–1967) businessman

Born in the Russian town of Avanta in about 1889, Goldfine immigrated to the United States with his parents at the age of eight. He dropped out of high school after one year to work in his father's junk business. At the age of 19, he and a friend started the Strathmore Woolen Company in Boston. They bought and sold woolen remnants and prospered by supplying material for military uniforms during World War I. By the time of the Great Depression, Goldfine owned textile mills in four New England states and had substantial real estate holdings. The headquarters of his empire was in Lebanon, N.H. During the 1930s, he expanded his holdings by buying businesses and land at depressed prices. He also cultivated close relationships with the governors of New England states and with Boston's mayor, James M. Curley. Goldfine loved to demonstrate his connections and his political clout.

His love for politics and publicity led to the downfall of SHERMAN ADAMS, Eisenhower's chief of staff. In 1958, the Legislative Oversight Subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee held hearings that produced evidence that Adams had accepted favors from Goldfine and had intervened with federal agencies on Goldfine's behalf. In 1953, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) accused Goldfine's textile companies of mislabeling their products. Goldfine told Adams about the problem, and Adams called Edward F. Howrey, the chairman of the FTC. Howrey requested a full report on the matter, which he forwarded to Adams, who passed it on to Goldfine. Adams's secretary inquired about the matter a month later and learned that the case had been closed. The FTC brought similar charges the following year, and Adams arranged for Goldfine to meet with Howrey. Although some lawyers in the FTC had recommended a civil suit against Goldfine, the agency settled for a cease-and-desist order in 1957. Adams also inquired about Goldfine's problems with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which was investigating the East Boston Company, one of Goldfine's holdings, for failing to file annual financial reports. No further actions against Goldfine were taken. The Legislative Oversight Subcommittee also found that Goldfine had given Adams a vicuña coat and an oriental rug valued at $2,400. Goldfine had also paid $1,642.28 for hotel rooms used by Adams and members of his family.

Adams denied that Goldfine had received special treatment. He and Goldfine acknowledged the gifts but described them as gifts given by one friend to another. At his own request, Adams appeared before the committee on June 17 and acknowledged having made mistakes in judgment, but he denied ever having used his position to influence government agencies. Goldfine testified before the subcommittee in July. The gregarious Goldfine said that he had declared the gifts to Adams and the hotel bills as business expenses on his tax returns but that he expected no favors in return. It turned out that Goldfine had also paid hotel bills for Sens. NORRIS COTTON (R-N.H.), STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.), and Frederick Payne (R-Maine). In addition, the textile manufacturer had also sent checks at Christmas "to some of the poor workers" in government. Goldfine refused to answer 22 questions from the subcommittee about his financial affairs and was cited for contempt of Congress. After Payne lost his bid for reelection in September, political pressure mounted, and Eisenhower asked Adams to resign.

In December 1958, Goldfine refused to submit records for an investigation of his taxes and was cited for contempt of court. He received a three-month sentence, which he served in 1960. For his contempt of Congress, Goldfine paid a fine and was given a suspended one-year sentence in 1959. While in prison in 1960, he was charged with evading over $790,000 in federal income taxes between 1953 and 1957. Lawyers questioned his mental competency to stand trial, and he was placed under psychiatric observation until he was determined fit. Goldfine pleaded guilty in 1961 to tax evasion and received a sentence of a year and a day in prison and a fine of $110,000. He suffered a slight stroke and was released in 1962, after serving seven and one-half months of his sentence. Goldfine settled federal tax claims of $3.5 million against himself and $6.8 million against his wife. He retired to his home in Chestnut Hill, Mass., and died in Boston on September 21, 1967.

Goldwater, Barry M(orris)

(1909–1998) U.S. senator

Goldwater was born in Phoenix, Ariz., on January 1, 1909. His grandfather, a Jewish immigrant from an area of Poland then ruled by Russia, established a mercantile store in Prescott, Ariz. Goldwater's father opened a branch of the family business in Phoenix. Although his father's side of the family was Jewish, Goldwater was raised in the Episcopalian faith of his mother. After a disastrous freshman year in high school, his parents sent him to Staunton Military Academy in Virginia, where he thrived on the rigorous discipline and graduated in the top half of his class. The faculty voted him best all-around cadet, which assured him an appointment to West Point. His mother, however, wanted him closer to home because his father was in poor health. Goldwater enrolled at the University of Arizona in the fall of 1928, but he left college the following spring, soon after his father died, and went to work in the family department store. He joined several service organizations and, in 1930, the officers reserve corps. In 1936, he and his brother assumed control of the family business. During World War II, Goldwater, who had learned to fly in 1930, served in the army air corps. Age and poor eyesight disqualified him as a combat pilot, but he trained pilots, supervised construction, and requisitioned supplies. When the shortage of pilots led to the creation of the Air Transport Command to ferry aircraft and supplies to war zones, Goldwater qualified and transferred to it. At the end of the war, he left the army as a lieutenant colonel. After the war, he founded the Arizona Air National Guard and eventually rose to the rank of major general in the air force reserve. He also became involved in the municipal reform movement in Phoenix and ran for city council in 1949. Goldwater won a seat and, in office, worked tirelessly to cut municipal spending. In 1952, he challenged Ernest W. McFarland, the Democratic incumbent, for a seat in the U.S. Senate. Although considered a long shot, Goldwater won by roughly 7,000 votes.

In the Senate, Goldwater aggressively supported limiting the power and spending of the federal government and sought to maintain the maximum freedom for the individual. He opposed high taxes, unbalanced budgets, agricultural price supports, federal aid to education, federal minimum wage laws, and the concentration of power in organized labor. In short, he resisted anything he thought threatened individualism or free enterprise. He supported increasing rights for women and giving offshore oil reserves to the states. In foreign policy, he advocated an aggressively anticommunist stance and urged retaliation against nations that traded with Communist China. He also argued for a reduction of foreign aid.

When he arrived in the Senate, ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) assigned him to the Banking and Currency and the Labor and Public Welfare Committees. The assignments chagrined the new senator from Arizona, who wanted the Armed Services and Interior Committees. In some regards, Goldwater was not particularly suited to the Senate. The legislative process seemed to bore him. He was not a skilled debater, and he refused to compromise his positions. However, he was personable, good-looking, vigorous, and eminently quotable. His image provided a refreshing contrast with that of the stuffy Taft. Since Goldwater's talents best equipped him to serve as a salesman for conservatism, his colleagues put him on the Republican Senate Campaign Committee.

Early in his first term, Goldwater clearly aligned himself with the conservative wing of the Republican party; nonetheless, he frequently found himself in accord with the administration. He supported Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) crusade against communists in government and was one of 22 senators who voted against condemning McCarthy in December 1954. At the same time, he rejected McCarthy's accusations that Eisenhower was a communist appeaser. Moreover, there were a number of issues on which he clearly sided with the administration. His attack in 1953 on wage, rent, and price controls brought praise from Eisenhower. Goldwater also voted for an administration proposal extending Social Security coverage and benefits as well as one increasing the minimum wage. Goldwater took the lead in supporting the administration's "termination" policy, intended to eliminate the dependence of Native American tribes on the federal government and ultimately to abolish reservations. When it came to defense policy, Goldwater backed the New Look and its greater reliance on air power and the nuclear deterrent.

An indication of Goldwater's rising status in the party came in 1955, when Republican senators elected him chair of the Senate Republican Campaign Committee. The position greatly increased his national visibility, and he emerged as a leading voice for conservatism. During the 84th Congress in 1955–56, Goldwater supported the administration 66 percent of the time, slightly less frequently than the average Republican senator. Although he did not join some conservatives in publicly attacking the administration, he became increasingly impatient with its continuation of New Deal programs. Despite the growing differences between himself and Eisenhower, Goldwater campaigned for the president's reelection in 1956.

However, Goldwater began to challenge the administration in 1957. He opposed Eisenhower's request for a congressional resolution authorizing the president to send American forces to the Middle East to resist communist aggression. Goldwater openly rebelled against Eisenhower's budget for 1958, the largest peacetime budget request to that time. Speaking on the Senate floor, he attacked the budget as a "betrayal of the people's trust," not to mention campaign pledges and Republican Party principles. He accused the administration of following the course of Truman's administration and "demonstrating tendencies to bow to the siren song of socialism."

During the 1950s, Goldwater devoted a good deal of attention to his work on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee. An ardent foe of labor unions, he supported tightened federal and state control of their activities and the right of workers to elect not to join a union. He opposed organized labor's intervention in the political process. These positions led to clashes with WALTER REUTHER, president of the United Automobile Workers (UAW), and other union leaders. All of this came to national attention when Goldwater was named to the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field, chaired by JOHN MCCLELLAN (D-Ark.). Created in 1957, the committee was charged to investigate corruption in labor unions. Over the objections of Goldwater and the Republican minority, the probe focused primarily on the Teamsters Union. Goldwater condemned the committee counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, for refusing to investigate the UAW and Reuther, a staunch Democratic supporter, with equal vigor. At a Republican fund-raising dinner in 1957, Goldwater attacked Reuther and the UAW's political war chest as "more dangerous than Soviet Russia."

Reuther called the senator from Arizona "mentally unbalanced" and "this country's number-one political fanatic, peddler of class hatred, and union hater." The feud continued through Goldwater's campaign for reelection in 1958. McFarland, then governor of Arizona, looked forward confidently to a rematch with Goldwater. Organized labor poured resources into the campaign to defeat Goldwater, whose campaign stressed illicit union support for his opponent and won 56.1 percent of the vote.

In 1959, two members of the McClellan committee, JOHN KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and SAM ERVIN (D-N.C.), offered a bill that mandated secret ballots in union elections and full disclosure of financial transactions. Goldwater dismissed the measure as a "pantywaist bill." He called for tougher penalties for corrupt practices and a ban on unions coercing an employer to refuse to do business with another employer. Goldwater was the lone senator to vote against the Kennedy-Ervin bill. The House, however, rejected it in favor of a stronger substitute introduced by ROBERT GRIFFIN (R-Mich.) and PHILIP LANDRUM (D-Ga.). Goldwater supported the Landrum-Griffin bill, which became law in 1959.

Goldwater was reelected chair of the Republican Senate Campaign Committee in 1959 and stumped the country speaking for conservatism. He urged Republicans to return to the principles of Taft, a clear swipe at the Eisenhower administration. Some conservatives began to think about Goldwater as a candidate for president. Clarence Manion, the dean of Notre Dame's law school and a right-wing activist, urged Goldwater to write a book. When Goldwater demurred because he was not a writer, Manion arranged for L. Brent Bozell, an editor for WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY's National Review and Buckley's brother-in-law, to act as ghostwriter. Bozell pieced together the book from Goldwater's speeches, some of which Bozell had written. The Conscience of a Conservative came out in March 1960 and unexpectedly became a best seller. The book advocated "achieving the maximum amount of freedom for individuals that is consistent with the maintenance of social order." "Freedom for farmers" meant ending subsidies and price supports. "Freedom for labor" would be achieved by outlawing the closed shop and passing right-to-work laws. The book attacked the federal government as “a Leviathan, a vast national authority out of touch with the people, and out of their control” and championed states’ rights as a “bulwark against the encroachments of individual freedom by Big Government.” It demanded reductions in the federal bureaucracy and in federal spending, denounced the income tax as “confiscatory,” and called for eliminating federal welfare programs, federal aid to education, and federal housing programs. Some of Goldwater’s favorite and most frequently used lines appeared in the book: “I have little interest in streamlining government or in making it more efficient, for I mean to reduce its size. . . . My aim is not to pass laws, but to repeal them.”

Civil rights posed an interesting problem. Goldwater distinguished civil rights from “human” or “natural” rights. The Conscience of a Conservative held that the Constitution protected only black voting rights, the right to contract, and the right to property. Further, the federal government had no constitutional authority to require states to “maintain racially mixed schools,” because it had no constitutional power to interfere in education. Goldwater acknowledged that he agreed with the objectives of the Brown decision: “I believe that it is both wise and just for negro [sic] children to attend the same schools as whites, and that to deny them this opportunity carries with it strong implications of inferiority.” However, he continued, “I am not prepared to impose that judgment . . . on the people of Mississippi or South Carolina.” This position was no sophistry. Goldwater had been one of the first white merchants in Phoenix to employ African Americans, and he integrated the Arizona Air National Guard. A member of the Tucson chapter of the NAACP, he supported and contributed money to a lawsuit that successfully challenged de jure segregation in Phoenix’s public schools. He also played an instrumental role in ending segregation in the city’s restaurants. In spite of those beliefs, he voted for restrictive amendments to the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

By the time of the Republican National Convention in 1960, Goldwater had emerged as the recognized leader of the party’s conservative wing. At the convention, he led an attack by conservatives on the compromise platform agreed to before the convention by Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and New York’s liberal governor, NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER. As a protest against Nixon’s accommodation with Rockefeller, some enraged conservative delegates nominated Goldwater for president. However, Goldwater gave a speech asking that his name be withdrawn and calling for party unity. Nevertheless, he received 10 votes from the Louisiana delegation on the first ballot.

During the 1960s, Goldwater dominated the conservative wing of the Republican Party. His blunt statement of his positions thrilled conservatives and alarmed opponents. In an interview in 1963, he said, “You know, I think we ought to sell the TVA [Tennessee Valley Authority].” During the same interview, he casually proposed giving NATO commanders authority to use nuclear weapons. Goldwater later admitted that “there are words of mine floating around in the air that I would like to reach up and eat.” Perhaps he had in mind a news conference in 1961 in which he said, “Sometimes I think this country would be better off if we could just saw off the Eastern Seaboard and let it float out to sea.” Although he believed that segregation was morally wrong and favored withholding federal funds from public works projects in states that practiced discrimination, he opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as a violation of states’ rights and the individual’s right to discriminate.

After a bitter struggle in which his opponents, particularly Rockefeller, portrayed him as a dangerous extremist, Goldwater captured the Republican nomination in 1964. Goldwater promised “a choice, not an echo.” At the convention, his partisans booed and hooted Rockefeller’s speech. Goldwater further alienated moderates in the party with his own acceptance speech, in which he famously declared that “extremism in defense of liberty is no vice and . . . moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue.” In the general election, LYNDON JOHNSON overwhelmed Goldwater, who carried only six states and 36 percent of the popular vote.

Goldwater won election to the Senate again in 1968. He would win reelection in 1974 and 1980. During the Watergate crisis, he played a crucial role in persuading President Nixon to resign. Long before his retirement, Goldwater had come to be regarded as a respected elder statesman of his party.

He retired as chair of the Senate Armed Services Committee and could claim the lion's share of responsibility for the passage of the Defense Department Reorganization Act of 1986, which streamlined command channels at the Pentagon. Always true to his libertarian principles, Goldwater angered the New Right in the 1980s with his defense of a woman's right to choose an abortion and gay rights. In addition, he opposed efforts of disgruntled conservatives to limit the power of the courts.

Goldwater chose not to seek reelection in 1986 and retired to his home in Paradise Valley, a suburb of Phoenix. He suffered a major stroke in 1996 and died at home on May 29, 1998.

Goodpaster, Andrew J(ackson)

(1915–2005) White House staff secretary

Goodpaster was born in Granite City, Ill., on February 12, 1915. After attending McKendree College in Lebanon, Ill., for two years, Goodpaster transferred to the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, from which he graduated second in his class in 1939. He served in various engineering assignments before World War II and then saw combat in North Africa and Italy as commander of the 48th Engineer Battalion.

Goodpaster was attached to the general staff of the War Department from 1944 to 1947 and then went to Princeton University, where he earned an M.A. in engineering in 1948 and a Ph.D. in international relations in 1950. He was the army's representative on the Joint Advanced Study Committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in 1950. Six months later, Goodpaster went to Europe as an aide to Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in organizing the military forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). He also worked with W. AVERELL HARRIMAN in developing a statement of political aims for NATO. In 1954, he took over the post of U.S. district engineer in San Francisco.

In September 1954, President Eisenhower appointed Col. Goodpaster White House staff secretary. His duties consisted of clearing all communications to the president and coordinating cabinet operations. He also served as liaison between the White House and the various departments and agencies concerned with defense and national security matters. Goodpaster's most important duty was handling all correspondence dealing with national security and supervising day-to-day operations of the National Security Council.

Eisenhower had enormous admiration for Goodpaster and absolute confidence in him. The president depended on his aides to provide accurate information, and Goodpaster's calm efficiency, remarkable intelligence, and ability to keep a confidence ideally suited him to Eisenhower's purposes. Goodpaster became the aide on whom Eisenhower relied most, and he was at the president's side constantly during working hours.

During the Quemoy and Matsu crisis of 1954–55, Goodpaster participated in meetings to evaluate the ability of the Nationalist Chinese to defend the offshore islands. When Eisenhower was not satisfied with the intelligence he was receiving, he sent Goodpaster to confer with the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet. In July 1955, Goodpaster was Eisenhower's personal assistant at the Geneva summit.

The following year, Goodpaster served as liaison between the Pentagon, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the White House during the Suez Crisis. He also kept a close record of intelligence reports during the U.S. military action in Lebanon in 1958.

After the president was stricken with a heart attack in September 1955, his secretary reduced the amount of Eisenhower's work by delaying action on some measures and taking action on some "by direction of the President." When the president suffered a mild stroke in 1957, Goodpaster kept the White House running smoothly while the chief executive recovered.

Following the resignation of SHERMAN ADAMS in September 1958, Goodpaster's authority increased. All matters relating to the Defense and State Departments were funneled through either Goodpaster or Gordon Gray, the special assistant for national security affairs. Thus, in May 1960, it was Goodpaster who first brought Eisenhower the news of the downing of the U-2 spy plane over the Soviet Union.

Goodpaster remained in the White House during the early part of 1961 to aid JOHN F. KENNEDY in his transition to office. He then served with the army in Europe and in 1962 returned to Washington as special assistant to Gen. MAXWELL TAYLOR. In 1967, he became senior U.S. Army member of the UN Military Staff Committee and directed special studies in the office of the Army Chief of Staff. From July 1967 to June 1968, he served as commandant of the National War College. Goodpaster was promoted to general in 1968. He served as deputy commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam from 1968 to 1969. At the request of president-elect RICHARD M. NIXON, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON called Goodpaster to Washington in December 1968 to help with the presidential transition. In March 1969, Goodpaster became Supreme Allied Commander of NATO forces in Europe and commander in chief of U.S. military forces in Europe. Goodpaster retired from the army in 1974 and became a senior fellow in security and strategic studies at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. He was a founder of the Committee on the Present Danger, organized to put forward the idea that the military threat posed by the Soviet Union had been underestimated and that the United States needed to strengthen its defensive capabilities. In 1977, President Jimmy Carter called Goodpaster out of retirement to serve as commandant of West Point in the aftermath of a cheating scandal. Goodpaster served as commandant until 1981. Carter also asked Goodpaster to serve as a special representative to foreign governments following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. After that, Goodpaster became a senior fellow at the Eisenhower World Affairs Institute. He remained active until the end of his life and was working on his memoirs at the time of his death from prostate cancer on May 16, 2005, in Washington, D.C.

Gordon, Thomas S(ylvy)

(1893–1959) U.S. congressman; chairman, Foreign Affairs Committee

Gordon was born in Chicago on December 17, 1893. He attended parochial schools and graduated from Saint Stanislaus College in 1912. After working in banking from 1916 to 1920, Gordon began working for Dziennik Chicagoski, a Polish language newspaper, in 1921. He started out as a clerk and advanced to office manager. His job with the newspaper helped him enter Democratic politics. While maintaining his association with the paper, he served as commissioner of Chicago West Parks from 1933 to 1936 and of public vehicle licenses from 1936 to 1939. Gordon was elected city treasurer in 1939 and won election to Congress in 1942 from Chicago's predominantly Polish eighth district. As a freshman, he was assigned to the Foreign Affairs Committee. He supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policies and domestic welfare programs.

Gordon generally voted with the liberal Democrats in the House during the Eisenhower administration. In 1955, he supported a bill to restore rigid farm price supports and opposed a measure exempting producers of natural gas from federal public utility regulation under the Natural Gas Act. Two years later, Gordon was among 80 Democratic liberals backing a comprehensive legislative program that called, among other things, for civil rights measures, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, aid to depressed areas, and revision of immigration and naturalization standards to eliminate the national origins system.

In 1957, Gordon became chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee. During his first month in that post, he backed the administration's draft of the Eisenhower Doctrine for the Middle East. On January 5, 1957, President Eisenhower addressed a joint session of Congress to ask for authority to use U.S. armed forces to protect the Middle East from communist aggression. Minutes after the address, Gordon introduced a joint resolution authorizing the president to use U.S. forces "as he deems necessary to secure and protect the territorial integrity and political independence" of Middle East nations against countries "controlled by international communism." The House passed this administration-initiated version of the doctrine, but the Senate eliminated the clause permitting the president to use troops "as he deems necessary" and stated only that the United States was "prepared to use Armed Forces" if the president "determines the necessity." Gordon opposed the Senate alteration but preferred accepting its version to further debate. The House adopted the upper chamber's resolution.

Gordon backed the Mutual Security Act of 1957, which authorized over $3.3 billion in military and economic foreign aid for fiscal 1958. It introduced a new approach to foreign economic assistance, eliminating the grants-in-aid program and authorizing a new $500-million Development Loan Fund. Gordon defended the change against charges that the loans would really be grants because they could be repaid in foreign currencies. He criticized those who opposed foreign aid in all forms, stating that a "fortress America" could not survive economically.

Gordon stepped down as chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee in February 1958 because of ill health. He died in Chicago of heart disease on January 22, 1959.

Gore, Albert A(rnold)

(1907–1998) U.S. senator

Born in Granville, Tenn., on December 27, 1907, Albert Gore attended a one-room school and worked his way through Middle Tennessee State Teachers College. He ran unsuccessfully for superintendent of schools in Smith County, Tenn., in 1930 and went to work on his father's farm. When the man who defeated him died, Gore was chosen to fill the term. He took night classes in law at the YMCA in Nashville and received a law degree in 1936. Gore won election to Congress in 1938 as a Democrat and a strong supporter of the New Deal. In his first speech, however, he opposed the Roosevelt administration and the Democratic leadership by speaking against expanding the borrowing authority of the United States Housing Authority. In general, though, he supported the domestic and foreign policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. In 1952, he challenged the aged Sen. Kenneth McKellar, chair of the Senate Appropriations Committee, who represented Tennessee's once-powerful Crump machine, in the Democratic primary. In a campaign that focused on his support for liberal economic policies and the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) as well his opponent's advanced age, Gore defeated McKellar and went on to win the general election in November.

Gore's florid style of speaking and his distinguished bearing suited him well for the Senate. In the upper house, he worked energetically on behalf of public power, highway construction, and tax reform. During the Eisenhower administration, his Senate votes paralleled the position of the liberal Americans for Democratic Action 70 percent of the time.

Gore played an important role in the controversial Dixon-Yates affair of 1954–55. The TVA proposed building a new steam plant at Fulton, Tenn., to supply power to the city of Memphis. The consumption of TVA power by the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) installations at Paduca meant that the city of Memphis would face a shortage of electricity within four years. Eisenhower, who preferred private development of power, could not see the justification for the federal government to pay for a plant to supply power to a particular city. He ordered JOSEPH DODGE, the director of the Bureau of the Budget, and LEWIS L. STRAUSS, chairman of the AEC, to explore the possibilities of having private industry build the plant. EDGAR H. DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company, organized the Mississippi Valley Generating Company to build a plant that would supply power to the TVA to replace the power the TVA sold to the AEC. The Dixon-Yates proposal was considered acceptable by the AEC, TVA, and Bureau of the Budget, and, upon the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, Eisenhower approved it.

Gore spearheaded the vocal Democratic efforts to cancel the contract. In November 1954, he charged that it "reeks of government subsidy," that there "is no private enterprise in it," and that Dixon-Yates's profits were "practically guaranteed" at an unreasonably high level. He also played up a conflict of interest on the part of a consultant to the Budget Bureau who recommended the contract. In January 1955, Gore and the other nine Democrats on the Joint Atomic Energy Committee urged that the contract be rejected as "not in the public interest." The AEC went ahead with the Dixon-Yates contract. Ultimately, the city of Memphis decided to build its own plant, which enabled Eisenhower to cancel the Dixon-Yates contract and thus avoid a continuing controversy.

Gore played a significant role in guiding the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 and the Highway

Revenue Act of 1956 through the Senate. In 1955, the Eisenhower administration recommended construction of an interstate highway system and proposed financing the system through the sale of bonds. Sen. HARRY BYRD (D-Va.) opposed the plan, which, he declared, would "wreck our fiscal budget system." Byrd wanted to allow receipts from the federal gasoline tax to accumulate until there was enough money to pay for the roads. In an effort to find common ground, Gore crafted a bill calling for the Bureau of Public Roads to spend $10 billion over five years on an interstate highway system. The federal government would bear 75 percent of the cost of construction. The bill funded only a third of the program and required the Bureau of Public Roads to return to Congress for annual appropriations. Eisenhower seemed likely to oppose Gore's version, and Rep. George Hyde Fallon (D-Md.) drafted a plan that kept the general provisions of Gore's bill but extended the period through 1968 and paid for construction of the system by raising taxes on gasoline, diesel fuel, trucks, trailers, buses, and tires. Fallon's bill failed, but it passed the following year, and Gore introduced a similar bill in the Senate. After the conference committee reconciled the two bills, both houses passed the conference bill on June 25. The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 authorized $25 billion over 12 years for the construction of a national system of interstate and defense highways; created a Highway Trust Fund, supported by increasing the federal tax on gas, diesel fuel, trucks, buses, and tires; and set the federal responsibility at 90 percent of the cost.

Gore did not always side with liberals. He called for the use of nuclear weapons in Korea; and, although moderate compared to those of most of his southern colleagues, his record on civil rights issues was mixed. In 1956, Gore, LYNDON JOHNSON (D-Tex.), and ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) were the only senators from the old Confederate states who refused to sign the Southern Manifesto, which advocated resistance by all legal means to desegregation. Gore called it "a dangerous, deceptive propaganda move which encouraged southerners to defy the Government and to disobey its laws." Although he voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1957, Gore also voted for amendments that effectively emasculated the bill. He voted to eliminate a provision that would have authorized the Justice Department to file civil suits to desegregate and voted to give jury trials to those who violated court orders protecting black voting rights. He also voted against attempts to amend the Senate's Rule 22, which required a two-thirds vote to end debate and allowed southerners to block civil rights legislation by filibustering.

Along with Sen. PAUL DOUGLAS (D-Ill.), Gore was the most persistent Senate advocate of tax reform. In 1957, he moved from the Public Works Committee to the tax-writing Finance Committee, where he and Douglas waged a usually futile struggle to close loopholes favoring the rich and corporations. Among the tax preferences they fought unsuccessfully to reduce or eliminate were the 27½ percent oil depletion allowance, the dividend credit, the foreign tax credit, and stock option abuses. In addition, they sought to institute withholding taxes at the source of interest and dividend income. Gore also frequently denounced the "tight money" policies of the Federal Reserve Board and strenuously opposed the Eisenhower administration's effort in 1959–60 to remove the 4½ percent interest rate ceiling on government bonds. He contended that higher interest rates only hurt consumers and enriched bankers.

A member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Gore expounded the liberal internationalism of his hero, Cordell Hull. Like Hull, he was a strong advocate of reciprocal trade agreements. He supported foreign aid and generally backed the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration. In November 1958, Gore proposed that the United States suspend all nuclear tests for three years. As a delegate to the disarmament conferences of the late Eisenhower and early Kennedy years, he helped negotiate the limited nuclear test ban treaty, finally signed and ratified in 1963.

Gore's maverick bent and crusading fervor, particularly his attacks on the tax system, often brought him into conflict with Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson. At the Democratic caucus in January 1960, he led an abortive revolt against Johnson's autocratic powers. Charging that party identity had been blurred by the leadership's willingness to compromise with the Eisenhower administration, he proposed that the Democratic caucus instead of the majority leader choose Democratic Policy Committee members and that the committee actually make policy instead of merely scheduling legislation. The caucus rejected Gore's motion by a 51-12 vote. Johnson did agree, however, to Sen. WILLIAM PROXMIRE's (D-Wis.) demand to hold periodic caucuses to discuss policy positions before bills came up on the floor.

Gore was a candidate for the vice presidential nomination in 1956 and 1960. In 1956, he finished third in the balloting behind Kefauver and Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) before throwing his support to Kefauver. He was a hopeful again in 1960, but Kennedy chose Johnson instead as his running mate. Gore won reelection in 1958 against a white, supremacist challenge. While running for reelection in 1964, Gore voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964, something he later said he regretted. Gore won reelection and became an outspoken critic of the war in Vietnam. He opposed RICHARD M. NIXON's nominations of CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH and G. Harold Carswell to the Supreme Court. His positions on school busing and the war became issues during his unsuccessful campaign for a fourth term in 1970. After losing to Rep. William E. Brock III (R-Tenn.), Gore returned to Tennessee, where he ran a profitable cattle-breeding farm and served on a number of corporate boards. He died in Carthage, Tenn., on December 5, 1998.

Graham, Billy (William) (Franklin)

(1918–) evangelist

A descendant of pre-Revolutionary Scotch-Irish pioneers, Graham, was born near Charlotte, N.C., on November 7, 1918. He grew up on his father's farm near Charlotte, and, at the age of 16, experienced a religious conversion. In 1936, he enrolled at Bob Jones College, a fundamentalist school in Cleveland, Tenn. Uncomfortable with campus life at Bob Jones, Graham transferred to the Florida Bible Institute (later Trinity College), from which he graduated in 1940 with a Bachelor of Theology. While there, he was baptized at a Baptist church and began a lifelong membership in the Southern Baptist Convention. Ordained a Baptist minister in 1939, he began preaching on street corners and at rescue missions. Graham attended Wheaton College in Wheaton, Ill., from 1940 to 1943 and graduated with a B.A. in anthropology. Upon graduating, he took a pastorate at the Baptist church in Western Springs, a suburb of Chicago. While at Western Springs, he took over a weekly religious radio program, Songs in the Night, from another local pastor.

During World War II, fundamentalists staged a series of religious revivals. Graham traveled the country conducting Christian rallies. Youth for Christ, an organization that grew out of the rallies, was founded in 1945, and Graham became its vice president and first full-time evangelist. For the next several years, he spoke at rallies and organized Youth for Christ chapters throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe. He began to hold evangelistic rallies on his own and in 1948 resigned from the staff of Youth for Christ. Graham also became president of Northwestern Schools in Minneapolis in 1947, a position he held until 1951.

Already well known within the evangelical and fundamentalist communities, Graham came to national prominence in 1949 when he led a spectacular series of revival meetings in Los Angeles. Graham's success at winning converts drew the attention of William Randolph Hearst, who ordered his publications to "puff Graham." Successful campaigns in Boston and South Carolina led to coverage in Time and Life magazines. Graham's preaching connected popular anxieties about nuclear destruction with Biblical warnings of judgment for sin. His sermons often emphasized the determination of the Soviet Union to conquer the world for communism and atheism. He preached that the millennium was near and sometimes that it would come only after a devastating war with the Soviet Union. Americans, he taught, would emerge relatively unscathed from World War III if they adopted Christianity and were "born again." Although he stayed away from party politics, Graham preached often about the threat of domestic communist subversion and the need for traditional American values. Moreover, he urged evangelicals to compete with other organized groups for political influence.

Throughout the 1950s, Graham held evangelical campaigns he called "crusades" in all major U.S. cities as well as in Africa, Asia, South America, and Europe. Perhaps the most impressive were crusades in London in 1954 and New York in 1957. The

New York crusade marked a turning point for Graham. Up to that point, his revivals had been sponsored by fundamentalists; in New York, he accepted sponsorship of the local council of churches, which included Protestant liberals. It seemed a sign that Graham was moving toward the ecclesiastical center, and this led to a break with some more militant fundamentalists. In addition to the rallies, Graham had a weekly radio program, The Hour of Decision, and, for three years, a television show by the same name. As his varied activities became more complex, he incorporated the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA) to run his ministry. BGEA published periodicals and books, released phonograph records, and acquired a movie production company. Edited tapes of his crusades became widely watched television specials.

Graham professed political neutrality during the campaign of 1952, but became a strong supporter of Eisenhower after the election. Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES endorsed Graham's world tours in 1954 and 1956. After his trip to India in 1956, Graham visited Eisenhower to inform him about the trip. Graham supported desegregation but favored a gradual process. In the early 1950s, he ordered that his rallies be desegregated and that his staff hire African Americans. In 1956 Eisenhower suggested that Graham use his influence with Protestant ministers to enlist them in the cause of peaceful desegregation, or at least to persuade them not to inflame public opinion against it. When, in his meetings with ministers, Graham used Eisenhower's name to support his plea for moderation, he received a letter from the president requesting that their exchange be kept confidential.

Graham's style of preaching became more subdued after the early 1950s. He called himself a Christian rather than a fundamentalist. Liberal theologians, such as REINHOLD NIEBUHR, criticized Graham's failure to promote social reform and characterized his ministry as a form of "Christian pietism quite irrelevant to the political life of man." On the other side of the spectrum, some fundamentalists condemned what they regarded as his move to the theological center. Still others found fault with Graham's use of gigantic rallies and the mass media. As the Christian Century complained, "At this strange new junction of Madison Avenue and the Bible Belt, the Holy Spirit is not overworked, he is overlooked." Despite his critics, by the late 1950s, polls consistently indicated that Graham was one of the "most admired" people in the United States.

Graham supported RICHARD M. NIXON in the election of 1960, but he maintained cordial relations with the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY and supported Kennedy's actions during the Cuban missile crisis. Graham continued to advocate desegregation and denounced violence against the Freedom Riders; at the same time, he urged black leaders to proceed slowly. Although invited to the White House by every president since Truman, Graham enjoyed a particularly close relationship with Nixon. He held a series of religious services at the White House during Nixon's first term and delivered a short prayer at Nixon's second inauguration. The two men often appeared in public together. Graham remained loyal to Nixon as the revelations concerning the Watergate scandal continued to mount. After the release of the White House tapes in May 1974, however, Graham called reading them "a profoundly disturbing and disappointing experience." Still, upon Nixon's resignation, Graham urged Americans to pray for the disgraced president.

By the 1980s, Graham began to mix a message of social meliorism with his traditional premillennial fatalism. In 1982, he called the nuclear arms race "a moral and spiritual issue that must concern us all," and in Approaching Hoofbeats, published the following year, he reflected that he should have done more to further world peace and social justice. In 1992, Graham announced that he had Parkinson's disease and would cut back on his schedule. A decade later, the release of some of the Nixon tapes revealed that Graham had joined in making anti-Semitic comments during a meeting with Nixon in 1972. Graham lives in Montreat, N.C., where he and his late wife had made their home since 1945.

Graham, Philip Leslie

(1915–1963) publisher

The son of a mining engineer and farmer, Graham was born on July 18, 1915, in Terry, S.Dak. He moved with his family to Florida, where his father managed a failed experimental sugarcane plantation. The senior Graham took over the land, began a successful dairy farm, eventually made a fortune in real estate, and became influential in state Democratic politics. The younger Graham earned his B.A. at the University of Florida in 1936 and his law degree from Harvard in 1939. At Harvard, he was editor of the law review and a protégé of FELIX FRANKFURTER. After graduating, he clerked for Justice STANLEY REED and then for (by this time, Justice) Frankfurter. Graham became one of the many Frankfurter students who went to work for the New Deal. He was an attorney for the Office of Lend-Lease Administration and the Office of Emergency Management. In 1940, he married Katharine Meyer, the daughter of Eugene Meyer, a wealthy banker and owner of the Washington Post. Graham served in intelligence with the army air corps during World War II and rose to the rank of major. After the war, at the behest of his father-in-law, Graham became the publisher of the Post, and under his leadership, the newspaper emerged as one of the country's most influential. Graham himself became a powerful figure in the liberal establishment and the consummate Washington insider. He used his position at the paper and the Post itself to further his own liberal, elitist vision and causes.

With Graham at the helm, the Post supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy and yet defended civil liberties during the emerging cold war (although Graham was more cautious in this regard than his editorial writer, Alan Barth). The paper was among the leaders in criticizing the antics of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Graham and the Post endorsed DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in the presidential election of 1952, at least in part because the publisher thought that Eisenhower's election would bring McCarthy to heel. During the 1950s, the Post consistently supported civil rights, although the paper published little about African Americans or the black community in Washington and was slow to integrate its own offices.

Graham made the Post a financial as well as a journalistic success. The paper purchased its morning rival, the Washington Times-Herald, in 1954 and Newsweek magazine in 1961. In addition, the Post purchased its first television station in 1950 and developed an empire in radio and television broadcasting.

A charming and charismatic character, Graham established himself as a favorite guest at Georgetown cocktail parties. He could engage the paper's pressmen and drivers with equal ease. In addition to his personal magnetism, his success at the Post derived from his sound editorial judgment and his appreciation for good writing. Above all, though, he cultivated close contacts with people in power, most notably senators LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). Graham urged Johnson to support a civil rights bill in 1957 and helped maneuver the legislation through Congress. He supported Johnson for the presidency in 1960 and played a role in Kennedy's selection of Johnson as his running mate. Graham became extremely close to Kennedy during the latter's tenure in the White House. The coverage of events in the Post and in Newsweek reflected Graham's intimate connection with the president.

Graham suffered from manic depression and could not work for several months in 1957. He was able to attend to his duties at the Post only sporadically in 1958 and 1959. As he reached the pinnacle of power and financial success in the early 1960s, he proved unable to handle it. He was verbally abusive to his family and friends and became increasingly resentful of his father-in-law, who before his death in 1959 had treated Graham like a favored son. Graham's public tirades against Meyer shocked those who knew how much the old man loved him. Moreover, his attacks on Meyer reflected an intense and growing anti-Semitism. Graham drank heavily and engaged in extramarital affairs with little effort at discretion. In 1963, he had a highly public affair with a young Australian woman who worked at Newsweek and announced his intention to marry her. That same year, at a conference of newspaper publishers in Phoenix, Ariz., he delivered a savage and obscene attack on his peers and disclosed one of Kennedy's affairs. After he began to disrobe, he was escorted from the stage and returned to Washington in a strait-jacket. After a period of psychiatric care, he shot himself to death at Glen Welby, his estate near Middleburg, Va., on August 3, 1963.

Green, Edith S(tarrett)(1910–1987) U.S. congresswoman

Born on January 17, 1910, in Trent, S.Dak., Edith Louise Starrett moved with her parents to Oregon in 1916. She attended Willamette University from 1927 to 1929 and graduated from the University of Oregon in 1939. After working as an English teacher from 1930 to 1941 and a radio announcer from 1943 to 1947, she was director of public relations for the Oregon Education Association and ran unsuccessfully for secretary of state of Oregon in 1952. A Democrat, Green narrowly won a congressional seat in 1954 from a district including Portland and part of its suburbs.

In the House, she served on the Education and Labor Committee. Green supported a variety of liberal programs, including civil rights, tax reform, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, a higher minimum wage, equal pay for equal work performed by women, campaign finance disclosure, and public rather than private development of resources. However, her main efforts focused on education. In her first month in office, she introduced a bill to provide emergency federal assistance to states and territories for construction of urgently needed school facilities, but no action was taken on the proposal. Green also introduced the Library Services Act, which became law in June 1956 and helped to extend public library services to rural areas.

Green's interest in education was sometimes linked to her commitment to civil rights. In 1956, Green and seven other Democratic representatives asked President Eisenhower to declare that he would refuse to allocate federal funds to school systems that defied the Supreme Court's 1954 decision outlawing school segregation. The president, however, declined.

The successful launching of the Soviet satellite, Sputnik, in 1957 aroused American fears that the United States lagged behind the Soviet Union in educational programs, and in 1958 Congress approved an unprecedented educational appropriation, the National Defense Education Act (NDEA). Green helped shape and win passage of the measure, which provided more than $1 billion over a seven-year period for loans and grants to schools and students. In April 1959, she joined two college presidents in urging Congress to remove the loyalty oath required of NDEA fund recipients. No action was taken on the request.

Green supported the large defense expenditures she believed were necessary because of the cold war. She and seven other Democratic representatives drafted a resolution in 1959 against atomic exchange agreements between the United States and seven NATO countries. The group feared that such pacts would heighten the risk of war. In May 1960, she joined 27 other House Democrats who wrote the president urging him to oppose "any unwise cuts" in the mutual security appropriations bill.

Although Green had only narrowly won her first House race, her subsequent majorities never fell below 63 percent. Her strong base enabled her to play a role in national Democratic politics. At the convention in 1956, she seconded the nomination of ADLAI STEVENSON for president, and in 1960 she managed JOHN F. KENNEDY's (D-Mass.) successful campaign in the Oregon primary. She seconded the Massachusetts senator's nomination at the Los Angeles convention in 1960. Green maintained a record of solid support for the domestic policies of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and continued to play an active role in education legislation. She spoke out forcefully against the war in Vietnam beginning in 1965. Green grew increasingly conservative in the late 1960s and early 1970s. She opposed busing as a means to achieve desegregation and voted against increasing payments to welfare recipients. She did not seek reelection in 1974 and supported GERALD FORD in the presidential election of 1976. After retiring from Congress, she was a professor of government at Warner Pacific College and served on the Oregon Board of Higher Education in 1979. She died in Tualatin, Oreg., on April 21, 1987.

Green, Theodore Francis(1867–1966) U.S. senator; chairman, Foreign Relations Committee

Born into a wealthy and aristocratic family in Providence, R.I., on October 2, 1867, Green graduated from Providence High School in 1883. He earned a B.A. from Brown University in 1887 and an M.A. from the same institution a year later.

After attending Harvard Law School from 1888 to 1890, he studied at the Universities of Bonn and Berlin from 1890 to 1892. Green was admitted to the Rhode Island bar in 1892 and joined his father's law firm two years later. His legal career was interrupted briefly by service in the Spanish-American War. Green was elected as a Democrat to the state house of representatives for the 1907–08 term. He ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. House of Representatives in 1920 and for governor in 1912, 1928, and 1930. The Great Depression helped him finally win the governorship in 1932. In office, he immediately obtained passage of legislation providing welfare and unemployment relief. Green won reelection in 1934, and helped establish the Democratic party as the dominant party in what had been a Republican state.

In 1936, Gov. Green won a seat in the U.S. Senate. He supported New Deal and Fair Deal legislation and was an internationalist in foreign affairs both before and after World War II. In addition to backing relief, recovery, and regulatory measures of the New Deal, Green supported Franklin D. Roosevelt's court-packing plan. In 1944 and 1945, as chairman of the Committee on Campaign Expenditures, Green led an investigation of violations of limitations on campaign spending prescribed by the Hatch Act. In 1945 the panel recommended repeal of the law as "unrealistic."

A member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Green compiled a record as an internationalist in foreign policy during the 1950s. He voted against the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president's power to make treaties, and joined the panel's other Democrats in 1953 in opposing a resolution, inspired by Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, annulling secret foreign agreements used to justify the "enslavement" of other peoples. The resolution represented an implicit attack on Democratic presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and HARRY S. TRUMAN for allegedly making such agreements with the Soviet Union at Yalta and Potsdam. The resolution died in committee that March. Two years later, Green strongly supported a resolution, adopted by both houses, opposing all forms of colonialism.

In 1957, Green gave up the chair of the Rules and Administration Committee to become head of the Foreign Relations panel. He supported the Eisenhower Doctrine and Eisenhower's decision to send American forces to Lebanon in 1958. In 1957, he defended his committee's $250-million cut in the administration's foreign-aid request on the grounds that the reduction would not impair the national interest and would compel tighter administration of the program. However, when Congress, following action by the Senate and House appropriations committees, reduced the request by another $750 million, Green resisted the additional cuts. The following year, he and seven other Foreign Relations Committee members signed a letter to President Eisenhower asking for greater emphasis on economic aid and less on military assistance. Green split with Eisenhower over the latter's response to threats by Communist China against the Nationalist-held islands of Quemoy and Matsu. After that, the senator became increasingly critical of Eisenhower's foreign policy.

A loyal ally of the majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Green was one of a handful of Democratic liberals who voted to eliminate the provision authorizing the Justice Department to enter civil suits on behalf of desegregation from the bill that became the Civil Rights Act of 1957. By the mid-1950s, Green's failing hearing, eyesight, and mental faculties made him overly dependent on his aides. In 1959, Green was over 90 years old and incapable of handling the responsibility of chairing the Foreign Relations Committee. He required the assistance of an aide to find his way around Capitol Hill; he had difficulty identifying colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee without the aid of a seating chart; he would brief the press on closed meetings of the committee and compound the problem by presenting a garbled version of what had transpired. On the floor of the Senate, it was all he could do to mumble and stumble his way through speeches his aides had written for him. After the Providence Journal ran an editorial urging him to step down, Johnson persuaded him to relinquish the chair voluntarily to the second-ranking Democrat, Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.). Green did not seek reelection in 1960 and died in Providence on May 19, 1966.

Greenewalt, Crawford H(allock)

(1902–1993) president and chairman of the executive committee, E.I. du Pont [DuPont] de Nemours & Co.

The son of a physician and symphony pianist, Greenewalt was born on August 16, 1902. He graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1922 with a degree in chemical engineering and began his career with DuPont at the company's plant in Philadelphia. Two years later, he was transferred to the Experimental Station to work in high-pressure technology. In June 1926, he married Margaretta DuPont, the daughter of the company's president, Irénée DuPont. In the 1920s and 1930s, he helped supervise the development of nylon.

Greenewalt was elected to the board of directors in 1941 and named chemical director the same year. He became director of the Grasselli Chemical Department of DuPont in 1942. Greenewalt witnessed the first self-sustaining atomic chain reaction engineered by Enrico Fermi at the University of Chicago in 1942. Thereafter, he helped maintain a close contact between DuPont and the atomic project. DuPont was involved in the design, construction and operation of the plutonium plant near Hanford, Wash. During World War II, he served as adviser to the Chemical Warfare Service and the Manhattan Project.

After the war, Greenewalt was promoted, first to vice president in 1946, then to president, chairman of the executive committee, and member of the finance committee in 1948. He made large-scale research projects designed to produce "new nylons," the company's major objective in the postwar years. Toward that end, he persuaded DuPont's executive committee to commit $30 million to new research facilities and to fund research programs at universities. During his presidency, Greenewalt oversaw the development of the synthetic fibers Orlon, Dacron, and Lycra. The company also began to expand overseas.

During Greenewalt's tenure, the antitrust division of the Justice Department conducted several investigations of DuPont. A suit, begun in 1947, charging monopolistic practices in the manufacture and sale of cellophane, was thrown out in December 1953. A separate suit, filed in 1949, charged that DuPont's $560-million investment in General Motors, giving it a controlling share of the stock, violated the Clayton Antitrust Act. In 1951, the Supreme Court reversed the ruling of a federal district court that the government had failed to prove conspiracy. The court said that DuPont's control made it possible for the company to monopolize a substantial part of the market for auto fabrics and finishes. The case was then sent back to the lower court to determine an equitable remedy. In 1959, that court ruled that the company could keep its 23 percent interest but would have to give up voting rights in the stock. The Supreme Court rejected this decree in 1961 and ordered DuPont to divest itself of its 63 million shares (valued by that date at almost $3 billion) within 10 years.

During the 1950s, Greenewalt served on several government commissions. His most important assignment was as a member of the Commission on National Goals, formed in 1959. The panel report, released in November 1960, called for "extraordinary personal responsibility, sustained effort and sacrifice" from every American in the 1960s to help the United States achieve "high and difficult goals" in a period of "grave danger" ahead.

While approving the report, Greenewalt added his own statement cautioning that the goals would call for unprecedented expenditures that would create an unsupportable tax burden given the present economy. He therefore recommended improving the atmosphere for vigorous growth through, among other things, cutting income tax rates in the higher brackets. Although supporting the report's recommendation for free trade, he cautioned that it could lead to higher unemployment and the move to reduce tariffs should be taken cautiously.

By the late 1950s, DuPont had become overly reliant on textile fibers and faced slowing growth as well as diminishing returns from research on textiles. In 1961, Greenewalt urged the company to focus on developing new markets and announced a program to diversify the company's interests "beyond existing fields of interest and beyond chemistry." He stepped down as president in 1962 but continued to serve as chair of the board of directors until 1967. Even after resigning the chair, he remained on the board and continued to advocate the development of new product lines until his retirement in 1988. He died in Wilmington, Del., on September 27, 1993.

Griffin, (Samuel) Marvin*(1907–1982) governor of Georgia*

The son of a state legislator and founder of the Bainbridge Post-Searchlight, Griffin was born in Bainbridge, Ga., on September 4, 1907. He grew up in an atmosphere of small-town politics and journalism and worked as a page in the Georgia legislature at the age of 10. After receiving a B.A. from the Citadel in 1929, he taught at Randolph-Macon Academy in Front Royal, Va. When his father became ill in 1933, Griffin returned to Bainbridge to take over the family newspaper. He won election to the general assembly as a Democrat in 1934 and, after serving one term, ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. House of Representatives in 1936. He worked for the administration of Gov. E. D. ("Ed") Rivers and eventually became Rivers's executive secretary. Griffin enlisted in the army during World War II, served in the South Pacific, and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. In 1944, Georgia's governor, Ellis Arnall, appointed him adjutant general of the Georgia National Guard, a post he held until 1947. Griffin won a special election for lieutenant governor in 1948 and won reelection to a full term in 1950, during which he served under Georgia's segregationist governor, HERMAN TALMADGE.

In January 1954, anticipating that the Supreme Court would rule against segregation in public schools, Talmadge created the Georgia Commission on Education to develop a plan to maintain segregation. He also promoted a state constitutional amendment giving the state power to convert its public schools into a private system. State funds would then be used for tuition grants for private school students. Griffin strongly supported this plan and in 1954 gained Talmadge's informal support against eight other contenders in the Democratic primary for the gubernatorial nomination. Running as an extreme segregationist, he won the September primary and was elected in November.

Assuming office without a social, economic, or political program, Griffin focused his attention on preserving segregation. In April 1955, he opposed integration in a debate with New York State Attorney General JACOB K. JAVITS at the Harvard Law School. In December of that year, Griffin gained wide attention by requesting the state board of regents to prohibit schools under its jurisdiction from engaging in athletic events "where the races are mixed on such teams or where segregation is not required among spectators." The request was prompted by Georgia Tech's scheduled participation in the Sugar Bowl against a team from the University of Pittsburgh that had one black player. The board of regents turned down the governor's request but reaffirmed that games played in Georgia would remain segregated.

In September 1955, Griffin participated in a meeting of leading political figures in Georgia at which they decided to take over the founding States' Rights Council and make it an effective organization in the service of white supremacy. During January 1956, Griffin and other state officials traveled through Georgia promoting the council and enlisting members. State employees were virtually compelled to contribute.

That month, Virginia's governor, THOMAS STANLEY, called a southern governors' conference to support the doctrine of interposition, which asserted that a state had a right to interpose its sovereignty between its people and illegal acts of the federal government. Griffin alone held an even more extreme position, urging outright nullification of the Supreme Court decision. In February 1956, he had the Georgia legislature invoke interposition and approve nullification.

Griffin refused to join the Dixiecrat call for a new political party. However, when he accepted nomination as Georgia's favorite-son candidate for president at the Democratic National Convention in August 1956, Griffin took advantage of the national coverage to denounce the Supreme Court in his acceptance speech.

In August 1957, Griffin went to Little Rock, Ark., where Central High School was scheduled to desegregate at the beginning of the school year, and gave a speech at a meeting of the Capital Citizens' Council. Griffin's address contended, in vague but inflammatory terms, that Georgia was using interposition to nullify the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education. Governor ORVAL FAUBUS of Arkansas steered clear of the meeting but invited Griffin to stay overnight at the governor's mansion. Faubus maintained that Griffin's speech shifted public opinion in Little Rock and that it limited his own options. When President Eisenhower ordered federal troops to enforce integration in Little Rock the following month, Gov. Griffin joined other southern leaders in urging the South to take unified political action to prevent desegregation. There were, however, limits to Griffin's commitment to segregation. When extreme segregationists urged him to defy federal court orders, Griffin declined, saying that "being in jail kind of crimps a governor's style."

Griffin's term was not devoted solely to preserving segregation. Upon taking office, he faced an expected deficit, so he reneged on a campaign promise and pushed through an increase in the state income tax. Under his administration, the Rural Roads Authority paved nearly 12,000 miles of rural roads. His administration also oversaw a 50 percent increase in funding for education, which included a 25 percent raise in teachers' salaries. Some of the increased spending on education went to larger appropriations for black schools and to reducing the disparity between the salaries of black and white teachers in an effort to resist desegregation by demonstrating the equality of black and white schools. By 1958, however, the governor found himself increasingly occupied defending his administration against charges of corruption. Some members of his administration were convicted on various charges. Prevented by law from succeeding himself, he retired in 1959. A grand jury in Fulton Co. investigated Griffin in 1960 but did not return an indictment. He attempted a comeback in the gubernatorial race of 1962, but he lost overwhelmingly in the Democratic primary. Griffin reemerged briefly in 1968 as the temporary vice presidential nominee of George Wallace's American Independent Party. Like many conservative southern Democrats, Griffin began supporting Republican presidential candidates in the 1970s. He endorsed GERALD FORD in 1976 and Ronald Reagan in 1980. Griffin died of lung cancer in Tallahassee, Fla., on June 13, 1982.

Griffin, Robert P.

The son of a factory worker, Griffin was born in Detroit, Mich., on November 6, 1923. He attended Central Michigan College of Education at Mount Pleasant, but left to enlist in the army in 1943. After serving in Europe for 14 months, he returned to Central Michigan College and graduated in 1947. By that time, he had decided to become a lawyer rather than a teacher. He enrolled at the University of Michigan Law School, where he was an associate editor of the Michigan Law Review and received his law degree in 1950. Griffin was admitted to the Michigan bar that same year and cofounded a law firm in Traverse City. He specialized in labor law.

In 1956, Griffin entered the Republican congressional primary in the ninth district against a conservative incumbent, Rep. Ruth Thompson. He won that contest and went on to defeat his Democratic opponent by 14,000 votes. Because of his expertise in labor matters, he asked for and was given an assignment on the Education and Labor Committee. In 1957, he broke with six conservative Republican members of the Education and Labor Committee and supported a bill, backed by the administration, that would have provided federal aid for school construction. The following year, he supported a measure establishing a seven-year program of federal loans and grants to schools and individual students. On the House floor, he succeeded in adding an amendment to include junior colleges among the institutions eligible for aid to improve instructional facilities in science, mathematics, and modern languages.

In 1959, Griffin earned the enmity of organized labor by cosponsoring a labor reform measure. The origins of the bill lay in the investigations of organized labor by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN's (D-Ark.) Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. That probe, which revealed extensive corruption as well as collusion between management and labor leaders, generated public pressure for reform. Early in 1959, Eisenhower called for legislation to safeguard union contributions of workers, ensure secret ballots in union elections, and protect the public interest during labor disputes. The AFL-CIO supported a weaker measure, and Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) proposed a bill along those lines. Kennedy's bill required labor unions to file annual financial reports, required that union elections be held by secret ballot and at regular intervals, and provided criminal penalties for bribery, extortion, misappropriation of union funds, and other practices.

President Eisenhower, Republican congressional leaders, and southern Democrats favored a more comprehensive bill including amendments strengthening some provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. When the House Education and Labor Committee in July 1959 reported a measure that did not go much beyond Kennedy's proposal, Griffin and Rep. PHIL M. LANDRUM (D-Ga.) introduced their own bill, adding the desired amendments to the bill in the Senate. The most significant provisions of the original Landrum-Griffin bill were adopted by both houses in September. The amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act defined as an unfair labor practice a labor-management contract under which the employer agreed not to do business with another firm, restricted organizational and recognition picketing and secondary boycotts, brought several additional categories of workers within the scope of the Taft-Hartley Act's restrictions on picketing and secondary boycotts, and barred unions from picketing a retail store to protest that the store was handling the goods of a firm that the union was striking.

In 1960, Griffin opposed a bill to legalize common-site picketing in the construction industry. He also opposed efforts to increase the minimum wage by more than 15 cents above the existing $1 minimum, asserting that a larger increment would be harmful to marginal and physically handicapped workers and would cause serious economic dislocation.

In 1963, Griffin and several other younger Republican representatives led a revolt against the party's leadership in the House that resulted in the ouster of the chair of the House Republican Conference Committee and the election of Rep. GERALD R. FORD (R-Mich.) in his place. Two years later, the so-called Young Turks unseated the minority leader, CHARLES A. HALLECK (R-Ind.), and replaced him with Ford. Although Griffin voted much like other Republican members of the House, he split with his party and voted for Medicare after the Republican substitute failed. In 1966, Gov. GEORGE W. ROMNEY appointed Griffin to the seat left vacant by the death of Sen. PAT V. McNAMARA (D-Mich.). Griffin won a full term in the elections that fall and reelection in 1972. In 1968, he led the successful opposition to President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's nomination of Associate Justice Abe Fortas to be chief justice. Griffin became minority whip in 1969, a position he held until he ran unsuccessfully for minority leader in 1976. After failing in his bid for a third full term in 1978, Griffin returned to Traverse City, Mich., where he continues to live.

Gross, H(arold) R(oyce)

(1899–1987) U.S. congressman

Born on June 30, 1899, in Arispe, Iowa, Gross was raised on a farm in southern Iowa. After serving overseas in World War I, he attended Iowa State College and the University of Missouri School of Journalism. From 1921 to 1935, he worked on several newspapers as a reporter and editor. He was a radio news commentator from 1935 to 1948.

In the Republican primary of June 1948, Gross defeated the incumbent U.S. representative in Iowa's predominantly agricultural third congressional district and went on to win the general election. Gross quickly established himself as a persistent advocate of reductions in federal spending and in May 1950 voted for a $600-million cut in the national budget. In 1949 and 1950, however, Gross backed bills sponsored by the Truman administration providing for high farm price supports.

Gross opposed the internationalist and multilateral foreign policy of the Truman and Eisenhower administrations. In 1953, he unsuccessfully offered an amendment to an appropriations bill that would have cut America's contribution to the UN by 90 percent. Two years later, he opposed an extension of reciprocal trade legislation. In 1957, Gross voted against U.S. appropriations for the UN Emergency Force in the Middle East. During the same year, he opposed the Eisenhower Doctrine, which authorized the president to use force to help Middle Eastern nations repel communist aggression. In 1959, he offered an amendment to a mutual security bill that declared that the United States should have as little political connection with other nations as possible. It was rejected by voice vote.

Continuing to advocate fiscal frugality during the 1950s, Gross opposed an increase in the national debt limit in 1955, asserting that "the answer to financial stability on the part of the federal government is reduced spending, not steadily increasing debt." During the same year, he denounced congressional junkets and opposed increased salaries for judges and cabinet officers in the District of Columbia. His fiscal conservatism led him to oppose many social welfare expenditures. In 1956, he criticized a 37 percent increase in funds for the National Institutes of Health. Two years later, Gross asserted that the funds allotted by the Appropriations Committee for the Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare departments were excessive.

Gross nevertheless persisted in backing high farm price supports during the Eisenhower presidency and in 1954 voted against the administration's omnibus farm bill, which lowered support levels. He opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1957 but voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1960. According to Congressional Quarterly, Gross voted contrary to Eisenhower positions on key bills more often than he backed the administration.

Gross consistently opposed New Frontier and Great Society programs in the 1960s and continued his efforts to reduce U.S. financial support of the UN. During the 1960s and early 1970s, Gross retained his reputation as a leading opponent of what he regarded as excessive government spending. He did not run for reelection in 1974. Gross resided in Arlington, Va., until his death in Washington, D.C., on September 22, 1987.

Gruening, Ernest H(enry)

(1887–1974) U.S. senator

Born on February 6, 1887, in New York City, Gruening graduated from the Hotchkiss School in 1903, Harvard College in 1907, and Harvard Medical School in 1912. He chose a career in journalism, beginning as a reporter for the Boston American in 1912. He then held a succession of jobs with several newspapers and became managing editor of the New York Tribune in 1917. After service in the Field Artillery Corps in 1918, he served as editor of several liberal journals during the 1920s and 1930s.

In that capacity, he espoused a number of controversial causes, including racial integration and birth control. He was editor of the Nation from 1920 to 1923. Gruening took time off from journalism to direct publicity for Robert La Follette's campaign for the presidency in 1924. After the election, he went to Mexico to report on conditions after the revolution for Collier's Weekly. In 1927, he helped found the Portland (Maine) Evening News, for which he served as editor until 1932. An opponent of American military intervention in Latin America, he published Mexico and Its Heritage (1927), a highly regarded account of the Mexican Revolution. He supported HERBERT HOOVER for the presidency in 1928. Gruening edited the New York Post from 1932 to 1933.

As the New Deal got under way, Gruening became a loyal Democrat. He served briefly as editor of the New York Evening Post in early 1934. Later that year, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed him director of the division of territories and island possessions in the Department of the Interior. Gruening simultaneously administered relief and reconstruction programs in Puerto Rico. In 1939, Roosevelt appointed him territorial governor of Alaska, a position he held until 1953.

Gruening later wrote that when he assumed the governorship, "Alaska was in the grip of absentee interests and had been for a quarter of a century." As governor, he proposed a tax system that weakened the influence of nonresident business interests, and he worked for improved transportation, particularly the construction of the Alcan Highway. Gruening also won legislation designed to protect Alaska's Eskimos from discrimination.

Gruening was also a leading advocate of statehood. He appeared on numerous occasions before congressional committees charged with weighing Alaska's possible admission to the union. Anticipating statehood, the Alaska territorial legislature called a constitutional convention, which assembled in September 1955 with Gruening as its keynote speaker. His address, titled "Let Us End American Colonialism," was widely circulated in pamphlet form by pro-statehood groups.

Gruening's campaign for statehood had to answer objections stemming from Alaska's remoteness, small population, and strategic military value.

President Eisenhower, who, endorsed statehood for Hawaii, had reservations about Alaska's lack of population and its strategic importance. In The Battle for Alaska Statehood (1967), Gruening attributed Eisenhower's opposition to "the assumption that Hawaii would elect Republicans and Alaska Democrats." In fact, although Eisenhower opposed Alaskan statehood in 1953 based largely on its lack of population, he recommended statehood for Alaska and Hawaii to Congress in January 1957.

To promote its cause, the Alaska legislature adopted the "Tennessee Plan," a device first used by Tennessee in 1796 to achieve statehood. Under the plan, the territory in November 1956 elected two senators, including Gruening, and one representative to the U.S. Congress to lobby for statehood. Their efforts met with success. In June 1958, Congress approved statehood for Alaska and Hawaii. Democrats won all statewide offices that November, and Gruening won a four-year Senate term. He won reelection in 1962.

In the Senate, Gruening vigorously represented Alaska's interests. He also called for a more vigorous congressional role in foreign policy, particularly in the area of foreign aid. In May 1960, the Senate accepted his amendment to a foreign-aid bill that required detailed explanations and cost projections for military assistance projects. However, his amendment requiring officials to give Congress detailed country-by-country budgets for all foreign-aid programs was defeated. In national affairs, Gruening supported a variety of progressive measures. He cosponsored Sen. PATRICK McNAMARA's program to provide medical care to the aged through Social Security. In addition, he supported most civil rights measures and government funding for the distribution of birth control information.

Initially enthusiastic about the election of JOHN F. KENNEDY, Gruening became disappointed with what he perceived to be Kennedy's lack of commitment to domestic issues. He staunchly supported the domestic programs of the Johnson administration, but he won prominence as one of the earliest congressional opponents of the Vietnam War. He spoke against Kennedy's policy in Indochina in 1963 and was one of two senators to vote against the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution in 1964. Making a bid for a third term, Gruening lost the Democratic primary to Mike Gravel in 1968. Upon leaving the Senate, Gruening became president of an investment firm and a legislative consultant. He continued to oppose the war and campaigned for Sen. George McGovern (D-S.Dak.) in the presidential election of 1972. Gruening died in Washington, D.C., on June 26, 1974.

Gruenther, Alfred M(aximilian)

The son of a small-town newspaper editor, Gruenther was born in Platte Center, Neb., on March 3, 1899. He attended the United States Military Academy at West Point and graduated fourth in the class of 1918. He completed field artillery school in 1919 and the following year was assigned to Fort Knox, Ky. While there, he took up bridge, which became a consuming passion for him. Later, he would serve as a referee for some of the great bridge matches of the 1930s and write a book, Duplicate Contract Bridge. After an inconspicuous early career (it took him 17 years of peacetime service to advance to captain), during which he mostly taught mathematics at West Point, Gruenther attended Command and General Staff School in 1937 and the Army War College in 1939. He attracted attention for his performance in the large-scale war games conducted in 1941, known as the Louisiana Maneuvers. As a result of his performance, he was promoted and made deputy chief of staff of the Third Army, whose chief of staff was DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, then a brigadier general. When the United States entered World War II, Gruenther went to London as chief American planner for Operation Torch, the Allied invasion of North Africa. He won the Distinguished Service Medal for his role in planning the invasion. Subsequently, he served as deputy chief of staff under Gen. Eisenhower, who was then the supreme allied commander, and in 1943 became chief of staff of the Fifth Army under Gen. MARK W. CLARK. In that capacity, he contributed to the planning of the invasion of Italy and the campaign in the Apennines. When Clark became commander of the Fifteenth Army Group, Gruenther continued as his chief of staff. After the war, Gruenther served as deputy commanding general of the U.S. forces in Austria from 1945 to 1947. In all of his duties, he demonstrated a capacity to assimilate and analyze masses of information and to convert the product into precise operational plans.

In 1947, Gruenther returned to the United States, where he served as deputy commandant of the National War College and director of the staff of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He then became the army's deputy chief of staff for plans and operations. In 1951, he assumed new duties as the first chief of staff at NATO headquarters and received his fourth star, making him the youngest four-star general in the history of the U.S. Army. Gruenther served as chief of staff under Eisenhower and then General MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY. In May 1953, he took over as commander of Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe (SHAPE).

As commander of SHAPE, Gruenther won respect as a diplomat as well as a military leader. Eisenhower recognized Gruenther's good relations with European leaders and used him as a personal envoy. Gruenther helped present the administration's support for European unity. In addition, he had to deal with European discomfort over Eisenhower's reduction of American conventional forces as part of the "New Look" defense policy. Eisenhower used Gruenther to help calm European leaders when many of them became concerned about the confrontation between the United States and the People's Republic of China over Quemoy and Matsu in the first half of 1955. Gruenther strongly supported the admission of Germany into NATO and the integration of German forces into NATO's force structure. The latter position, in particular, encountered stiff opposition on the part of some allies. Moreover, by the time Gruenther became Supreme Allied commander Europe (SACEUR), some analysts had begun to argue that NATO was a victim of its own success. Its military preparedness contributed to reducing the Soviet threat, but, consequently, some members of the alliance regarded it as less important. France withdrew the bulk of its ground forces from NATO to fight in North Africa.

After retiring from the army at the end of 1956, Gruenther became president of the American Red Cross from 1957 to 1964. He served on numerous boards of directors, as chairman of the English-Speaking Union of the United States from 1966 to 1968, and as a trustee of Eisenhower College in Seneca Falls, N.Y. Gruenther died of pneumonia in Washington, D.C., on May 30, 1983.

Hagerty, James Campbell

(1909–1981) White House press secretary

The son of James A. Hagerty, chief political correspondent for the New York Times, James C. Hagerty was born on May 9, 1909, in Plattsburgh, N.Y. After graduating from Blair Academy in 1928, he went to work on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock market crash made him rethink his career plans, and he enrolled at Columbia University, where he received his B.A. in 1934. While at Columbia, he was campus correspondent for the New York Times. Upon graduation, he joined the city staff of that paper. He became a legislative correspondent and deputy bureau chief in Albany for the Times in 1938. When THOMAS E. DEWEY was elected governor, he named Hagerty as an executive assistant and press secretary. Hagerty also handled press relations for Dewey's two presidential campaigns.

When Eisenhower undertook his campaign for the presidency in 1952, he chose Hagerty as his principal spokesman and press adviser. After the election, Eisenhower selected Hagerty as his press secretary. From the outset, Eisenhower included Hagerty in key meetings and made sure that the press secretary was fully informed about developments and policies. Hagerty emerged as one of Eisenhower's most trusted advisers. He also generally enjoyed good relations with the working press. Hagerty and his assistants briefed reporters every morning and afternoon; they held many press briefings on weekends, too. In spite of occasional flashes of Hagerty's explosive temper, many in the White House press corps liked him; virtually all respected his competence. Hagerty initiated regularly scheduled presidential news conferences and instituted a new policy that allowed everything the president said at a press conference to be printed verbatim. He presided over the admission of newsreel and television cameras to presidential news conferences in 1955. Eisenhower and Hagerty saw this as an opportunity to get the administration's message directly to the people, unmediated by the press. Widely regarded as the very model of a modern press secretary, Hagerty's success derived from his own experience and ability as well as his close personal relationship with Eisenhower.

The press secretary's assured handling of difficult situations eased public anxiety and put the administration in the best possible light. Hagerty kept the press informed of the president's condition following Eisenhower's heart attack in September 1955 and his stroke in November 1957. In the days and weeks after the president's heart attack, Hagerty became a familiar figure to the public through frequent news briefings. He also relayed to the public information about the downing of a U-2 spy plane over the Soviet Union and the subsequent cancellation of the summit conference in 1960.

In addition to handling press relations, Hagerty offered advice on a range of domestic and political matters. For instance, he urged Eisenhower to denounce the attack on the Protestant clergy by J. B. MATTHEWS, a member of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY's staff. Hagerty arranged for the National Conference of Christians and Jews to send an outraged telegram to the president and drafted the president's reply. When Eisenhower considered running for a second term, Hagerty was one of the few people he consulted about the decision. In one instance where Eisenhower did not follow his press secretary's advice, Hagerty unsuccessfully urged Eisenhower to trumpet the successes of the U.S. space program.

Hagerty was sympathetic to black civil rights and willing to weigh in on the issue. In June 1955, Louis Lautier, a reporter for the Baltimore Afro-American, applied for membership in the National Press Club. Some members opposed the admission of an African American, and Merriman Smith, a reporter friendly to the administration, advised Hagerty, as a member of the administration, to stay out of the controversy. Hagerty replied that he was a voting member and would vote for Lautier's admission, a position that received the president's backing. During the debate over the administration's bill to provide federal aid for school construction in 1956, Hagerty urged the president to support the Powell amendment, which would have banned federal aid to school districts that continued to practice segregation. However, Eisenhower remained publicly neutral on the amendment.

With the end of the Eisenhower administration, Hagerty joined the American Broadcasting Company as vice president of the news division. In 1964, he became vice president of corporate relations, a title he held, despite suffering a stroke in 1975, until his death in Bronxville, N.Y., on April 11, 1981.

Hall, Leonard W(ood)

(1900–1979) chairman, Republican National Committee

The son of a White House librarian, Hall was born on October 2, 1900, in Oyster Bay, N.Y. He earned his LL.B. at Georgetown University law school in 1920, was admitted to the New York bar in 1922, and began a lucrative law career in New York City. Hall entered politics as a GOP campaign worker in 1926. He served as state assemblyman in 1927–28 and again from 1934 to 1938. He was sheriff of Nassau Co. from 1929 to 1931. In 1939, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he voted primarily with the internationalist Eastern wing of the Republican Party. Hall managed THOMAS DEWEY's unsuccessful presidential campaign in 1948. He did not seek reelection in 1952, but supported Gen. Eisenhower for the Republican presidential nomination and established a personal relationship with the general during the fall campaign.

Hall became Eisenhower's choice for Republican national chairman following C. WESLEY ROBERTS's resignation in March 1953. The decision was based not only on Hall's relationship with the president but on his high standing with party leaders on Capitol Hill. In addition, he had organized the Republican Campaign Congressional Committee to unify the party and increase its influence in Washington, and so was known by Republican leaders throughout the country. Just as important, Hall had experience in organizing campaigns, a significant factor for a party facing difficult midterm elections in 1954.

Both Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) and Thomas Dewey opposed Hall's selection. Taft objected to Hall's alliance with the Eastern wing of the party, while Dewey harbored ill feelings going back to the disappointing loss in 1948. However, as a result of pressure from the administration and House Speaker JOE MARTIN (R-Mass.), both men eventually agreed to subordinate their own feelings and support Hall, who was officially installed as chairman in April 1953.

Hall's first challenge was to maintain Republican control of Congress in the elections of 1954. Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) anticommunist crusade presented a problem, particularly after his attack on the army. Hall initially endorsed McCarthy's attacks on communists and praised him as a "great asset" to the party. The Republican National Committee paid for a nine-city speaking tour by the senator. After McCarthy's abuse of Gen. RALPH ZWICKER, however, Hall emerged from a meeting with Eisenhower on March 2 and told reporters, "I don't think anyone would say generals in our army are not fighting communism." He also acknowledged that McCarthy could damage Republican chances in the upcoming elections. Attempting to make political capital out of the incident, ADLAI STEVENSON declared in a nationally broadcast speech that “a group of political plungers had persuaded the president that McCarthyism is the best Republican formula for political success.” He also called the party “half McCarthy and half Eisenhower.” McCarthy demanded equal time from the networks to respond. Hall, apparently acting with Eisenhower’s support, moved to preempt McCarthy by asking for 30 minutes of equal time on behalf of the Republican National Committee. He then announced that Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON would deliver the Republican reply. The fall elections proved disastrous for the Republican Party. Democrats won control of both houses of Congress, and Republicans lost heavily in gubernatorial races as well.

In late 1955 and early 1956, Hall first urged Eisenhower to seek a second term and then, when the president demonstrated reluctance to commit himself to keeping Nixon on the ticket, Hall became a forceful advocate of retaining Nixon. He argued that keeping Nixon was necessary to placate conservatives in the party. Once Eisenhower had publicly indicated that Nixon should “chart his own course,” Hall persuaded Nixon to express his desire for renomination directly to the president. After talking with Nixon, Eisenhower announced that the ticket would remain intact. Eisenhower won a lopsided victory over Stevenson in November, but, for the first time in over 100 years, the party of a victorious presidential candidate failed to win control of either house of Congress.

Adding to his difficulties, Hall became enmeshed in a scandal involving the General Services Administration (GSA). In 1955, EDMUND MANSURE, the administrator of the GSA, was charged with allowing political considerations to influence the awarding of contracts to upgrade a nickel plant in Nicaro, Cuba, owned by the U.S. government. In an appearance before the House Special Government Activities Subcommittee, Mansure testified that, early in the negotiations, he had submitted a list of contractors to Hall for approval. Although Mansure denied that the approval sought was on “a political basis,” a confidential memo obtained by the subcommittee indicated that the Frederick Snare Company received the contract only after meeting with Hall and assuring him that no Democrats held top positions in the company. Hall denied that he had ever “cleared any contractor, big or small, for work with the government.” While it was never proved that Hall or any other Republican solicited financial contributions from any of the companies seeking the Nicaro contract, the top executives at Snare substantially increased their contributions to Republicans in the elections of 1954. The chair of the subcommittee offered Hall the opportunity to appear before the subcommittee, but Hall declined. If the charges against Hall were true, he most likely violated federal law; yet he never faced questioning by the subcommittee. Rumors circulated to the effect that Democrats had done much the same thing when they held the White House and were therefore unenthusiastic about pursuing the matter. Whatever their motives, the Democratic members of the subcommittee were curiously restrained.

Hall resigned as GOP chairman in January 1957 and returned to the private practice of law in Garden City, N.Y., and New York City. He supported New York’s Gov. NELSON ROCKEFELLER’s unsuccessful candidacies for the Republican presidential nomination in 1964 and 1968. Hall died in Glen Cove, N.Y., on June 2, 1979.

Halleck, Charles A(braham)

(1900–1986) U.S. congressman, House majority leader, House minority leader

The son of two lawyers, Halleck was born in Demotte, Ind., on August 22, 1900. After graduating from high school and serving in the army during World War I, he enrolled in Indiana University, where he received his A.B. from the law department in 1922 and his LL.B. in 1924, finishing first in his law school class. The year he graduated from law school, he entered his parents’ law firm and won election as prosecuting attorney for Indiana’s 13th judicial district. He served for 10 years before winning a special election for a congressional seat in 1935. His campaign criticized the New Deal for expanding the role of the federal government. Although he favored “humanitarian legislation,” he argued against federal welfare and for local control. In Congress, Halleck consistently supported the Republican leadership and voted with the midwestern, conservative wing of the party. His reliability led JOE MARTIN (R-Mass.), the powerful minority leader, to appoint Halleck to the House Rules Committee. In 1940 Halleck became Martin's informal assistant. With respect to foreign policy, Halleck remained an isolationist until the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

As chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee (a post he assumed in 1943), Halleck contributed substantially to the Republican victory in the congressional elections of 1946. He raised money and stumped the country speaking for Republican candidates. Republican control of the House made Martin the Speaker in 1947, and Halleck was elected majority leader. Halleck was floor leader for the Taft-Hartley Act, a law restricting the political power of labor unions. A convert to internationalism after Pearl Harbor, Halleck supported aid for Greece and Turkey and voted for the Marshall Plan. In spite of his identification with the conservative wing of the party, Halleck endorsed THOMAS E. DEWEY, leader of the Eastern or liberal wing of the party, for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948. Apparently, he hoped to be Dewey's running mate, but that hope did not materialize. Moreover, Democrats won both houses of Congress that year, and Martin resumed the role of minority leader. Although no longer leader, Halleck remained an important member of the Republican leadership in the House.

When the Republicans won both houses behind Eisenhower's victory in 1952, Halleck again became majority leader. Although more conservative than Eisenhower, Halleck was first and foremost a party loyalist. While sympathetic to the efforts of conservative Republicans to enact a tax cut in 1953, he supported the administration's opposition to a reduction. Moreover, in spite of his criticism of foreign aid and reciprocal trade programs under Truman, he backed similar measures under Eisenhower.

When the Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress in the elections of 1954, Halleck considered challenging Martin for the position of minority leader. He sought Eisenhower's support, but the president, preferring to preserve party unity, urged Halleck not to run. Halleck entertained the possibility of running against the aging Martin for the leadership in 1957 but once again deferred to the president. After the Democratic sweep in the 1958 elections, however, Eisenhower indicated that he would not stand in Halleck's way. Eisenhower believed that weak congressional leadership had contributed to the defeat in 1958, and his hands-off policy was, in effect, an endorsement of Halleck. Further, many conservatives in the party believed that Martin cooperated too easily with the Democratic Speaker, SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.). On January 6, 1959, the House Republican caucus voted 74 to 70 to end Martin's 20-year reign and elected Halleck minority leader.

Halleck was a more aggressive and partisan minority leader than his predecessor. Shortly after assuming the leadership, he chose conservatives for two vacancies on the Rules Committee created when moderate Republicans, who had held the seats, lost their bids for reelection. The Rules Committee controlled the flow of legislation to the House floor, and Halleck's action made it more difficult for Rayburn to bring measures to a vote.

As leader, Halleck worked closely with Eisenhower and the minority leader in the Senate, EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.), to hold down federal spending. Eisenhower wielded the veto, and Halleck successfully held House Republicans together to sustain it. Halleck played a significant role in gaining passage of the Landrum-Griffin bill in the House. The Senate passed a measure that required labor unions to file annual financial reports, required that union elections be held by secret ballot and at regular intervals, and provided criminal penalties for bribery, extortion, misappropriation of union funds, and other practices. The House added restrictions on secondary boycotts and certain types of picketing. The bill ultimately passed by both houses closely resembled the measure that came out of the House. Halleck also led a successful effort to limit the area served by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

When the Democrats won the White House and retained control of both houses of Congress in 1960, Halleck assumed the role of opposition leader. He and Dirksen held frequent press conferences that became known as the "Ev and Charlie Show." Joining with southern Democrats, the Republican leadership managed to defeat a number of President JOHN F. KENNEDY's legislative proposals, including school aid and omnibus housing measures in 1961 and a farm bill in 1962. On the other hand, Halleck supported Kennedy's proposed civil rights measure and endorsed the more extensive civil rights bill backed by President LYNDON B. JOHNSON in 1964.

Halleck's hold on the leadership position began to slip in the early 1960s. In January 1963, GERALD FORD (R-Mich.), backed by a number of younger Republicans in the House, defeated Halleck's candidate for chair of the Republican Policy Committee. The Democratic landslide of 1964 further undermined Halleck's position. Ford defeated Halleck for the leadership in 1965. In 1968, Halleck announced that he would not run for reelection that year. Upon leaving the House, he returned to Indiana and resided in Rensselaer until his death in Lafayette, Ind., on March 3, 1986.

Hannah, John A(lfred)

(1902–1991) president, Michigan State University; assistant secretary of defense for manpower; chairman, Civil Rights Commission

The son of a poultry breeder, Hannah was born in Grand Rapids, Mich., on October 9, 1902. He attended Grand Rapids Junior College and the University of Michigan before graduating from Michigan Agricultural College, later known as Michigan State University (MSU), in 1923. Upon graduation, he became a poultry specialist with the university's extension service. He took a leave from that position in 1933 to become managing director of the National Poultry Breeders and Hatchery Committee, formed under the auspices of the National Recovery Administration. In 1934, Hannah returned to his alma mater, first as secretary of the school's governing body and, beginning in 1941, as president. During his presidency, MSU grew from a small land-grant college with 6,000 students into a "megaversity" with an enrollment of over 42,000 and a budget of over $100 million. Although not a scholar, the president became well known for his ability to sell his institution to the Michigan legislature by emphasizing popular and practical courses. He also garnered large amounts of state and federal aid for increased enrollment and construction. By 1951, MSU's building budget had reached $31 million, two-thirds from the state and federal governments. Funds also came from federally financed foreign-aid projects that the university directed in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. His critics claimed that he was sacrificing academic quality for expansion, but Hannah replied that his purpose was "not to de-emphasize scholarship but to emphasize its application." In another initiative, Hannah led MSU away from traditional racial discrimination. He directed that dormitories be racially integrated and that racial designations be removed from student records. He also refused to allow the school's athletic teams to play in places where minority athletes would not be accorded equal rights.

In 1953, President Eisenhower appointed Hannah assistant secretary of defense for manpower and personnel. During his short term in office, he was instrumental in ending segregation in civilian schools attended by children of members of the armed forces. He also attempted to raise the caliber of the armed forces by increasing intelligence requirements and extending training periods. Hannah returned to MSU in September 1954.

Three years later, Eisenhower appointed Hannah chairman of the newly formed Civil Rights Commission. He took office in February 1958. That year he announced that the panel would investigate violations of black voting rights in Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi. The commission's first report, released in September 1959, emphasized that many blacks were denied voting rights and recommended a series of legislative proposals to solve the problem. The panel suggested measures authorizing the temporary use of federal officials to register qualified voters in federal, general, special, or primary elections. It also recommended a census survey of voting statistics by race and that state and local authorities be required to preserve voting records. The commission urged that it be empowered to apply directly to federal courts for orders enforcing directives that witnesses appear and produce records.

Hannah and two other members of the group, Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh and George M. Johnson, also proposed a constitutional amendment to abolish literacy tests in voting. They further recommended that federal aid be withheld from segregated colleges and universities. However, the commission's three southern members opposed the recommendations.

Hannah continued as chairman of the Civil Rights Commission during the Kennedy and Johnson years. In 1966, an article in Ramparts charged that a federally financed MSU project in South Vietnam had provided a cover for Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) operations between 1955 and 1959. Hannah admitted the possibility of CIA infiltration but denied that Michigan State University had knowingly tolerated or encouraged this.

In 1969, President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed Hannah director of the Agency for International Development (AID), the primary agency responsible for the U.S. foreign-aid program. He originally wanted to retain the presidency of MSU while at AID, but he ultimately resigned his presidency. Hannah served as head of AID until his retirement in 1973. After retiring, he continued his association with the agency as a consultant. Hannah served as director of the United Nations' World Food Council from 1975 to 1978. He died in Kalamazoo, Mich., on February 23, 1991.

Harlan, John Marshall

(1899–1971) judge, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit; associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court Born in Chicago on May 20, 1899, Harlan had a distinguished legal lineage. His father and great-grandfather were lawyers; his grandfather, for whom he was named, served on the U.S. Supreme Court. After receiving his B.A. from Princeton University in 1920, Harlan spent three years as a Rhodes scholar at Balliol College, Oxford, where he began his study of law. Upon returning to the United States, he earned his LL.B. from New York Law School in 1924. That same year, he won admission to the New York bar. Harlan began his career with Root, Clark, Buckner & Howland, one of the most prestigious law firms in New York City. When Emory Buckner, a senior member of the firm, became U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York in 1925, Harlan served as his assistant for a year. Harlan was made a partner in Root, Clark, Buckner & Howland in 1931.

After Buckner died in 1941, Harlan became the firm's leading litigator, specializing in corporate and antitrust cases. During World War II, Harlan commanded the Operational Analysis Section of the army air corps in England. He also served on a committee planning the postwar occupation of Germany. Upon returning to private practice in 1945, he emerged as a recognized leader of the New York bar. He served as chief counsel to the New York State Crime Commission from 1951 to 1953 and held several top positions in the Association of the Bar of the City of New York. By the early 1950s, he had established a reputation as one of the nation's top antitrust litigators. Although never an especially active Republican, he had close ties to Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY and the governor's trusted adviser, HERBERT BROWNELL, who became attorney general in the Eisenhower administration. President Eisenhower nominated Harlan to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in January 1954, and Harlan took his seat on the bench in March. Less than a year later, Eisenhower nominated Harlan to the Supreme Court. In the Senate Judiciary Committee, Southerners held up the nomination, apparently out of fear that Harlan shared his grandfather's belief that the "Constitution is colorblind" and to express their dissatisfaction with the decision in Brown v. Board of Education. Nevertheless, the Senate voted overwhelmingly to confirm the nomination in March 1955. Harlan brought to the bench the same incisive intelligence and attention to detail that won him a reputation as a "lawyer's lawyer." As a justice, his careful, precisely reasoned opinions earned him virtually unanimous respect from lawyers and judges.

Harlan was a moderate-to-conservative voice on the liberal and activist Warren Court, although he joined in many of that Court's rulings. His votes in cases involving segregation confirmed the fears of southerners. He joined the Court's unanimous ruling in May 1955 that desegregation should begin at once and proceed "with all deliberate speed." He later voted to strike down segregation in public facilities. Indeed, he joined every opinion that invalidated state-supported segregation. In June 1958, Harlan spoke for a unanimous court in a decision reversing a fine of $100,000 imposed by the state of Alabama on the NAACP for refusing to turn over its membership lists (NAACP v. Alabama). Harlan's decision held that the right of free association was protected by the Constitution.

In his early years on the Court, Harlan often sided with the Court's more liberal members in opposing the government's position in loyalty and security cases, but he usually based his opinion on narrow, technical grounds, rather than the broad constitutional grounds espoused by HUGO BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS. As a result, he often spoke for the Court in these matters. In Cole v. Young (1956), for example, Harlan wrote the majority opinion that reversed the dismissal of a federal food and drug inspector. Harlan's carefully crafted opinion maintained that the Internal Security Act of 1950 authorized the dismissal of a government employee as a security risk only if he held a sensitive job.

Harlan also wrote for the majority in Yates v. U.S. (1957), which reversed the conviction of 14 leaders of the California Communist Party under the Smith Act. The decision ruled that the Smith Act did not outlaw advocacy of the forcible overthrow of the government as an abstract doctrine. It banned such advocacy only when it amounted to incitement to action. This ruling made convictions of communists under the law's conspiracy clause extremely difficult. That same month (June 1957), Harlan joined the majority in Watkins v. U.S. to reverse the contempt conviction of a witness who had refused to answer questions about former communist associates before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). Watkins held that the questions had to be in furtherance of a legitimate function of Congress, such as legislation. Congress had no authority to expose the private affairs of individuals for the sake of exposure.

After Watkins, however, Harlan generally took a more pro-government position in most loyalty and security cases. In June 1959, he wrote for a five-member majority to sustain the contempt conviction of a professor who had refused to answer the questions of a HUAC subcommittee about his Communist Party membership and activities. Harlan held that the committee had not violated the professor's right to academic freedom and had met the requirements established by Watkins in its questioning of the witness.

In general, Harlan agreed with FELIX FRANKFURTER, with whom he developed a close personal as well as intellectual affinity, that the Court should play a limited role in the federal system. He argued that justices should exercise restraint. Social ills, he maintained, should be remedied through the political process and not through the courts. In Reynolds v. Simms (1964), he explicitly rejected the belief that "every major social ill in the country can find its cure in some constitutional 'principle.'" Further, he was concerned to maintain "the delicate balance of federal state relations," which he regarded as a "bulwark of freedom." In addition to his commitment to federalism, he believed in proceduralism. Harlan accepted that courts should follow precedent unless a compelling argument could be made that a past case had been decided in error.

In federal criminal cases, Harlan was willing to reverse convictions if the defendant had not been afforded proper procedural rights. He gave greater leeway to the states, however, and was inclined to accept state criminal procedures as constitutional, so long as they were "fundamentally fair." Harlan opposed the doctrine of "incorporation," which maintained that, under the Fourteenth Amendment, the states had to give defendants all the guarantees included in the Bill of Rights. In Griffin v. Illinois (1956), he dissented when the majority held that states must supply an indigent convicted person with a free trial transcript, even though the right of appeal in Illinois depended on having such a transcript.

Harlan also insisted that the Constitution placed differing limits on state and federal power to regulate obscenity. In a separate opinion in June 1957, he maintained that states had greater authority to regulate pornography than the federal government (see Roth v. U.S. [1957] and Alberts v. California [1957]).

After Frankfurter's retirement in 1962, Harlan became the Court's leading advocate of judicial restraint. Facing the emergence of a solid, liberal activist majority in the 1960s, Harlan frequently dissented. He dissented in the Court's decisions on reapportionment (Baker v. Carr [1962] and Reynolds v. Simms [1964]). Harlan also dissented in decisions invalidating Virginia's poll tax and upholding the power of Congress to grant suffrage to 18-year-olds. In addition, he departed from the majority in many of the cases regarding the rights of those accused of crimes. Harlan entered a vigorous dissent in Miranda v. Arizona (1966), which established rules for informing individuals of their rights when taken into police custody. Nevertheless, Harlan joined in many of the Warren Court's most famous decisions. He concurred in Gideon v. Wainwright (1962), which granted accused felons the right to counsel. Harlan also joined decisions that prohibited organized prayer in public schools (Engel v. Vitale [1962] and Abington School District v. Schempp [1963]) and voted with the majority to strike down Connecticut's law criminalizing the sale of contraceptives in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965).

Harlan retired in September 1971 because of ill health and died in Washington on December 29, 1971. Even Harlan's critics admired his legal learning and craft as well as his intellectual integrity. His carefully drawn opinions clearly set forth the issues in the case and the reasons for his judgment. Much as he had been a "lawyer's lawyer" in private practice, he was a "lawyer's judge" on the Court.

Harlow, Bryce N(athaniel)

(1916–1987) special assistant to the president, deputy assistant to the president

Bryce Harlow was born on August 11, 1916, in Oklahoma City. After graduating from the University of Oklahoma in 1936 with a Phi Beta Kappa key, he entered graduate school in government at the University of Texas. After a year, he returned to Oklahoma City, enrolled in the M.A. program in government at the University of Oklahoma, and worked at Harlow Publishing Company, the family business. Harlow went to Washington, D.C., in 1938 as assistant librarian of the House of Representatives. In 1940, he took a position on the staff of Congressman Wesley E. Disney (D-Okla.) and joined the army reserve. In July 1941, Harlow was placed on active duty as an officer in the public information office of Army Chief of Staff Gen. George C. Marshall. When Marshall formed a congressional relations division in early 1942, he chose Brig. Gen. WILTON B. PERSONS to head it, and Harlow joined Persons's staff. That same year, Harlow received his masters degree. After rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel, he left the military and in 1947 took a job on the staff of the House Armed Services Committee. He became chief clerk to the Armed Services Committee, but left Washington in 1951 to take a position as vice president of Harlow Publishing Company.

Harlow played a minor role in Eisenhower's campaign in Oklahoma and in 1953 accepted a position with the White House congressional liaison office, which was headed by Persons. Harlow's knowledge of the legislative process, his political instincts, and his personal popularity made him an effective lobbyist for the administration's legislative agenda. Harlow enjoyed good and productive working relationships with the powerful Democratic congressional leaders, SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), who became Speaker of the House after the Democrats took control in the elections of 1954, and LYNDON JOHNSON (D-Tex.), who became the majority leader in the Senate.

Harlow occupied a series of positions during Eisenhower's two terms. Early in the first administration, in addition to his work with Congress, Harlow became the president's chief speech writer. He also assumed the responsibility as liaison between the president and the various agencies and departments of the executive branch. In his various capacities, Harlow participated in discussions of policy regarding defense, science, and foreign affairs, as well as most domestic matters. When Persons succeeded SHERMAN ADAMS as chief of staff in September 1958, Harlow replaced Persons as head of the congressional liaison office.

One of the more liberal members of the White House staff, he was one of a group of presidential aides who urged the president to confront Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) more publicly. Harlow was also one of the more forceful advocates of black civil rights within the administration. He wrote the draft of Eisenhower's speech condemning the rioting that broke out in Little Rock, Ark., when black students, pursuant to a court order, attended Central High School. After a tour of the South and Southwest in the summer of 1958, he urged Eisenhower to take a strong public stand in favor of school desegregation.

After leaving the White House in January 1961, Harlow became a director of governmental relations for Procter & Gamble Company. Harlow supported RICHARD M. NIXON for the presidency in 1968, and, when Nixon won, he named Harlow assistant to the president for legislative and congressional affairs. By the end of Nixon's first year in office, Harlow was elevated to counselor to the president with cabinet rank. In his new position, Harlow no longer had responsibility for operational duties with Congress, but he retained overall responsibility for congressional relations. Harlow proved less effective than he had been in the 1950s, in part because of the strained relations between Nixon and the Democratic Congress. Harlow resigned in December 1970 and left the White House in 1971 to become a vice president of Procter & Gamble. Nixon called Harlow back to the White House in the spring of 1973 to deal with the burgeoning Watergate scandal. Given the circumstances, Harlow maintained congressional relations about as well as could be expected. He left the White House in 1974 and returned to Procter & Gamble. Harlow served as a consultant for President GERALD FORD and as strategist for Ford's unsuccessful campaign for reelection in 1976. In 1978, Harlow retired from Procter & Gamble and moved to Harpers Ferry, W.Va., where he lived until his death in Arlington, Va., on February 17, 1987.

Harriman, W(illiam) Averell (1891–1986) governor of New York

A son of Edward Henry Harriman, a financier and railroad magnate, Averell Harriman was born in New York City on November 15, 1891. Upon E. H. Harriman's death in 1909, Averell inherited an enormous fortune. At Groton and then Yale, where he received his B.A. in 1913, Harriman was an undistinguished student but an outstanding athlete. While a senior at Yale, Harriman was elected to the board of directors of the Union Pacific. After graduating, he went to work for the Union Pacific and became a vice president a year later. Anxious to make a name for himself independent of his father, he bought a rundown shipyard in 1917 and left the railroad to direct it. After World War I, Harriman expanded his interests and presided over the creation of one of the largest merchant fleets in the world. He also formed the investment house of W. A. Harriman and Company in 1919 and joined with his brother to found a private bank, Harriman Brothers & Company, in 1920. The two financial concerns merged with Brown Brothers in 1931 to form Brown Brothers Harriman & Company. In 1932, Harriman returned to railroading as chairman of the board of the Union Pacific.

Although initially a Republican, Harriman switched parties in 1928. Harriman supported Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, and in 1934 Roosevelt appointed Harriman state chairman of the National Recovery Administration (NRA). Harriman later became the agency's special assistant administrator, and when Roosevelt dismissed the NRA's head, Hugh Johnson, Harriman ran the organization until the Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional in 1935. Harriman also served as a member of the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce and its chair from 1937 to 1940. When World War II broke out in Europe, Harriman sought a post in Washington. In early 1941, Harriman became chief of the materials branch of the production division of the Office of Production Management. With the passage of lend-lease legislation in March 1941, Harriman was sent to London to facilitate the disbursement of lend-lease aid to Britain. When the Soviet Union entered the war, Harriman oversaw lend-lease aid to the USSR. Harriman served as ambassador to the Soviet Union from 1943 to 1946. After the death of presidential adviser Harry Hopkins, however, Harriman's influence declined. He served as ambassador to Great Britain from March to September 1946, when Truman named him to replace Henry A. Wallace as secretary of commerce. Harriman held that position until 1948. He then served as director of economic aid to Europe under the Marshall Plan from 1948 to 1953. In 1951, Truman named Harriman as director of the Mutual Security Administration, a post he also held until 1953.

As the Truman administration wound down, Harriman turned his attention to winning elective office. He sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952. A supporter of the New Deal and Fair Deal, he drew strong support from liberals, but he finished fourth on the first two ballots at the Democratic convention, upon which Harriman withdrew from the race. Two years later, Harriman ran for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in New York. With the aid of CARMINE DESAPIO, the boss of New York City's Tammany Hall, Harriman defeated Rep. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., for the Democratic nomination. With respect to substantive differences on policy, very little separated Harriman from his opponent in the general election, Sen. IRVING M. IVES, a liberal Republican. Ultimately, Harriman narrowly defeated Ives.

In response to the state's financial difficulties, Harriman instituted an austerity program, which was predictably unpopular. Harriman was nonetheless proud of his record as governor, pointing to programs to aid the elderly, an increase of 77 percent in state aid to education, a substantial increase in regents' scholarships, and increased benefits to workers. Even many of his supporters, however, considered the governor's accomplishments as modest, at best. Republican control of the legislature certainly limited what Harriman could accomplish. Harriman compounded his problems, however, with his own political ineptitude and his preoccupation with capturing the Democratic presidential nomination in 1956. In pursuit of the nomination, he continually attacked the foreign and domestic policies of the Eisenhower administration. Hoping to win the support of northern liberals, labor, and big cities, he staked out a position on the party's left wing, particularly with respect to civil rights for African Americans. Harriman thus encountered strong opposition from conservatives in the party as well as the powerful southern bloc. Neither Harriman nor Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) could prevent ADLAI STEVENSON from winning the nomination for a second time.

Even after his defeat and despite his own rather advanced age, Harriman continued to nurture hopes of capturing the nomination in 1960. The first important step was his reelection as governor in 1958. A series of political defeats, however, diminished his chances. Liberals and reformers in the Democratic Party hoped to nominate either former Air Force Secretary THOMAS FINLETTER or Atomic Energy Commissioner Thomas Murray (Harriman's choice) for the U.S. Senate in 1958. DeSapio supported FRANK HOGAN, the district attorney of Manhattan, and DeSapio dominated the Democratic state convention, which dutifully nominated Hogan. This not only weakened Harriman, but it left both Hogan and Harriman, who was running for reelection that year, vulnerable to charges that the Democratic Party was boss-dominated. Further, Harriman faced a formidable opponent in NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER, the grandson of John D. Rockefeller, a liberal Republican, and a dynamic campaigner. Rockefeller defeated Harriman decisively. Harriman announced that he no longer entertained any political ambitions.

Harriman supported JOHN F. KENNEDY for the Democratic nomination in 1960 and served as a foreign policy adviser to the candidate. After the election, Kennedy, concerned about Harriman's age and slight deafness, hesitated to appoint the former ambassador to a position in government. Ultimately, Harriman accepted a position as ambassador-at-large. Kennedy then named Harriman assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs (1961-63). Harriman negotiated the neutralization of Laos in 1962. Harriman became undersecretary of state for political affairs in 1963 and that same year headed the American team that negotiated the nuclear test ban treaty. After the assassination of Kennedy, Harriman stayed on with the Johnson administration. In 1965, at his own request, his title reverted to ambassador-at-large. Johnson placed him in charge of the American effort to initiate talks to end the war in Vietnam. In 1968 he headed the United States delegation at the Paris peace talks. Although initially a hawk, Harriman pressed for an accommodation. When RICHARD M. NIXON became president, he replaced Harriman, who subsequently publicly advocated a complete American withdrawal. Harriman vigorously criticized the invasion of Cambodia in 1970 and in 1971 urged Congress to use its power to end the conflict.

His public career ended, Harriman continued to demonstrate an interest in foreign affairs. In 1982, he donated $10 million to the Russian Institute at Columbia University to promote American studies of the Soviet Union. He said that he did so because Soviet studies had declined in recent years, and that ignorance of the Soviet Union was “very dangerous.” In June 1983, Harriman went to Moscow to meet with the Soviet leader, Uri V. Andropov. Harriman died at his home in Yorktown Heights, N.Y., on July 26, 1986.

Harris, Oren

(1903–1997) U.S. congressman; chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee

Born in Belton, Ark., on December 20, 1903, Oren Harris grew up in southern Arkansas. He graduated from Henderson-Brown College in 1929, and, after receiving his LL.B. from Cumberland University in 1930, he set up practice in El Dorado, Ark., a town whose economy was closely tied to the region's oil and natural gas industries. He was deputy prosecuting attorney of Union Co. from 1933 to 1936 and prosecuting attorney of the 13th judicial circuit from 1937 to 1940. In 1940, Harris won election as a Democrat to the U.S. House of Representatives. In 1952, he chaired a special House Commerce Committee investigation of television programs. Four years later, Harris acquired a 25 percent interest in an El Dorado TV station.

Like most of his southern colleagues, Harris usually voted as a Democrat but always supported his sectional interests. He opposed the Saint Lawrence Seaway project in May 1954 and an increase in the minimum wage in July 1955. He favored the Eisenhower administration's requests for foreign aid appropriations. Harris, who enjoyed close links to House Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), tended to vote with the majority of his fellow Democrats through the 1950s. However, he generally opposed consumer legislation and civil rights measures. In 1956, Harris joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the “Southern Manifesto,” which called for defiance of the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education.

Through much of his House career, Harris closely identified himself with efforts to deregulate the oil and natural gas industry. Early in 1955, he and Sen. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.) proposed a measure that would have exempted independent producers and gatherers of natural gas from the regulatory authority of the Federal Power Commission. Its waiver of price controls aroused determined opposition from Northern urban and consumer groups. Yet the legislation enjoyed support from the White House and southern Democrats, and it passed both houses. In February 1956, however, Eisenhower reluctantly vetoed the bill following the attempted bribery of Sen. Frances Case (R-S.Dak.) by a gas producer. Harris unsuccessfully resubmitted his natural gas bill in the 85th Congress.

Assuming the chairmanship of the House Commerce Committee in January 1957, Harris became embroiled in an investigation of the federal regulatory agencies. At the urging of Speaker Rayburn, the House agreed in 1957 to establish a Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight to examine the actions of the independent commissions. Harris initially showed little interest in a detailed, critical inquiry because of his connections with the gas and TV industries. Instead, he selected the chairman, Rep. Morgan Moulder (D-Mo.), and chief counsel, BERNARD SCHWARTZ, because he considered them “safe,” cautious inquisitors. Just in case they proved otherwise, Harris attended the subcommittee sessions as an ex officio member.

Schwartz, however, quickly upset Harris's well-laid plans. In leaks and official statements to the press in early 1958, Schwartz made detailed charges implicating high administration figures in conflicts of interest. Harris first tried to discredit Schwartz. He suggested to reporters that the counsel had, like some of those he accused, overbilled the government on expenses. When that tactic failed, Harris persuaded the subcommittee to dismiss Schwartz and had his papers seized. Moulder thereupon resigned in protest, and Harris made himself chairman.

Schwartz's charges, however, appeared too serious to be dismissed outright. Subpoenaed as a witness, he elaborated on cases he had made against two members of the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), RICHARD MACK and JOHN DOERFER, and the president's chief aide, SHERMAN ADAMS. Aware of the extensive news coverage Schwartz's testimony had received, Rayburn demanded that Harris pursue the allegations. Harris dutifully pledged “the most thorough investigation Capitol Hill has ever seen.” Following hearings in March 1958, Harris demanded and secured Mack's dismissal. (As a result of the probe, Doerfer resigned in 1960.)

In the summer of 1958, Harris's panel pursued rumors that Sherman Adams had interceded with the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission on behalf of BERNARD GOLDFINE, who had given him gifts. Adams initially invoked "executive privilege" and refused to honor subpoenas issued by the House. But he soon relented and testified in June. To his detractors' surprise, Harris asked the key, incriminating questions. Adams acknowledged that he might have acted "more prudently" in inquiring of federal agencies about matters involving Goldfine. However, he said that it was "unwarranted and unfair" to charge that he had secured favored treatment for Goldfine from the agencies. Adams was forced to resign in September.

Another sensational offshoot of the Legislative Oversight Panel's labors was its probe of the TV industry. Under its authority to investigate the FCC, the Harris subcommittee took testimony in the fall of 1959 from quiz show participants which revealed that the programs had been rigged. The extension of the inquiry into 1960 added to the mounting pressure on broadcasters for greater self-regulation.

During the 1960s, Harris favored less government regulation by independent commissions and occasionally clashed with the Kennedy and Johnson administrations over the issue. In July 1965, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON named Harris U.S. judge of the Eastern and Western Arkansas District, a post he had long coveted. He assumed office in February 1966. Harris died in Little Rock, Ark., on February 5, 1997.

Harris, Reed

(1909–1982) deputy administrator, International Information Administration

Reed Harris was born on November 5, 1909, in New York City. After attending a military academy in Virginia, Harris entered Columbia University in 1928. He became editor of the school newspaper, the Spectator, which, under his direction, made a radical departure from its former conservative tradition. The paper attacked the "semi-professionalism" of the university's football team and supported a group of Columbia sociology students on a fact-finding mission in the Kentucky coal-mining region. His criticism of the university's food services prompted the college dean to expel him for a "long series of discourtesies, innuendos, and misrepresentations." Harris's case became a cause célèbre for liberals and journalists across America. The uproar over his expulsion compelled the university authorities to reinstate him, but he afterward dropped out of Columbia. Harris later summarized his views on college sports in his book, King Football (1932). In 1931, Harris turned to freelance journalism, working for the New York Times and the New York Evening Journal. In 1934, he became assistant director of the Federal Writers's Projects and executive editor for the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. Harris briefly left government service in 1938 and went to work at Robbins Travel House as a travel-book editor. He returned to the government as an administrative officer for the National Emergency Council in 1939. During World War II, Harris worked for the Office of War Information (OWI) from 1942 until he volunteered for the air force in 1944. Upon his separation from the service, he returned to the OWI, which was then being transferred to the State Department.

From 1950 to 1953, Harris served as deputy administrator of the International Information Administration. While at that post, he became embroiled in a dispute over the decision of the Voice of America (VOA) to discontinue Hebrew broadcasts to Israel. The move had been made for budgetary reasons. Nevertheless, before the order was issued, staff members asked Harris if the decision had been considered in the light of growing communist anti-Semitism, a theme they hoped to exploit in the broadcasts. The decision was confirmed and the order issued in December 1952. However, as a result of opposition from Sidney Glazer, chief of the Hebrew Service of the VOA, Gerald Dooher, acting chief of the South Asian and African Near East Service, and various members of Congress, the State Department reversed the decision.

In February 1953, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, chaired by Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), held hearings on Harris's decision. Using Dooher's testimony, McCarthy implied that Harris had aided the communists through his action. The chairman asked Dooher if he thought that “if Harris’s order had been followed, [he] would have been performing a great service to the communist cause?” McCarthy later asked Dooher if he felt this action would have been the same “if [Harris] had been representing Joe Stalin.” In both cases Dooher answered yes. Harris testified that the decision was made by a board, which concluded that there were more effective ways of communicating with the Israeli people.

McCarthy also questioned Harris on his college record and his book, King Football, which, in addition to its attack on the professionalization and commercialization of college football, contained a defense of academic freedom that included support for the right of communists to teach. Further, Harris had been listed as a sponsor of a dinner for the communist-dominated American Student Union in 1937. Harris frankly acknowledged his youthful affiliations (including membership in the socialist Student League for Industrial Democracy), swore that he had never been a communist, and declared that he had long since disavowed such radical beliefs. Harris countercharged that McCarthy was using “unfair tactics” by raising his activities in college and affiliations from many years before. McCarthy refused to accept Harris’s political maturation and pressed on. Harris angrily responded that he resented “the tone of this inquiry very much, Mr. Chairman,” because “it is my neck, my public neck, that you are, I think, very skillfully trying to wring.” The comment got considerable play in the media.

Harris resigned his post in April 1953. McCarthy called his departure “the best thing that has happened there in a very long time.” Harris then founded Publications Services Inc., a firm used by agencies for processing information. EDWARD R. MURROW made Harris his executive assistant at the United States Information Agency in 1961. Harris died of a heart attack in Washington, D.C., on October 15, 1982.

Harris, Seymour E(dwain)

(1897–1974) economist

Harris was born on September 8, 1897 in New York City. Following his graduation from Harvard University in 1920, Harris taught economics at Princeton. He returned to Harvard in 1922 as a graduate student and instructor. He obtained a doctorate there in 1926. Harris then joined the faculty at Harvard and rose through the academic ranks, becoming a professor in 1945. His early work met with mixed reviews; critics pointed to a lack of clarity and poor organization that characterized Harris’s books. During World War II, he served as a member of the Board of Economic Warfare in 1942 and worked for the Office of Price Administration from 1942 to 1943. Harris also advised several Latin American governments on fiscal matters.

During the postwar period, Harris served on the advisory boards of several government commissions and wrote two books, both published in 1947: National Debt and the New Economic Policy and The New Economics. Both expounded Keynesian economic theory. Harris also became interested in the problems of financing higher education. He recommended that college costs be borne primarily by tuition payments rather than tax dollars. In the 1950s, Harris showed great concern about New England’s declining textile industry. He denounced reduced tariffs on Japanese textile imports in 1954 and urged greater government-labor cooperation to solve the problems of the region. In 1955, Harris became chair of the economics department at Harvard.

In 1952, Harris served as an adviser to Democratic candidate ADLAI STEVENSON, who had been his student at Princeton. Following his defeat, Stevenson made Harris his fiscal policy adviser in preparation for a political comeback. From 1953 to 1956, Harris was a member of an informal advisory panel, known as the “Finletter Group,” which met regularly to discuss issues and suggest positions the Democrats should take.

During the Eisenhower administration, Harris was often called to testify before congressional committees on fiscal policy. He opposed the Republicans’ emphasis on a balanced budget at the expense of full employment and government services. Harris also maintained that the president’s policies put “excessive burdens on state and local governments.” He did, however, support reductions in the defense budget.

After Stevenson was defeated for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960, Harris became an adviser to JOHN F. KENNEDY. When Kennedy became president, Harris was named chair of a panel of economic advisers that met weekly with the secretary of the treasury. After Kennedy was assassinated, Harris published Economics of the Kennedy Years and a Look Ahead (1964), in which he credited Kennedy for the economic recovery of the early 1960s.

Harris left Harvard in 1963 to become chair of the economics department at the University of California, San Diego. He also served as an economic consultant to President LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Harris died in San Diego on October 27, 1974.

Harrison, William K(elly), Jr.

(1895–1987) senior United Nations delegate

A direct descendant of President William Henry Harrison, William K. Harrison Jr. was born in Washington, D.C., on September 7, 1895. He graduated from West Point and served in France during World War I. After the war, Harrison remained in Europe, where he learned French and Spanish. He returned to the United States in 1920 to teach at West Point. Over the next 20 years, he served in various assignments in the United States and the Philippines, rising steadily in rank; by 1942, he held the temporary rank of brigadier general. During World War II, he commanded infantry in Europe and later served under Gen. Douglas MacArthur with the occupation troops in Japan. Harrison worked in the office of the chief of staff during 1949 and 1950. In January 1952, Gen. MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY placed Harrison, then deputy commander of the Eighth Army in Korea, on the Korean armistice delegation under the UN command. Harrison became chief UN delegate to the Korean truce negotiations in May 1952.

By the time Harrison took command of the delegation, only the issue of the repatriation of prisoners of war (POWs) blocked the signing of an agreement. The UN forces refused to repatriate prisoners who did not want to return to North Korea or Communist China. The communists, in turn, demanded the return of all prisoners and claimed they would use force if necessary to secure them.

In early 1952, the United Nations Command (UNC) altered its position from “voluntary repatriation” to “no forced repatriation.” In March, the communists offered to drop their demand for the return of 38,000 civilian internees if the UNC would cease its demand for an accounting of the 52,000 UN prisoners the communists had classified as “sent home” or “released at the front.” The Chinese then proposed that, in order to determine how many prisoners would accept repatriation willingly, new lists be prepared. Most of the prisoners held by the United Nations were interned at Koje Island (Geoje-do), where a series of clashes between prisoners (whom the North Koreans continued to regard as combatants) and guards had taken place. During an attempt at screening, riots broke out followed by an attempted mass escape. In order to restore order, the UN forces had to open fire, resulting in the wounding and killing of some prisoners. The Chinese accused the UN of a “bloody yet cowardly massacre.” On July 8, the communists offered an armistice if the UNC would forcibly repatriate all Chinese POWs. Five days later, the UNC announced the result of the screening. Of 132,000 North Korean prisoners and pro-communist South Korean internees, 76,600 demanded repatriation. Only 6,400 out of 20,800 Chinese prisoners of war chose to return to Communist China. Presentation of these results led to new heights of vituperation from the communist delegates. Meanwhile, the UN forces released 38,000 South Korean civilian internees. In an effort to offer a face-saving solution to the Communists, Harrison proposed that the 38,000 civilian internees be counted, so that the Communists could claim that 121,000 communist POWs had been released. The Communists rejected that proposal.

In September, Harrison presented three alternative proposals, “any one of which [would] lead to an armistice.” The first would have allowed all non-repatriated prisoners, after identification in the demilitarized zone, to have the right to return to their captors. The second would have provided for all prisoners who opted against repatriation to be interviewed by neutral representatives in the demilitarized zone and to be allowed to choose the side to which they would go. The third would have placed all non-repatriated prisoners in the DMZ without any screening and allow them to go the side of their choice. The Chinese rejected the offer, and Harrison unilaterally recessed the plenary meeting.

In early 1953, the Communists proposed sending all non-repatriated prisoners to a neutral state within three months of the signing of a truce. For six months after that, agents of various combatant governments would be able to attempt to persuade prisoners to return to their native lands. After the end of six months, all remaining prisoners who refused repatriation would remain in custody of the neutral state until a postwar conference decided their fates. Harrison rejected the plan.

The talks produced some results in early April, when the two sides managed to negotiate an exchange of sick and wounded prisoners that took place at the end of April and early May. On May 7, the Communists proposed that a repatriation commission be formed of neutral nations (Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland, and India), each of which would provide equal numbers of armed personnel. That commission would take custody of non-repatriates in Korea, after which agents of the countries to which the prisoners declined to be repatriated would have four months to persuade the prisoners to come home, and the ultimate fate of the prisoners would be determined by a postwar conference. Speaking for the United Nations command, Harrison rejected the proposals, but he made a counterproposal on May 13. It provided that all Korean prisoners be released to civilian status on the signing of an armistice. Chinese and North Korean prisoners who declined repatriation would be turned over to a supervisory commission of neutral nations, the custodial forces and chair of which would be Indian. After 60 days, during which the Chinese and North Korean governments could try to convince them to return home, all non-repatriates would be granted civilian status (and therefore freedom). The Communists rejected the offer the day after it was made.

In late May, the United States, after consultation with its allies, devised a set of final proposals. They provided for the transfer of all prisoners to the supervisory commission of neutral nations, which would have an Indian chair and Indian custodial forces. An initial period of 60 days would allow for the repatriation of those who wished; those who did not wish to return home would have 90 or 120 days to "explain," after which they would either be released as civilians or have their cases referred to the General Assembly. At the same time, in a message conveyed to China through the Indian government, the new administration in Washington hinted darkly at the possible use of nuclear weapons if the final offer were rejected.

On June 4, the Communists accepted the final plan with some minor changes. The Communists refused to accept the General Assembly as custodian on the ground that the UN was a belligerent. The agreement allowed two months for repatriation. After which, governments would have 90 days to persuade their nationals among remaining prisoners to return home. Then, a postwar conference would attempt to agree on the final disposition of the non-repatriates. If the conference could not agree after 30 days, prisoners who so desired would be sent to a neutral country, supervised by the Indian Red Cross or the supervisory commission of neutral nations.

Syngman Rhee, the South Korean president, opposed the repatriation agreement, and on June 18 ordered the release of 25,000 anticommunist Korean POWs. Following some stern admonitions from the United States, Rhee agreed to release no more prisoners. The armistice was signed on July 27, 1953. Harrison and Gen. MARK CLARK signed for the United States.

After signing the agreement, Harrison returned to military duty. In April 1954, he was named commander of the new Army Caribbean Forces. He retired in February 1957. Harrison was a Baptist lay evangelist and often preached at army religious services. A month after he retired, he became director of the Evangelical (Child) Welfare Agency. He held that position for three years and then moved to Largo, Fla., and later to Springfield, Pa. Harrison again emerged in the public eye during the presidential campaign of 1960. He attended a meeting in September that questioned whether a Catholic, such as Democratic presidential candidate JOHN F. KENNEDY, should be president because he might be the target of pressure from the Pope. Harrison died in a nursing home in Bryn Mawr, Pa., on May 25, 1987.

Hart, Philip A(loysius)(1912–1976) U.S. senator

Born into an Irish-Catholic family on December 10, 1912, in Bryn Mawr, Pa., Philip Hart was the son of a former landscape gardener who had worked his way up to the presidency of a small bank in suburban Philadelphia. Hart attended private schools and Georgetown University, where he roomed with the son of Walter O. Briggs, the Detroit auto-parts millionaire and owner of the Detroit Tigers baseball team. Hart graduated in 1934 and subsequently married his roommate's sister, who inherited a portion of the family's $100 million fortune. He received his law degree from the University of Michigan in 1937, was admitted to the Michigan bar in 1938, and commenced the practice of law in Detroit. He served in the army from 1941 to 1946, during which time he was wounded in the D-day assault on Utah Beach. Upon his discharge with the rank of lieutenant colonel, he resumed his law practice.

While in law school, Hart had befriended G. MENNEN ("Soapy") WILLIAMS, the heir to the Mennen toiletry fortune and an enthusiastic supporter of the New Deal. In 1948, Williams fashioned an alliance of Democratic liberals and organized labor, which carried him to the governorship. During this period, Williams steadily promoted Hart's political career, appointing him state corporation and securities commissioner in 1949. Hart served as state director of the Office of Price Stabilization from 1951 to 1952. In the latter year, he was named U.S. district attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan. In that post, he secured the conviction of six Michigan communist leaders for conspiracy to teach or advocate the violent overthrow of the government. In 1953, Hart became Williams's legal counsel and the following year made a successful bid for lieutenant governor. His reelection in 1956 made him the first Democrat to serve two terms in this office. In 1958, Hart was Williams's choice for the Senate nomination. Campaigning in favor of civil rights and tax reform, and with the strong backing of the state's labor unions, he beat the Republican incumbent, CHARLES E. POTTER, with 53 percent of the vote.

As a freshman senator, Hart quickly earned a reputation as one of the most liberal members of the upper house. During the opening days of the session in 1959, he joined a group of liberal insurgents in an unsuccessful attempt to ease Senate Rule 22—the so-called filibuster rule requiring the vote of two-thirds of the entire Senate membership to shut off debate—as a prelude to the enactment of civil rights legislation. Hart also took a firm stand against political censorship of the arts. When the American National Exhibition in Moscow was criticized because it included the works of artists who had been associated with alleged communist-front organizations, Hart declared that "it is the Soviet Union which has lost face by attempting political censorship of its artists. We do not want to get ourselves into that situation."

In January 1960, Hart was one of about a dozen liberal insurgents who organized a challenge to Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON in the Senate Democratic Conference. Hart supported a motion aimed at stripping Johnson of his power to appoint members of the Democratic Policy Committee, which scheduled legislation for floor action, by making it an elective body. He also voted against a motion confirming Johnson's power to fill vacancies on the Democratic Steering Committee, which made Democratic committee assignments. The reformers were defeated on both issues.

In the 1960s, Hart became a highly effective leader of the Democratic liberal bloc in the Senate, particularly on civil rights, antitrust, and consumer issues. During the Nixon administration, Hart's firm stands in favor of busing and handgun control aroused some of his constituents to mount unsuccessful recall campaigns in 1971 and 1972. Hart also opposed Nixon's nominations of CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH and G. Harold Carswell to the Supreme Court. After being diagnosed with cancer, Hart did not seek reelection in 1976. He succumbed to the disease on December 26, 1976, in Washington, D.C., as he neared the end of his third term in the Senate.

Hauge, Gabriel(1914–1981) administrative assistant to the president for domestic and economic affairs, special assistant to the president for economic affairs

The son of a Lutheran minister, Gabriel Hauge was born in Hawley, Minn., on March 7, 1914. He attended public schools and Concordia College, from which he graduated in 1935. He earned an M.A. from Harvard University three years later and taught economics as a lecturer at Harvard for two years before taking a similar position at Princeton University. Hauge entered the navy during World War II, serving as an officer on battleships in the Pacific. After the war, he returned to Harvard and earned his doctorate in economics in 1947. That same year, Hauge became chief of the Division of Research and Statistics at the New York State Banking Commission. He took time off from that job to serve as economic adviser to the Republican presidential nominee, THOMAS E. DEWEY, in 1948. Hauge left the banking commission in 1950 to accept a position as the assistant chairman of the executive committee at McGraw-Hill Publishing Company and an editor of Business Week.

In late 1951, Hauge joined "Citizens for Eisenhower," an exploratory committee hoping to persuade the general to run for the Republican nomination, and served as its research director. In June 1952, he became research director for the Eisenhower campaign. Hauge soon emerged as one of Eisenhower's principal speech writers. One of the more liberal members of the campaign staff, Hauge urged the candidate to distance himself from Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.).

When Eisenhower won the election, Hauge joined the White House staff as Eisenhower's personal economic adviser. Officially, his title was administrative assistant to the president for economic affairs from 1953 to 1956, and special assistant to the president for economic affairs from 1956 to 1958. Soon after the inauguration, Hauge, along with ARTHUR FLEMMING and James Brownlee, developed a plan for dismantling all government price controls. The plan would have ended controls gradually and on a commodity-by-commodity basis. Eisenhower, however, moved more swiftly to end deregulation, and by the end of February 1953, all controls had been lifted.

Hauge explained and defended the administration's policies to groups of business leaders and economists. He sometimes drafted speeches for the president. In all, he emerged as a highly influential figure within the administration. Hauge advocated a role for the government in restraining inflation and in stimulating the economy to prevent depressions. At the same time, he generally opposed government planning, price fixing, wage control, and rationing (except in time of war). Hauge frequently sided with ARTHUR BURNS, the chief of the Council of Economic Advisers, against Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY's insistence on balanced budgets. In general, the position of Hauge and Burns prevailed. For example, Hauge encouraged Eisenhower's view that construction of the interstate highway system could be used as a counter-recessionary measure. On the other hand, Hauge opposed the federal operation of the Hells Canyon Dam as an unwarranted interference with the private sector.

In spite of Eisenhower's high regard for Hauge, the latter's positions did not always persuade the president. In 1955, Eisenhower rejected a plan by Hauge and Burns for aid to depressed areas. Three years later, Eisenhower decided against a tax cut proposed by Hauge as an emergency antirecession measure. The new secretary of the treasury, ROBERT ANDERSON, opposed the measure, and, in this instance, his counsel prevailed.

Hauge left the government in 1958 to join Manufacturers Trust Company as chairman of its finance committee. In an unsuccessful effort to keep Hauge in the administration, Eisenhower offered him a post in the cabinet. Hauge nevertheless continued to consult with Eisenhower on economic policies. After Manufacturers Trust merged with Hanover Bank in 1961, Hauge became vice chairman of the board. In that capacity, and then as president after 1963, he led an ultimately successful legal battle against the Justice Department, which had challenged the merger. Hauge became chairman in 1971, a position he held until his retirement in 1979. During his stewardship, the bank's assets grew from $7.7 billion in 1966 to $55 billion in 1980. The same period saw the bank expand from 200 offices in New York City to more than 700 offices in the United States and over 100 offices in foreign countries.

Even after leaving Washington, Hauge continued publicly to advocate monetary restraint by the Federal Reserve and free movement of goods and investment among nations. Although he was considered for several positions in the administration of RICHARD M. NIXON, Hauge chose to remain at Manufacturers Hanover. Both GERALD R. FORD and Jimmy Carter consulted Hauge on economic matters. Hauge died in New York City on July 24, 1981.

Hayden, Carl T(rumbull)

(1877–1972) U.S. senator; chairman, Appropriations Committee

Hayden was born on October 2, 1877, in Hayden's Ferry (now Tempe), Ariz., a town founded by his father. He attended Stanford University from 1896 to 1900 but left before completing his degree to return to Tempe in order to help his ailing father run the family mercantile and flour-milling businesses. Hayden served on the town council from 1902 to 1904, as treasurer of Maricopa Co. from 1904 to 1906, and as sheriff of Maricopa Co. from 1907 to 1912. He won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1912 as Arizona's first, and only, member. He held that seat until he went into the Senate. In the House, he established himself as a significant figure regarding water reclamation and land-use issues. One of his most significant achievements was his sponsorship of legislation to establish the Grand Canyon National Park. The son of a suffragette, he introduced a joint resolution in favor of a woman-suffrage amendment, which failed. Hayden also supported organized labor. During World War I, he served as a major in the army. He won election to the Senate in 1926 and served until January 3, 1969.

As a senator, he made few speeches but wielded considerable influence because of his seniority and his effectiveness in legislative maneuvering. A champion of water and land reclamation projects, he exerted powerful influence on federal policy in those areas. His signature achievement was his sponsorship of the Central Arizona Project (CAP), a plan to divert water from the Colorado River to Arizona. In the early 1950s, a CAP bill passed the Senate but failed in the House. Hayden continued to press for the project until Congress finally passed the Colorado River Basin Project Act in 1968, which included the Colorado River project and other land reclamation projects. During 1951 and 1952, as chairman of the Rules Committee and then as a member of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, Hayden was involved in an investigation of the activities of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). The final report was critical of McCarthy's financial practices and denounced the Wisconsin senator's "disdain and contempt for the rules and wishes" of the Senate. Hayden also planned to demand that McCarthy either "stand aside" or be administered the oath of office "without prejudice" to further action by the Senate when the senator from Wisconsin presented himself to be sworn in at the beginning of the session in 1953. The plan collapsed when Republicans warned that if Hayden did so, they would ask DENNIS CHAVEZ (D-N.Mex.) to "stand aside" pending an investigation of his closely contested reelection, which was marked by charges of fraud and irregularities.

A party loyalist, Hayden supported the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt, HARRY S. TRUMAN, JOHN F. KENNEDY, and LYNDON B. JOHNSON. He consistently advocated federally supported highway construction and sponsored the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1934. He was a coauthor of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956, which called for the creation of over 42,000 miles of four-to-eight-lane, controlled-access roads linking major urban areas. On civil rights, however, he voted with the southern, conservative wing of the Democratic party. Hayden voted against legislation to eliminate the poll tax in 1948 and consistently refused to support ending southern filibusters against civil rights legislation.

Hayden was appointed to the Appropriations Committee his first term in the Senate and became its chairman in 1955, a post he held until 1969. In recognition of his long service, he was named dean of the Senate in 1957 and was president pro tempore of the Senate from the 1957 to 1969. In the 1960s, he moderated his opposition to civil rights legislation and supported the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, perhaps because of changing circumstances and perhaps because he was a party loyalist. He also supported Johnson on Medicare and issues relating to Social Security. In 1969, Hayden retired to Tempe. He died in Mesa, Ariz., on January 25, 1972.

Hayek, Friedrich August

(1899–1992) economist

Born Friedrich August von Hayek in Vienna, Austria, on May 8, 1899, Hayek took his doctorate in jurisprudence at the University of Vienna in 1921 and a second doctorate in 1923. Although he enrolled as a law student, his interests focused on economics and psychology. He did postgraduate work at New York University from 1923 to 1924. Initially a socialist, Hayek was profoundly influenced by the publication in 1922 of Ludwig von Mises's Die Gemeinwirtschaft, later translated into English as Socialism. Mises argued that, without a market, there was no way to establish the value of the means of production and, therefore, no way to determine their proper uses. Along with a group that included Oskar Morgenstern and Eric Voegelin, Hayek attended Mises's informal seminar, which was the focal point of economic study and thought in Vienna. From 1927 to 1931, Hayek was director of the Austrian Institute for Trade Cycle Research; during those same years, he was privatdozent at the University of Vienna. He became the Tooke professor of economic science and statistics at the London School of Economics and Political Science in 1931. In the 1930s, he emerged as one of the most lucid and trenchant critics of the economic theories of John Maynard Keynes. As Hayek observed the crisis in Central Europe evolve during the 1930s, he chose to become a British subject in 1938.

A fervent anti-Nazi as well as a critic of the trend towards social democracy he observed in Great Britain, Hayek published The Road to Serfdom in 1944. In it, he argued that government planning inherently led to the "suppression of freedom" and ultimately to "dictatorship." "Economic control," he maintained, "is not merely control of a sector of human life which can be separated from the rest; it is the control of the means of all our ends. And whoever has sole control of the means must also determine which ends are to be served." Thus, all collectivism inevitably led to totalitarianism, and democratic socialism was "unachievable." In place of government planning and control, Hayek advocated individualism and classical liberalism. At the same time, he denied that this meant laissez-faire. Rather, he proposed that "government in all its actions [should be] bound by rules fixed and announced beforehand." More restrained in his antistatism than Mises, Hayek accepted government activities designed to facilitate competition and thus allowed for sanitary regulations, minimum wage laws, limits on working hours, and even social insurance. In all cases, however, the purpose of government intervention had to be the preservation of competition, private initiative, and private property. The book's publication in Great Britain aroused some controversy; its appearance in America created a sensation. After three publishing houses in the United States rejected the book, the University of Chicago Press published an American edition, printing 2,000 copies. Within a week, the press ordered a second printing of 5,000 copies. The book received lavish praise and was also the subject of almost hysterical attacks. It became a Book-of-the-Month Club selection; Reader's Digest condensed it.

In 1950, Hayek left the London School for the Committee on Social Thought at the University of Chicago. Four years later, he edited Capitalism and the Historians, which attacked contemporary trends in the writing of British economic history. He rejected "the legend of the deterioration of the position of the working classes in consequence of the rise of 'capitalism.'" ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR., somewhat incongruously fulminated: "Americans, one would think, have enough trouble with home-grown McCarthys without importing Viennese professors to add academic luster to the process." Keith Hutchinson, in the Nation, charged the book with "whitewashing the Industrial Revolution."

If liberals could wax apoplectic about Hayek, the Austrian economist had serious reservations about the emerging conservative movement. In his book, The Constitution of Liberty (1960), Hayek included an essay titled "Postscript: Why I Am Not a Conservative," in which he distinguished his position from that of the European Right. He criticized conservatism for lacking a coherent set of principles and for its hostility to innovation. In addition, he cited what he saw as conservatism's willingness to use the state for its own purposes, even to the point of acquiescing in socialism. He reiterated his case for limited government, free markets, and the fixed, impartial rule of law.

Hayek left the University of Chicago in 1961 and returned to Germany. He lived in Freiburg and taught at the university there until 1975, when he became an emeritus professor. He won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1974. Even after his retirement, Hayek continued to write; he published The Fatal Conceit in 1988. He died in Freiburg in 1992.

Haynsworth, Clement Furman, Jr.

(1912–1989) judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit

The son of a lawyer, Clement F. Haynsworth was born in Greenville, S.C., on October 30, 1912. He graduated summa cum laude from Furman University, an institution founded by his great-grandfather, in 1933 and from Harvard Law School in 1936. Upon earning his law degree, he practiced law in the firm founded by his father and grandfather until he left to serve as a naval intelligence officer from 1942 to 1945. After the war, he returned to the family firm and became senior partner in 1946. The firm prospered under Haynsworth's leadership; it had a number of major corporate clients and became the largest law firm in South Carolina. Haynsworth served on numerous corporate boards. Increasingly disaffected from the national Democratic Party, Haynsworth supported Eisenhower in 1952 and again in 1956, although he was only mildly politically active. One of Haynsworth's friends and clients, Charles E. Daniel, owned a large construction company and had ties to the Eisenhower administration. In 1957 Eisenhower nominated Haynsworth to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. Sen. STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.) had opposed nominating Haynsworth. Thurmond wanted the seat for Robert McC. Figg, the dean of the University of South Carolina Law School, who had represented the Clarendon County school board in Brown v. Board of Education (1954). When it became apparent that the administration would not nominate Figg, Thurmond, apparently concerned that Haynsworth might not be sufficiently segregationist, aggressively advanced the candidacy of Alfred Burgess. Nevertheless, Haynsworth, who had no public record as a segregationist or an anti-segregationist, was nominated and confirmed. He was sworn in on April 5, 1957. When SIMON E. SOBEL-OFF reached the mandatory retirement age and took senior judge status in 1964, Haynsworth succeeded him as chief judge of the Fourth Circuit.

Throughout the late 1950s and early 1960s, Haynsworth consistently voted to end legal segregation. As the issue changed from desegregation to active efforts to promote integration, Haynsworth's votes took on a more conservative cast. He dissented from a ruling in 1962 that overturned a freedom of choice plan in Charlottesville, Va. In 1968, the Supreme Court reversed his decision upholding a freedom of choice plan for desegregation that allowed parents to choose their children's schools. On several other occasions, the Supreme Court overturned positions Haynsworth took on issues relating to desegregation. On the other hand, Haynsworth maintained his opposition to state supported segregation. He joined a unanimous decision in 1964 striking down the use of tax-financed state tuition grants to private, segregated schools and wrote a decision desegregating the North Carolina Dental Society.

RICHARD M. NIXON nominated Haynsworth to the Supreme Court in 1969. Civil rights groups attacked him as a segregationist, an irony given that much of the resistance to his nomination to the Fourth Circuit came from those who regarded him as insufficiently segregationist. Fred Graham, the Supreme Court reporter for the New York Times, wrote that those who attacked Haynsworth as a segregationist "seem to have overstated their case. He has never attempted to delay or thwart desegregation, but he has also never mustered . . . impatience and righteous indignation over the slow pace of desegregation." Supporters of organized labor attacked him as antilabor, identifying seven cases in which he had taken an antilabor position and had been reversed by the Supreme Court. Opponents also accused him of conflict of interest in a case involving Darlington Manufacturing Company because Haynsworth was part owner of a vending machine company that did business with Deering Milliken, the parent company of Darlington Manufacturing. Although Jerome Frank, perhaps the leading authority on when judges should recuse themselves, testified not only that Haynsworth had done nothing improper but that he had a duty to sit on the case, the charge of unethical behavior stuck. Despite the support of many prominent members of the legal community, including 16 past presidents of the American Bar Association, the Senate rejected Haynsworth by a vote of 55 to 45. Although he considered resigning from the Fourth Circuit after the Senate vote, Haynsworth ultimately remained on the bench. His subsequent performance on the court won widespread praise, even from some who voted against his nomination to the Supreme Court. He took senior judge status in 1981 and continued to serve on the Fourth Circuit until his death in Greenville on November 22, 1989.

Hays, (Lawrence) Brooks

Brooks Hays was born in London, Ark., on August 9, 1898. After graduating from the University of Arkansas in 1919 and George Washington University law school three years later, Brooks Hays opened a law practice in Russellville, Ark. He served in the army in 1918. Hays served as assistant state attorney general from 1925 to 1927 and ran unsuccessfully for governor in 1928 and 1930. After an unsuccessful run in a special election for congress in 1933, he was the National Recovery Administration's labor compliance officer for Arkansas in 1934 and assistant to the administrator for resettlement in 1935. From 1936 to 1942, he held various posts in the Farm Security Administration. Hays won election to the House of Representatives as a Democrat from Arkansas's fifth district, which included Little Rock, in 1942.

On Capitol Hill, Hays was one of a small group of southern moderates who often joined Northern Democrats in supporting social welfare legislation. In 1949 and 1950, he unsuccessfully urged the adoption of a compromise civil rights plan in place of Truman's proposal. In 1948, Truman called for a bill to outlaw lynching, measures against the poll tax, a compulsory Fair Employment Practices Commission (FEPC), an executive commission on civil rights, and the elevation of the civil rights section in the Justice Department to the status of a division. The following year, Hays proposed a compromise that won the support of several southern moderates. He called for a constitutional amendment to outlaw the poll tax, a modified antilynching law that would permit federal intervention only when local authorities failed to act, the abandonment of attempts to legislate against segregation in interstate transportation, and establishment of a counseling service in the Department of Labor as an alternative to a compulsory FEPC. Truman rejected the compromise. Hays also played a role in crafting the civil rights plank in the Democratic platform of 1952.

Assigned to the Foreign Affairs Committee in 1951, Hays was an internationalist on most policy issues. He voted for Eisenhower's foreign-aid bills in 1953 and 1954, and in 1957 he convinced the committee to support an extension of the administration's foreign-aid authorization from one to three years. He also approved the Eisenhower Doctrine in 1957, which gave the president the power to use force to assist Middle Eastern nations threatened by communist aggression. Hays was an outspoken champion of the UN, describing it as the world's best hope for peace. In 1955 he served as a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN General Assembly.

After the Supreme Court struck down segregated public schools in 1954, Hays, like every southern moderate, was caught in a difficult, if not untenable, position. In 1956, he reluctantly signed the "Southern Manifesto," which denounced the Supreme Court's decision as a "clear abuse of judicial power" and pledged to use all legal means to resist it. When, in September 1957, Gov. ORVAL FAUBUS used the Arkansas National Guard to prevent the court-ordered desegregation of Little Rock's Central High School, the judge whose orders had been defied asked the Justice Department to intervene. At this point, Hays, whose district included Little Rock, offered to act as an intermediary. He arranged a meeting between the governor and the president on September 14. At the meeting, Eisenhower suggested that, rather than withdrawing the guard, Faubus simply change their orders to preserve order and allow the black students to enter the school. Eisenhower believed that he had gotten such a commitment from Faubus. In his public statements after the conference, however, Faubus refused to commit either to removing the guardsmen or to changing their orders. Convinced that Faubus had deceived him, Eisenhower was furious. Under direct court order not to interfere with the desegregation of Central High, Faubus withdrew the guard. The black students entered Central High on September 23, but, faced with a threatening mob outside the school, authorities decided to withdraw the students for their own safety. That evening, Eisenhower went on national television and warned that he would use "whatever force may be necessary to prevent the obstruction of the orders of the court." When the mob again gathered outside the school the next day, the president nationalized the Arkansas National Guard and sent in 1,000 armed paratroopers to enforce the court's order.

In the months following the crisis at Little Rock, Hays called for compliance with all laws. As segregationist sentiment hardened, this position became politically untenable. In 1958, Dale Alford (an ophthalmologist, a member of the school board in Little Rock, and a segregationist) mounted a last-minute write-in campaign against Hays. While Faubus took no public role in the election, his organization weighed in on behalf of Alford, who defeated Hays. Both Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON sent Hays letters of condolence.

After losing his seat, Hays was appointed a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority. He served there until February 1961, when he was appointed assistant secretary of state for congressional affairs. From December 1961 to February 1964, Hays was a special assistant to the president. During the last part of the decade, he taught at various universities. In 1972, he unsuccessfully ran for a seat in Congress from North Carolina. Hays lived in Chevy Chase, Md., until his death there on October 11, 1981.

The son of a farmer, Hays was born in Bannock, Ohio, on May 13, 1911. He graduated from Ohio State University in 1933 and studied at Duke University in 1935. He worked as a high school teacher in Ohio from 1934 to 1938. In 1939, he won election to the first of three consecutive two-year terms as mayor of Flushing, Ohio. While holding that office, he served as a Democrat in the state senate in 1941 and 1942. A member of the Officers Reserve Corps of the U.S. Army since 1933, Hays was called to active duty in 1941 and received a medical discharge a year later. In 1945, he left the mayor's office to operate a farm in Belmont, Ohio. He also was Belmont Co. commissioner from 1945 to 1949. Hays won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1948. Representing a poor agricultural and industrial district in southeastern Ohio, Hays generally voted as a liberal on matters of domestic policy. He also supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy.

Although Hays voted for the Internal Security Act of 1950, he played something of a moderating role when he was appointed to the newly created Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations in 1953. Established to determine whether tax-exempt educational and philanthropic foundations had financed subversive activities and propaganda, the panel held hearings during May and June 1954, which were marked by frequent clashes between the chairman, B. Carroll Reece (R-Tenn.), and Hays, who believed that witnesses and committee staff members were unfairly charging individuals and institutions with communist views and affiliations. Attempting to demonstrate that out-of-context quotations could be used to suggest communist sympathies, Hays read excerpts from encyclicals by Popes Leo XIII and Pius XI without attribution and induced a staff member to assert that they were "closely comparable to communist literature." Hays also demanded that the investigation be extended to include Facts Forum, a tax-exempt, right-wing radio and television production company funded by H. L. Hunt, an oil millionaire from Texas.

The committee's majority report found little evidence that the foundations directly supported communism. However, it asserted that they encouraged attacks on the American social and governmental system and promoted collectivist ideas. Hays and Rep. Gracie Pfof (D-Idaho), the other Democrat on the panel, filed a minority report charging that the "theme of prejudgment . . . characterized the entire course of this committee's activities" and that with few exceptions only antifoundation witnesses had been called.

Hays unsuccessfully tried to double the authorization for urban and public-works planning in the omnibus housing bill of 1954. Two years later, he attacked as too modest an administration program to create a $50-million revolving loan fund for depressed rural areas. In 1957, Hays was among 80 House Democrats who offered a list of liberal domestic and foreign policy programs for congressional action. He generally favored economic rather than military assistance to underdeveloped areas.

In the 1960s, Hays broke with many of his liberal colleagues over the Vietnam War, which he supported, and school busing to achieve integration, which he opposed. As Hays accumulated seniority on the House Administration Committee, which oversaw committee budgets, office expenses, and travel vouchers, he used his position to retaliate against other members he disliked or with whom he disagreed. Many members came to regard him as arrogant and abrasive, particularly after he assumed the chair of the Administration Committee in 1971. By 1976, Hays had become one of the most powerful and resented members of Congress. That year, the Washington Post reported that Elizabeth Ray, a 33-year-old clerk on the staff of the House Administration Committee, had been given her $14,000-a-year job to be Hays's mistress. In an effort to avoid an investigation by the House Ethics Committee, Hays first resigned his chairmanships and then resigned from the House. He returned to his farm in Belmont, where he bred Angus cattle and Tennessee walking horses. In 1978 he won election to the Ohio House of Representatives but lost his bid for reelection two years later. Hays became chairman of the Democratic Party in Belmont Co. in 1980 and remained active in local politics. He died in Wheeling, W.Va., on February 10, 1989.

Hébert, F(elix) Edward

(1901–1979) U.S. congressman

Born in New Orleans, La., on October 12, 1901, Hébert attended public and parochial schools. He attended Tulane University from 1920 to 1924, which he left before completing his law degree. From 1918 to 1940, he worked as a journalist and editor in New Orleans. He became political editor of the New Orleans States in 1929 and used his front-page column to attack Gov. Huey P. Long. After becoming city editor in 1939, Hébert wrote a series of articles exposing corruption in Louisiana state politics. In 1940, he defeated a longtime Democratic incumbent in the primary and easily won election to Congress from the state's first congressional district, which included eight wards in New Orleans plus Plaquemines and St. Bernard's Parishes.

In 1943, Hébert was assigned to the Naval Affairs Committee, which in 1947 was merged with the other service panels to form the Armed Services Committee. A staunch defender of segregation and an opponent of what he regarded as federal encroachment upon the rights of the states, he supported South Carolina Gov. STROM THURMOND's third-party presidential candidacy in 1948. That year Hébert was assigned to the House Committee on Un-American Activities (or House Un-American Activities Committee [HUAC]), but he lost that assignment the following year as a result of his support of Thurmond. As chairman of the Armed Services Committee's Subcommittee for Special Investigations, he led probes of wasteful procurement procedures in the military in 1949, 1951, and 1952.

Hébert continued to oppose what he regarded as unnecessary defense expenditures during the Eisenhower administration. In 1956, he opposed an administration-sponsored reorganization of the Defense Department that would have created an office of assistant secretary for research and development for each of the three services.

Despite his crusades against waste, Hébert was a leading advocate of a strong military establishment. A critic of the Eisenhower administration's efforts to reduce the manpower of the Armed Services, in 1959 he attacked Secretary of Defense NEIL McELROY for imposing a "gag" on military officers who opposed the cutbacks. That year, he went against the administration's wishes in voting to provide an additional $99 million to maintain the army's strength at 900,000 men.

In 1959, Hébert's subcommittee on special investigations probed the hiring of retired military officers by the defense industry. Critics of the practice charged that such officers exerted influence upon their former colleagues still in the military. In January 1960, the subcommittee released a report supporting legislation to check this syndrome. Hébert offered a bill barring military and civilian Defense Department personnel from accepting compensation for helping a private company secure a government defense contract within two years after their departure from the department. The measure imposed a $10,000 fine, two years imprisonment and denial of retirement pay during the period of violation for those found guilty. In the full Armed Services Committee, however, chairman CARL VINSON (D-Ga.) succeeded in eliminating the provisions for fine and imprisonment. Hébert unsuccessfully attempted to restore them on the House floor. The measure died in the Senate.

In spite of his opposition to wasteful defense spending, he repeatedly used his influence to procure federal projects in his district, including several military bases, a naval hospital, and a research center.

Throughout the 1950s, Hébert opposed all civil rights legislation and most social welfare legislation. He remained consistent in his opposition to such legislation during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. Hébert's steadfast opposition to civil rights and social welfare legislation alienated him from members of the Democratic caucus and ultimately led to his fall from effective political power. He also persisted in his support of a powerful military and supported the war in Vietnam. Nonetheless, in 1970 he led a subcommittee investigation into a massacre in that had taken place at My Lai in 1968. His criticism of the Pentagon and State Department for concealing details of the incident won praise even from some of his critics. Upon the death of L. MENDEL RIVERS (D-S.C.) in 1971, Hébert became chair of the Armed Services Committee. His support of the war in Vietnam led to conflicts with junior Democrats in the House. In 1975, the Democratic caucus voted to strip Hébert and two other senior Democrats of their chairmanships. This greatly diminished his power. His demotion and failing health led him to decide not to seek reelection in 1976. He died in New Orleans on December 29, 1979.

Hennings, Thomas C(arey), Jr.

(1903–1960) U.S. senator; chairman, Rules and Administration Committee

Born in St. Louis, Mo., on June 25, 1903. Hennings received a B.A. from Cornell University in 1924 and an LL.B. from Washington University in 1926.

He joined a law firm in a St. Louis the same year and, from 1929 to 1934, served as assistant circuit attorney in that city. Elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1934, he supported Franklin D. Roosevelt's domestic and foreign policies. In 1940, Hennings successfully ran for circuit attorney in St. Louis, but the following year he was called from the U.S. Naval Reserve to active duty. After his discharge in 1944, he resumed his post as circuit attorney.

In 1950, Hennings ran for the Senate against the incumbent Republican senator, Forrest C. Donnell. During the campaign, he warned that Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) activities posed a threat to freedom. Hennings defeated the incumbent by 90,000 votes. He won reelection in 1956.

During his early years in the Senate, Hennings continued his campaign against the Wisconsin Republican. He served on the Rules and Administration Committee's Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, which in 1951 investigated the Maryland senatorial campaign of 1950, during which JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER defeated Sen. Millard E. Tydings (D-Md.) and McCarthy campaigned against Tydings. The subcommittee's report, later accepted by the full committee, was sharply critical of McCarthy's role in the election. In August 1951, Sen. WILLIAM BENTON (D-Conn.) introduced a resolution calling on the Rules Committee to consider the expulsion of McCarthy from the Senate, which was referred to the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections. McCarthy released a letter questioning Hennings's qualifications to serve on the subcommittee, to which Hennings replied in a speech on the Senate floor. When Sen. Guy Gillette (D-Iowa) resigned from the subcommittee, Hennings assumed the chair. The report of the subcommittee, issued on January 2, 1953, sidestepped the issues of "McCarthyism" and communism in government. Instead, it focused on McCarthy's spotty finances. It also criticized McCarthy's "disdain and contempt for the rules and wishes of the entire Senate body, as well as the membership of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections." The report declined to offer any recommendations. Hennings did, however, forward the report to the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service. An investigation by the Justice Department found no basis on which to prosecute McCarthy.

Hennings continued to oppose McCarthy. In July 1953, he denounced the removal of books from United States Information Agency libraries under pressure from McCarthy. In July 1954, Hennings backed Sen. RALPH E. FLANDERS's (R-Vt.) resolution calling for McCarthy's censure. Wanting an immediate showdown and fearing that the resolution might be buried, Hennings was one of 12 senators who in August voted against referring it to a special panel.

After McCarthy's censure in December 1954, Hennings continued his opposition to what he regarded as threats to civil liberties. In the fall of 1955, the Judiciary Committee's Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, chaired by Hennings, began an investigation of the possible erosion of freedom in the United States, which included a critical examination of the federal government's loyalty program. The following year, as a member of the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, he was critical of the security panel's investigation of communist influence in the press. Hennings expressed doubts about the propriety of calling individuals whose communist activities had ended many years before. In 1958, he moved to table a bill passed by the House that would have barred federal courts from applying the federal preemption doctrine unless a federal and state statute were irreconcilably in conflict or unless Congress had specifically stated its intention to preempt a particular field of legislation. The immediate purpose of the bill was to enable states to pass anti-sedition laws. Hennings's motion failed, but a recommittal motion succeeded shortly thereafter.

Hennings was a persistent but unsuccessful proponent of election reform. As a member of the Rules and Administration Committee, in 1953 and 1955 he led efforts to pass legislation raising spending limits for national campaigns and tightening disclosure requirements. Neither attempt got beyond the committee. Hennings became chairman of the Rules and Administration Committee in 1957, and two years later the panel reported another reform measure. In an individual view filed with the committee's report, he criticized the bill for failing to bring primary elections within the scope of the reporting requirement. On the Senate floor the following year, Hennings successfully amended the bill to include primaries.

Consistently liberal in his voting, Hennings opposed a bill in 1956 designed to exempt independent natural gas producers from federal utility regulation. On the Judiciary Committee, he sought to expedite the Senate's consideration of the Eisenhower administration's civil rights bill in 1957 and opposed Southern efforts to weaken the measure. In 1960, Hennings cosponsored Sen. PAT McNAMARA's (D-Mich.) bill to provide medical care for the aged within the Social Security system. Hennings died in Washington, D.C., on September 13, 1960.

Hensel, H(erman) Struve

(1901–1991) assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs

The son of a stockbroker, Hensel was born in Hoboken, N.J., on August 22, 1901. He graduated from Princeton University in 1922 and received an LL.B. from Columbia University three years later. Over the next 15 years, he established a reputation as a leading corporate lawyer with the firms of Cravath Swaine and Milbank Tweed. In 1940, he organized and served as the first chief of the navy's legal division for procurement. He later became general counsel for the navy and in 1945 was appointed assistant secretary of the navy for materiel procurement. After a brief return to private law practice, he joined the Economic Cooperation Administration in 1948 and was sent to South America to enlist the cooperation of Argentina in the Marshall Plan.

In 1952, Hensel went to work for the Defense Department as general counsel. In 1954, he was made assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs. Shortly after the appointment, he was drawn into the dispute between the army and Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Early in the year, high officials in the Department of the Army began drawing up a "chronology" of McCarthy's efforts to gain preferential treatment for a recently inducted member of his staff, G. DAVID SCHINE. Hensel's only role in the preparation of the army's case was to sign a letter of transmittal forwarding the chronology to a member of McCarthy's permanent investigations subcommittee. McCarthy, however, charged that Hensel had helped write it in an attempt to "blackmail" McCarthy into calling off his investigations of alleged subversion in the military. In formal charges to this effect, filed with the subcommittee in April, McCarthy named Hensel as a co-principal along with Secretary of the Army ROBERT T. STEVENS and the army's counsel, JOHN G. ADAMS. At the same time, McCarthy added the charge that Hensel had a personal motive for discrediting him: to block an investigation of alleged conflict of interest involving Hensel's partnership in a ship supply firm while he was in charge of procurement for the navy during the war. Hensel labeled these charges "barefaced lies" and challenged McCarthy to drop his congressional immunity and repeat them in court.

On May 17, McCarthy admitted that he had no evidence to show that Hensel had been involved in the Schine affair. Shortly afterwards the subcommittee voted to dismiss the charges against him.

Hensel left the Defense Department in 1955 and returned to the private practice of law. He was a partner in the Coudert Brothers law firm from 1966 to 1977. He then retained an active interest in legal and corporate affairs until shortly before his death in Boca Raton, Fla., on May 27, 1991.

Herberg, Will

(1901–1977) philosopher, theologian

The son of Russian-Jewish parents, Herberg was born in Liakhovichi, Russia, on June 30, 1901. His parents immigrated to the United States in 1904 and settled in a Jewish neighborhood in Brooklyn, New York. Herberg's father deserted the family in 1910, leaving the family in dire economic straits. After graduating from Boys' High School in 1918, Herberg enrolled in the College of the City of New York in September of that year. A brilliant but undisciplined student, he excelled in foreign languages, literature, mathematics, and physics. He failed, however, to meet a requirement in physical education and earned poor grades in hygiene and military science. All of that, combined with frequent absences from military science, led to his suspension from CCNY in 1920. During the 1920s, Herberg emerged as a prominent figure in American communism; he was active in the Communist Young Workers League and, by the middle of the decade, was a member of its national executive committee. When the Communist Party split in 1929 over the issue of autonomy from the Soviet Union and Joseph Stalin's purge of Nikolay Bukharin, Herberg sided with those who favored an independent course. JAY LOVESTONE, Benjamin Gitlow, Herberg, and others of that faction were expelled from the American Communist Party (CPUSA) for being "right deviationists." After their expulsion, the Lovestonites, as they became known, formed an organization eventually known as the Independent Labor League of America (ILLA), which maintained that the singular circumstances of America required a uniquely American approach to the workers' struggle. Herberg became managing editor of the Lovestoneite publication first known as Revolutionary Age and later called Workers' Age. In 1933, Herberg took a position as education director of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, a job he held until 1948. Herberg emerged during the 1930s as perhaps the leading spokesperson for the Lovestonites. He condemned with equal vigor Stalinism, the approach of Leon Trotsky, and democratic socialism.

By the end of the 1930s, Herberg became disillusioned with Stalin's purges, the Nazi-Soviet Pact, and American communism's subservience to Moscow. Profoundly influenced by REINHOLD NIEBUHR's Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932), Herberg concluded that the source of Stalinism's corruption lay in its failure to recognize the inherently sinful nature of human beings and the consequent inevitable imperfection of human institutions. In the early 1940s, after considering a conversion to Christianity, Herberg, at Niebuhr's urging, instead explored his own religious tradition. He undertook extensive study at the Jewish Theological Seminary, as a result of which Herberg came to regard himself as a democratic socialist and embraced Conservative Judaism.

Swayed by the arguments of the Jewish existentialist theologian Martin Buber as well as Christian neoorthodox theologians such as Niebuhr and Karl Barth, Herberg published his first book, Judaism and Modern Man: An Interpretation of Jewish Religion, in 1951. In it, he maintained that neither science, nor Marxism, nor psychoanalysis offered an answer to human despair. Humans could “transcend” their spiritual crisis only by making a great “leap of faith” toward a God unknowable through science or cognitive experience. This position, shaped by the teaching of Niebuhr and influenced by Herberg’s deeply felt kinship with Jesuits like John Courtney Murray, led the journalist John Cogley perceptively, if somewhat irreverently, to introduce Herberg to an audience as “Reinhold Niebuhr, S.J.”

By the late 1940s and into the 1950s, Herberg considered himself a liberal. Throughout the 1950s, however, he moved gradually towards Burkean conservatism. Like his fellow ex-communist, WHITTAKER CHAMBERS, Herberg saw the conflict between the free world and communist as a “struggle for the soul of modern man.” Despite his own anticommunism, Herberg detested Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), whom he regarded as an outgrowth of left-wing populism. According to Herberg, the advent of mass communications enabled political leaders to circumvent deliberative institutions and appeal directly to the masses. Early in the New Deal, Franklin D. Roosevelt had made use of the potential of mass communications and engaged in “government by rabble-rousing.” Herberg wrote that “McCarthy, like Roosevelt, is impatient with the restraints and limitations of . . . proper constitutional channels.” McCarthy’s rise, concluded Herberg, demonstrated the danger of “irresponsible mass-democracy,” something the founders of the American republic had intended to prevent by creating a carefully balanced government.

In 1955, Herberg published Protestant-Catholic-Jew: An Essay in American Religious Sociology. In it, he took as his starting point an apparent contradiction. Church attendance had never been higher, and America seemed to be undergoing a religious revival led by popularizers such as FULTON SHEEN, NORMAN VINCENT PEALE, and BILLY GRAHAM. At the same time, however, American life was becoming more secular. Thus the paradox: Americans were becoming at once more secular and more religious. Herberg found an explanation in the process of immigration and assimilation. He argued that, as the grandchildren of immigrants assimilated into a mainstream American culture, religion had become a means of identification, “a way of sociability or ‘belonging,’ rather than a way of reorienting one’s life to God.” Religion itself had become part of a larger American civic creed, which he called “the American Way of Life.” Americans participated in that creed through identification with one of the three communities of faith. In the process, religion practiced by Americans had “lost much of its authentic Christian (or Jewish) content.” “Faith in faith itself,” rather than devotion to a specific creed, became the a means of participating in the American civic creed. Herberg decried what he regarded as a vacuous “faith in faith” rather than faith in God.

Throughout the first half of the 1950s, Herberg had published widely and spoken frequently at colleges. In 1955, he joined the faculty of Drew University, a Methodist school in New Jersey, as a professor of Judaic studies and social philosophy. In the following years, he edited three anthologies: The Writings of Martin Buber (1956), Four Existential Theologians (1958), and Community, State and Church (1960). Herberg received honorary doctorate degrees from Park College in 1956, Franklin and Marshall College in 1960, and Ohio Wesleyan University in 1963.

Although his centrist political views and identification with the Catholic church led him to support JOHN F. KENNEDY’s campaign for the presidency in 1960, Herberg was becoming more conservative, and in 1961 he became a contributing editor to WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY’s National Review. For the next 15 years, it served as the main outlet for Herberg’s ideas and his substantial contributions to the emerging conservative movement in America. His strong commitment to social order led him to criticize the civil rights movement led by MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. Despite his own opposition to racial discrimination, Herberg rejected the idea that one had a religious right to violate the law (although Herberg modified that position by the 1970s). Herberg also criticized the liberalizing tendencies of Pope John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council. Unlike some who found in the counterculture of the 1960s a new spirituality, Herberg dismissed it as self-indulgent and utterly devoid of lasting values.

When Herberg first appeared in Who's Who in America, he falsely claimed to have been born on August 7, 1907, in New York City and to have earned bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees from Columbia University. His motivation for the misrepresentation regarding his birth appears to have been in part to distance himself from his Russian roots and in part to claim a later birth date and thus to prolong his academic career. Thanks to his intellectual brilliance along with his comprehensive command of religious, political, and philosophical ideas and texts, neither his colleagues nor his students had any reason to doubt his academic credentials. Until very late in his life, no one suspected that he might not hold the degrees he claimed.

Herberg continued to speak out for conservative causes until his final illness. He died in Chatham, N.J., on March 26, 1977.

Herter, Christian A(rchibald)

(1895–1966) governor of Massachusetts, undersecretary of state, secretary of state

The son of expatriate American artists, Adele and Albert Herter, Christian Herter was born in Paris France, on March 28, 1895. After receiving his primary education there, he went to the Browning School in New York and graduated from Harvard in 1915. Herter entered Columbia University's School of Architecture but left in 1916 to join the Foreign Service. He served as an attaché to the American embassy in Berlin and as head of the American legation in Brussels. After working for the State Department in Washington from 1917 to 1918, Herter negotiated a prisoner of war agreement with Germany in 1918 and in 1919 served as secretary to the Paris Peace Commission. He served as special assistant to HERBERT C. HOOVER, the head of the European Relief Council, in 1920 and 1921. When Hoover became secretary of commerce in 1921, he asked Herter to be his assistant. Herter held this post until 1924, when he left government service to become editor of the Independent. The Independent was sold in 1928, and Herter worked as an associate editor of the Sportsman until 1936. During the 1929–30 academic year, he was a lecturer on foreign affairs at Harvard University.

Herter served as a Republican in the Massachusetts House of Representatives from 1931 to 1943; for the last four of those years, he was speaker of the house. In 1942, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives. He served in that body for 10 years. A member of the internationalist wing of the Republican Party, he supported the creation of the United Nations and the development of the Marshall Plan.

In 1952, Herter successfully ran for governor of Massachusetts. In the state house, he presented a liberal program establishing a state department of commerce, introducing a public housing program, and increasing aid to the elderly. Herter was reelected in 1954. However, the Republicans lost control of the lower house of the General Court, which prevented the enactment of the governor's proposed judicial reorganization.

In 1956, liberal Republicans, led by HAROLD STASSEN, proposed that Gov. Herter replace RICHARD NIXON as the party's vice presidential candidate. Although Eisenhower had pondered replacing Nixon, Herter was not one of his choices. Herter's identification with Harvard and the East Coast elite, his age (he was 61), and his health (he suffered from arthritis) all worked against him. Moreover, Republican party regulars rallied behind Nixon, so Eisenhower had SHERMAN ADAMS call Herter and offer him a position in the State Department if he withdrew from consideration for the vice presidency. Herter agreed and offered to nominate Nixon at the Republican convention. In 1957, Eisenhower appointed Herter undersecretary of state. Herter quickly developed a close relationship with Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, who was already ill with the cancer that would ultimately kill him. When Dulles became too ill to continue as secretary of state, he recommended Herter as his successor. Eisenhower had some reservations about Herter's health and considered several other candidates, but ultimately Dulles's counsel prevailed. Eisenhower nominated Herter on April 18, 1959; the Senate unanimously approved the nomination in record time, and Herter took office four days later.

As secretary of state, Herter followed the same general approach to policy as Dulles, which had, in fact, always been guided ultimately by Eisenhower.

In some regards, however, Herter was more flexible than his predecessor. An early test of Herter's diplomacy came when Soviet premier Nikita S. Khrushchev challenged the Allied position in West Berlin. In November 1958, Khrushchev threatened to sign a peace treaty with East Germany, thereby terminating Allied rights in West Berlin, unless the Western Allies withdrew their troops from Berlin within six months and make it a "free city." The reaction of the various Western Allies to Khrushchev's ultimatum revealed significant disagreements. Eisenhower, first with Dulles and then with Herter, attempted to compose the differences. Khrushchev agreed to a conference of foreign ministers to discuss the German question to be followed by a summit meeting. In April 1959, Herter attended a meeting in Paris at which the Western foreign ministers announced that they were in complete agreement on strategy for the upcoming conference with the Soviet Union. Their plan called for a four-stage "permanent settlement in Europe." The first stage called for the unification of East and West Berlin through free elections. The second stage would see the establishment of a "mixed" German committee to expand technical contacts between the two Germanys. The third stage called for the election of an all-German assembly to establish a "liberal democratic and federative system," and the fourth stage called for the recognition of a unified Germany. The negotiations with the Soviets in May resulted in a deadlock, as did a second meeting in August.

Herter also failed to make much progress on the issue of disarmament. In early 1959, Eisenhower, who wanted a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty with the Soviets, decided to try for the more limited objective of ending atmospheric testing. Khrushchev rejected the proposal, but the talks in Geneva continued. In March 1960, speaking before the National Press Club in Washington, Herter outlined a program that included proposals for disarmament under the supervision of an international controls panel and for talks leading to the eventual reduction of military forces. The Soviet Union rejected the proposal because of its provision for on-site inspection of missile stations and atomic installations.

On May 5, 1960, Khrushchev announced that the Soviet Union had downed an American U-2 plane on a reconnaissance mission over the USSR. The administration initially denied the charge. Herter argued that Washington should accept responsibility for the flights and explain why they were needed. On May 7, the State Department admitted that a flight over Soviet territory had been made by an "unarmed civilian U-2." Two days later, Herter defended the missions and indicated that they were necessary to prevent possible Soviet aggression and would continue. With the U-2 incident still dominating the headlines, Herter left for Geneva on May 12 to prepare for the meeting between Eisenhower, Khrushchev, and the British prime minister, Harold Macmillan. The summit collapsed five days later, when Khrushchev opened the meeting with a diatribe against Eisenhower and the United States and then walked out.

Cuba proved to be another intractable problem during Herter's tenure. He became secretary of state only months after Fidel Castro had come to power. As undersecretary of state, Herter had advised that the United States remain neutral in the Cuban conflict and that the Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista would ultimately have to relinquish power. Batista's behavior led Eisenhower to impose an arms embargo and withdraw diplomatic support. After Castro came to power, his legalization of the Communist Party, his purge of liberals, and his mass executions alienated the Eisenhower administration. When the American Society of Newspaper Editors invited the new Cuban leader to the United States in April, Eisenhower demonstrated his revulsion at the executions by refusing to meet with Castro and having Nixon and Herter meet with him instead. When Castro later seized American properties, the State Department, on September 30, 1959, advised Americans to avoid all unnecessary travel to Cuba. Herter approved an embargo on most exports to Cuba in October. At the same time, he stepped up efforts to maintain relations with other Latin American nations. In August 1960, Castro began to accept Soviet weapons, and Herter obtained a resolution censuring the Cuban dictator from the Organization of American States. Castro then demanded that the United States reduce the number of personnel at its embassy in Havana, and the United States broke off diplomatic relations between the two countries on January 3, 1961.

Herter did not serve as secretary of state long enough to put his own stamp on U.S. foreign policy. Moreover, after the death of Dulles, Eisenhower moved to take more personal control over foreign policy. In addition, Herter never enjoyed the close relationship with Eisenhower that Dulles had. Nevertheless, he faithfully and competently carried out the foreign policy of his president. A model patrician, Herter was impeccably courteous and mild-mannered. Underneath that veneer, though, lay toughness and strength. An exceptionally tall man (he stood six feet six inches), he suffered from severe arthritis for the last 20 years of his life and frequently had to use crutches.

At the end of the Eisenhower presidency, Herter retired from public life. In February 1962, JOHN F. KENNEDY named Herter special U.S. representative for trade negotiations with Europe, a position he held until his death in Washington, D.C., on December 30, 1966.

Hickenlooper, Bourke B(lakemore)

(1896–1971) U.S. senator

Born on July 21, 1896, in Blockton, Iowa, Hickenlooper attended public schools and Iowa State College at Ames. He left college in 1917 to enlist in the U.S. Army's Officer Training Camp at Fort Snelling, Minn. Commissioned a second lieutenant, he served in France from August 1918 to February 1919. After being honorably discharged, Hickenlooper returned to Iowa State, where he received a B.S. in industrial science in 1920, and then enrolled in the College of Law at the State University of Iowa at Iowa City. After earning his law degree in 1922 and gaining admission to the bar that same year, he practiced law in Cedar Rapids.

After failing in his initial try for public office, Hickenlooper won a seat as a Republican in the Iowa General Assembly, in which he served from 1934 to 1937. He was lieutenant governor from 1939 to 1942 and governor from 1943 to 1944, when he won election to the U.S. Senate. He was reelected in 1950, 1956, and 1962. His political success came in spite of a lack of charisma and a rather dour personality. In the Senate, Hickenlooper generally voted as a Midwestern conservative Republican. He favored a strongly anticommunist foreign policy, aggressive measures to deal with domestic communist subversion, fiscal restraint, and minimal taxation. In one significant respect, Hickenlooper departed from Midwestern conservatism on foreign policy: he early on embraced internationalism and supported the Truman Doctrine, Marshall Plan, and NATO.

Like many conservative Republicans, Hickenlooper interpreted Eisenhower's victory in 1952 as a mandate to repudiate the Yalta agreements reached near the end of World War II. As a candidate, Eisenhower had criticized the agreements. As president, however, he had no intention of repudiating them. After all, Yalta provided the United States with its occupation rights in Vienna and West Berlin. Then, too, if the Americans could repudiate the agreements, so could the Soviets. Further, the British had made it clear that they would not join in repudiating the agreements, and doing so would alienate Democrats at home. On February 20, 1952, Eisenhower presented to Congress a proposed resolution that stopped short of disavowing Yalta. Instead, it criticized the Soviet Union for violating the agreements and rejected any "interpretations" of Yalta that "have been perverted to bring about the subjugation of free peoples." Hickenlooper and other Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee believed that Eisenhower's resolution betrayed a fundamental Republican position. Hickenlooper wanted outright repudiation. Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) attempted to reach a compromise by proposing an amendment stipulating that the resolution did not "constitute any determination by Congress as to the validity or invalidity of any provisions of the said agreements." Democrats supported Eisenhower's version and opposed any amendment. The death of the Soviet dictator, Joseph Stalin, provided an opportunity to postpone any resolution on Yalta.

Hickenlooper found himself at odds with the Eisenhower administration on several other issues. He broke with the administration in 1953 over the nomination of CHARLES E. BOHLEN to be ambassador to the USSR. Hickenlooper linked the nominee to the hated Yalta accords and derided him as a representative of the State Department under Roosevelt and Truman. Hickenlooper joined 10 other Republican senators in voting against the nomination. In addition, he supported the anticommunist crusade of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) and in December 1954 voted against the Senate's censure of the junior senator from Wisconsin.

Although he served many years in the Senate and exercised considerable influence, few measures bore Hickenlooper's name. One notable exception was the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Hickenlooper had become chair of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy in 1949, and he resumed the chair with the Republican victory in 1952. In 1954, he cosponsored legislation to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 to require the Atomic Energy Commission to grant licenses to private corporations to produce and market power from nuclear sources.

Despite his earlier reservations about Eisenhower's foreign policy, Hickenlooper emerged as a consistent supporter of the administration. As a senator from a largely agricultural state that depended heavily on the price of corn and hay, he favored high price supports on those commodities. He nonetheless backed the administration's policy of flexible rather than rigid price supports. In addition, he supported civil rights legislation.

At the same time, Hickenlooper opposed most domestic welfare legislation and generally opposed expanding the power of the federal government.

In the 1960s, Hickenlooper's approach to policy changed little. He opposed federal aid to education, Medicare, and the War on Poverty, although he continued his general support for civil rights. He successfully added a controversial amendment to the Foreign Aid Act of 1962 that provided for the automatic denial of American aid to any foreign country that expropriated the property of U.S. citizens without adequate compensation. During the mid and late 1960s, Hickenlooper and Sen. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.), cooperated to gain passage of a controversial consular treaty with the Soviet Union. As he had in the 1950s, he continued to oppose allowing U.S. trade with communist countries. In addition, he advocated strengthening the armed forces and supported American policy in Vietnam. Hickenlooper did not run for reelection in 1968 and died while visiting Shelter Island, N.Y., on September 4, 1971.

Hill, (Joseph) Lister

(1894–1984) U.S. senator; chairman, Labor and Welfare Committee

The son of a prominent surgeon, Joseph Lister Hill was born in Montgomery, Ala., on December 27, 1894. Lister Hill, as he preferred to be known, was raised in his mother's Catholic faith and attended Catholic grade school. He graduated from the Starke University School in Montgomery and then earned an A.B. from the University of Alabama in 1914 and a law degree from the same institution in 1915. After receiving a second law degree from Columbia University in 1916, he returned to Montgomery to practice law. He served as president of the Montgomery Board of Education from 1917 to 1922. During World War I, Hill entered the army, rising from private to first lieutenant. After being discharged, he returned to Montgomery, resumed his law practice, and, as he became active in civic affairs and Democratic politics in heavily Protestant Alabama, announced his conversion to Methodism, the faith of his father's side of the family. He won a special election for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1923. In spite of his initial reservations about expanding the role of the federal government, Hill became an active supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. He was sponsor in the House of the bill that created the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), which contributed to greatly to the economic development of northern Alabama. In 1937, he ran successfully for the U.S. Senate seat vacated when Roosevelt appointed HUGO BLACK to the Supreme Court. Three years later, he became Democratic whip, and in 1940 he nominated Roosevelt at the Democratic National Convention. As a senator, he supported Roosevelt's foreign policy. In 1943, he helped write the resolution that put the Senate on record in favor of a future United Nations.

During the postwar era, Hill became a proponent of national health care. Perhaps his most significant achievement in that area came with the passage in 1946 of a bill he cosponsored with HAROLD BURTON (R-Ohio) that provided federal grants to state and local nonprofit organizations for the construction of hospitals. That same year, Hill resigned as whip rather than muster support for HARRY S. TRUMAN's civil rights proposals. Hill opposed attempts to abolish the poll tax, outlaw lynching, and limit debate in the Senate. He called for Truman to step aside in April 1948 but did not join the Dixiecrat defection from the Democratic party that year.

Hill won reelection in 1950 and 1956. During the 1950s, Hill continued his concern for legislation relating to health and medicine. His ability to influence policy in that area increased when he became chairman of the Senate Labor and Welfare Committee in 1955. In addition, he served as chairman of the Appropriations Committee's Subcommittee for Health and Welfare Agencies. In May 1955, he introduced a bill to provide free distribution of the new Salk polio vaccine to all children in the United States. The American Medical Association opposed the measure, as did Secretary of Health Education, and Welfare OVETA CULP HOBBS. The Eisenhower administration proposed instead a measure to provide free vaccines to needy children. The Senate Labor and Welfare Committee reported out Hill's bill, the Senate passed it, and Eisenhower signed it in August 1955. In 1956, Hill sponsored successful amendments to provide additional funding for the National Institutes of Health and for training nurses. He also introduced a bill, passed in 1960, that provided funds for international cooperation in medical research.

In addition to supporting federal funding for health, Hill advocated federal aid for education. In 1956, he cosponsored the Library Services Act, which appropriated federal funds to upgrade the nation's libraries. Hill also supported the National Defense Education Act, passed after the Soviet launch of Sputnik, that provided federal loans for college students and federal matching funds to promote the teaching of science, mathematics, and foreign languages in the schools.

Throughout the 1950s, Hill continued to advocate public, rather than private, development of power and other resources. In 1953, he opposed the administration's proposal to grant oil-rich submerged coastal lands to the states because he believed that private oil companies would be the main beneficiaries. In January of that year, he participated in a 28-day filibuster against the administration's bill. In addition to supporting a measure, introduced by Sen. CLINTON ANDERSON (D-N.Mex.), that called for federal control of submerged lands beyond the three-mile limit, Hill introduced an amendment to Anderson's proposal that would have set aside all federal revenue from offshore oil for national defense and education. Congress rejected Anderson's bill in April 1953.

Hill opposed the Dixon-Yates contract in 1954. EDGAR DIXON of Middle Southern Utilities and EUGENE YATES of the Southern Company had been given a contract by the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) to build a steam plant near Memphis, Tenn. The plant would have supplied power for consumers in the Memphis area, including the TVA. Hill charged that the government was using Dixon and Yates "as hatchet men to destroy the TVA." In February 1955, Hill was appointed head of a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee charged with handling AEC-TVA funds. During hearings that month, Hill disclosed that Adolphe H. Wenzell, a consultant to the Bureau of the Budget at the time of the negotiations, was also a vice president and director of the First Boston Corporation, which was arranging financing for the Dixon-Yates project. Hill accused Wenzell of a conflict of interest and denounced the budget director, ROWLAND HUGHES, for concealing the connection. Hughes acknowledged that Wenzell had participated in contract talks but denied having concealed anything. That same month, city officials in Memphis announced their intention to build a power plant, which made construction of the private plant unnecessary. Eisenhower canceled the Dixon-Yates contract in July.

While Hill supported much liberal domestic legislation, he opposed all civil rights measures. He publicly supported a futile resolution, passed by the Alabama legislature, declaring the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which held segregated public schools unconstitutional, null, and void in the state. He joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the "Southern Manifesto," presented to Congress in March 1956. The document attacked the Brown decision as "a clear abuse of judicial power" and charged that the justices substituted "personal political and social ideas for the established laws of the land." Hill voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

After nearly losing his seat to a conservative Republican challenger in 1962, Hill's voting record became increasingly conservative. While he continued to support health legislation, including Medicare, and social welfare programs designed to aid rural areas, he voted against most social programs aimed at urban problems. In addition, he continued to oppose all civil rights legislation. He declined to run for reelection in 1968. Hill returned to Montgomery, where he lived until his death there on December 20, 1984.

Hill, Robert C(harles)

(1917–1978) ambassador to Costa Rica, ambassador to El Salvador, special assistant to the undersecretary of state for mutual security affairs, assistant secretary of state for congressional relations, ambassador to Mexico

The son of a physician, Hill was born in Littleton, N.H., on September 17, 1917. After graduating from the Taft School and then Dartmouth College in 1942, he worked as a junior executive for the Todd Shipbuilding Corp. and went to Washington, D.C., as the company's representative. In 1943, Hill joined the State Department as an officer of the Foreign Service Auxiliary and served as a vice-consul in Calcutta, India, from 1944 to 1945. After World War II, Hill briefly studied law at Boston University but left in 1947 to become a clerk to the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Returning to the private sector in 1949, he joined W. R. Grace and Co., which operated sea and air transportation in Latin America.

In October 1953, Eisenhower appointed Hill ambassador to Costa Rica. While in that country, he was an official "observer" in the negotiation of a contract between Costa Rica and the powerful, American-based United Fruit Co. The youngest ambassador in American history, Hill served there for only about a year before being transferred to El Salvador, where he was ambassador from 1954 to 1955. During his stay in Latin America, he traveled extensively to familiarize himself with the problems of the population. In September 1955, Hill was named special assistant to HERBERT HOOVER

Jr., the undersecretary of state for mutual security affairs. After his confirmation in October, he spent the next five months coordinating foreign-aid programs and developing and presenting to Congress legislative proposals for the mutual security program. The young diplomat specialized in aid to Third World nations. As a result of his successful dealings with Congress, Hill was promoted to assistant secretary of state for congressional relations in February 1956.

As a legislative liaison officer, Hill's diplomatic skills helped smooth the passage of the administration's foreign-aid requests. During 1956 and 1957, observers credited Hill with playing an important part in getting Congress to approve aid to Yugoslavia over the objections of some conservatives, who argued that it would help communism. In May 1957, Hill confronted the issue of a Saudi Arabian ban on the assignment of Jewish servicemen to that country. Though some members of Congress from New York had charged the U.S. government with tacit compliance with the ban, Hill assured the representatives that the United States did "not condone" any foreign government's discrimination against U.S. citizens. However, he expressed doubt that the ban would soon be lifted.

In May 1957, Hill was confirmed as ambassador to Mexico. As in Costa Rica and El Salvador, Hill proved adept at winning the good will of the populace despite tensions between the two nations over aid, tariffs, and oil development. Aware of the value of the press, he visited Mexico's most important newspapers and its major television network to promote American-Mexican friendship. In October 1958, he scored a diplomatic triumph for the United States when he presented an interracial and international group of baseball stars at a Mexican movie festival. The ballplayers' appearance followed the showing of the movie The Defiant Ones, a film that stressed interracial harmony and that helped dampen the anti-American feeling.

Upon winning election to the New Hampshire State Legislature in November 1960, Hill resigned as ambassador to Mexico effective January 1961. After serving one term, Hill returned to private business, becoming director of a number of corporations, including United Fruit Co. He chaired the Republican National Committee's Foreign Policy Task Force from 1965 to 1968 and served on the Republican Coordinating Committee's Task Force on National Security from 1967 to 1968. Hill returned to diplomatic service in 1969, when President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him ambassador to Spain, a post he held until 1972, when he resigned to run for governor of New Hampshire. His campaign never caught on, and he dropped out of the race before the primary election. From 1973 to 1974, he was assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs. Hill became ambassador to Argentina in 1974 and held that post until his retirement in 1977. He died of a heart attack in Littleton, N.H., on November 28, 1978.

Hobby, Oveta Culp

(1905–1995) administrator, Federal Security Agency; secretary of health, education, and welfare

The daughter of a prominent lawyer and state legislator, Oveta Culp was born in Killeen, Tex., on January 19, 1905. After studying at Mary Hardin Baylor College in Belton, Tex., she served as parliamentarian for the Texas House of Representatives from 1925 to 1931. During that time, she also took classes at the University of Texas, worked as a clerk of the State Banking Commission and later as a clerk in the judiciary committee, and served as assistant to the city attorney of Houston. She ran unsuccessfully for the state legislature in 1931 and later that year married William Pettus Hobby, a former governor of Texas (1917 to 1921) and the publisher of the Houston Post. After her marriage, Oveta Hobby immersed herself in the paper. She reviewed books, edited copy, and wrote editorials. She held the title of book editor from 1933 to 1936, assistant editor from 1936 to 1938, and executive vice president beginning in 1938. In addition, she published a text on parliamentary procedure, Mr. Chairman (1937), that was widely adopted by public schools in Texas and Louisiana.

In June 1941, Gen. David Searles asked Hobby to organize a section on women's activities for the army. Beginning in July 1941, she worked in Washington, D.C., as a dollar-a-year head of the Women's Interest Section of the War Department's Bureau of Public Relations. In September of that year, Gen.

George C. Marshall asked Hobby to plan a women's army. The following May, Congress created the Women's Auxiliary Army Corps (WAACS), and Secretary of War Henry Stimson appointed Hobby its director with the rank of major. In July 1943, she was promoted to colonel. The unit received full status in the army in late 1943, and the term "Auxiliary" was dropped from its title. By the end of the war, at least 100,000 women had served in the WAC. Hobby resigned from the corps one month after V-E Day.

Hobby returned to private life as executive vice president of the Houston Post as well as director of KPRC radio and KPRC-TV. She helped organize Democrats for Eisenhower in Texas, and, following Eisenhower's victory in the election of 1952, he appointed her to head the Federal Security Agency (FSA). At the time of the appointment, Eisenhower already intended to consolidate all functions relating to health, education, and welfare into one department with cabinet rank and to make Hobby its head. In April 1953, the new Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) was created, and Hobby became only the second woman to serve in the cabinet.

Hobby opposed socialized medicine as “undemocratic and economically unsound,” but she nevertheless supported the administration’s “health reinsurance” plan. Introduced in 1954, the plan set up a fund that would be used to assume 75 percent of any “abnormal losses” incurred by any approved private health insurance carriers that resulted from offering coverage to high-risk customers. The purpose of the plan was to reduce the cost of insurance and thereby make it available to more people. Ever concerned about what it regarded as socialized medicine, the American Medical Association lobbied hard against the program. So, too, did the major insurance companies. Liberal Democrats, who advocated a more extensive, centralized program, also joined in the opposition. Thus, opponents in Congress from the left and right combined to kill the plan.

As head of the FSA and later HEW, Hobby became embroiled in a controversy over segregation in federally funded schools run on military installations for dependents of military personnel. Soon after the new administration took office, CLARENCE MITCHELL, the NAACP’s lobbyist on Capitol Hill, met with Hobby to protest the FSA’s cooperation with local authorities in maintaining segregation in such schools. Hobby opposed swift action to desegregate locally run schools on military bases, but Eisenhower overruled her. In June 1953, Rep. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.), charged that Hobby had “virtually countermanded” Eisenhower’s program for desegregating schools on military bases. An investigation by the White House staff indicated that there was some truth to the charge, and, once again, Eisenhower had to remedy the situation.

A strong anticommunist, Hobby supported the president’s loyalty and security program. In 1954, she reported that the department had dismissed 238 employees as “security risks,” of whom 114 were “suspected subversives.” According to HEW, security risks included persons who “drank or gossiped too much or were found to be unstable mentally.”

On April 12, 1955, Dr. Thomas Francis, Jr., director of the Poliomyelitis Vaccine Evaluation Center of the University of Michigan, announced the results of an extensive test demonstrating that a polio vaccine developed by Dr. JONAS SALK was “safe, effective, and potent.” That same day, the federal government licensed six manufacturers to produce the vaccine under the supervision of the Public Health Service (PHS). Two weeks later, the government announced that the manufacturers would produce enough of the vaccine to immunize every child under nine by August 1. Even before the results of the test were known, however, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis had purchased 9 million doses and announced that it would turn this over to state health officials to inoculate all children in first and second grades at no charge. On April 14, Eisenhower directed Hobby to establish a voluntary system to allocate the vaccine fairly. Hobby secured an agreement from the drug manufacturers to distribute the vaccine in accordance with the government’s plan once they had produced enough of the vaccine to fulfill the contract with the National Foundation.

The process was beset with problems. On April 27, the surgeon general temporarily banned the distribution of vaccine produced by one of laboratories after some people inoculated with that vaccine contracted polio. On May 6, the PHS halted the release of all new vaccine but recommended continuing injections with vaccine that had already been approved and distributed. The next day, the PHS ordered a suspension of vaccinations while it reexamined procedures for manufacturing and testing the vaccine. Further delays gave the impression of a program in chaos, and all the while the public was clamoring for the vaccine.

On May 16, Hobby sent a plan to the White House for distribution of the vaccine once the needs of the National Foundation’s program for free inoculations of first and second graders had been met. The plan called for manufacturers to allocate vaccine for each state and for the states to establish systems to distribute the vaccine. The federal government would appropriate $28 million to purchase vaccine for the poor. Democrats criticized Hobby for not producing a plan sooner. Sen. LISTER HILL (D-Ala.), who in May had introduced a bill to provide free inoculations for all children, led the charge. Sen. WAYNE MORSE (D-Oreg.) demanded that Hobby be dismissed for “gross incompetence.” Ultimately, the Senate passed Hill’s bill, and Eisenhower signed it in August.

In July 1955, at the height of the controversy over distribution of the Salk vaccine, Hobby resigned her cabinet post, citing her husband’s illness as the reason. The timing gave the appearance that she resigned under pressure. Eisenhower made a point of demonstrating his support, and Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY called her “the best man in the Cabinet.”

Hobby returned to the Houston Post as president and editor. She became chairman of the board of the Post in 1965 and held that position until she sold the paper in 1983. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, she served on the boards of numerous corporations and public bodies, including Mutual of New York, General Foods Corporation, Rice University, and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed her to the National Advisory Commission of Selective Service. Hobby died in Houston, Tex., on August 16, 1995.

Hodges, Luther H(artwell)

(1898–1974) governor of North Carolina

Born in Pittsylvania Co., Va., on March 9, 1898, Luther Hodges worked as an office boy while attending public school. He financed his studies at the University of North Carolina by selling books, firing furnaces, and waiting on tables. After serving in the army during World War I, Hodges returned to the university and graduated in 1919. That year, he became secretary to the general manager of Marshall Field & Co.’s eight textile mills in the Leaksville, Ky., area and rose through the company to become general manager of all Field textile mills in 1939. Three years later, he was elected a vice president.

In 1944, Hodges took charge of the textile division of the Office of Price Administration and in 1945 became a consultant to the secretary of agriculture. Retiring from the textile business in 1950, Hodges headed the industry division of the Economic Cooperation Administration and served as State Department consultant at the International Management Conference in 1951. With little previous political experience, Hodges was elected lieutenant governor of North Carolina in 1952. When Gov. William B. Umstead died in November 1954, Hodges succeeded him. Hodges won election in his own right in 1956.

Dissatisfied with North Carolina’s ranking of 44th out of the 48 states in per capita income, Hodges aggressively sought industrial development. In order to stimulate the state’s economy, he initiated programs to court out-of-state industries by offering tax incentives and by creating the North Carolina Business Development Corporation in 1955 to make long-term credit more accessible. During his term in office, over $1 billion was invested in the state, and 140,000 new jobs were created. In another attempt to attract business and foster economic development, North Carolina, under Hodges’s leadership, established a network of 18 industrial education centers. Later, these merged with a technical institute and two junior colleges to form the state’s community college system.

Hodges became governor only months after the Supreme Court ruled segregated public schools unconstitutional. Although a segregationist, Hodges opposed the most extreme demands for nullification of the ruling. Nevertheless, he protected himself from a segregationist challenge by preempting the issue. With Hodges’s backing, the legislature passed several measures in 1955 designed to retain segregation in the state’s schools. A pupil placement law granted county and city boards the power to assign pupils to schools. This gave localities the option to comply with the Supreme Court’s ruling but, at the same time, made it more difficult to achieve desegregation through litigation. Another measure transferred ownership and operation of state school buses to local school districts and undermined tenure by replacing continuing contracts for teachers with yearly contracts. In 1956, Hodges called a special session of the legislature to enact measures designed to prevent integration. The special session resulted in a new law allowing for local elections to close public schools in “intolerable situations” and another providing tuition grants for students attending private segregated schools.

Hodges also played a significant role in the crisis involving the desegregation of Central High School in Little Rock, Ark. The Southern Governors Conference was meeting in September 1957, when President Eisenhower sent federal troops to enforce a federal court order to admit black students to Central High. The conference authorized a committee of five, chaired by Hodges, to ask the president to withdraw the troops. When the delegation met with Eisenhower on October 1, Hodges challenged the desirability, rather than the legality, of sending the troops. Eisenhower replied that he would withdraw the federal troops if the governor of Arkansas, ORVAL FAUBUS, would agree to maintain order and carry out the court's mandate. The governors contacted Faubus, who agreed to announce that "the orders of the federal court will not be obstructed." Instead, Faubus, sent a wire declaring that he would resume responsibility for maintaining order and that "the orders of the federal court will not be obstructed by me." Eisenhower pronounced the wire "worthless." That evening, Eisenhower issued a statement thanking the southern governors for their efforts and explaining that Faubus had failed to commit himself to "use his full powers as Governor to prevent the obstruction of the orders of the . . . District Court." The next day, Faubus held a news conference and refused to give an inch, in spite of the urging of the committee of southern governors. Several members of the committee openly expressed their disapproval of Faubus. Hodges simply reported the failure of the negotiations in a nationwide broadcast and terminated his personal involvement. Federal troops remained in Little Rock until late November; federalized elements of the Arkansas National Guard remained on duty until the end of the school year.

During the latter part of the decade, Hodges continued to build up North Carolina's industry, developed the state's "research triangle" (consisting of the University of North Carolina, North Carolina State College, and Duke University), supported the minimum wage, and furthered highway safety.

During the presidential campaign of 1960, Hodges actively supported Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY's (D-Mass.) candidacy. Hodges served as secretary of commerce from 1961 to 1965. He was not an especially influential member of the cabinet. After leaving government service, he returned to business, assuming the directorships of several major corporations. He died of a heart attack in Chapel Hill, N.C., on October 6, 1974.

Hoffa, James R(iddle)

(1913–ca. 1975) union leader

The son of an itinerant coal driller, Hoffa was born in Brazil, Ind., on February 13, 1913. After the death of his father in 1920, Hoffa moved with his family to Detroit. He left school after the ninth grade to help support the family and worked as a stock boy in a department store and a freight handler in a grocery store. While working at the latter job, he organized his fellow workers into a labor union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (AFL). In 1934, he took his local into the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and became a full-time organizer for the Teamsters. He became president of the local in 1937. That same year, Hoffa helped Farrell Dobbs, a radical Teamster from Minneapolis, set up the Central States Drivers Council. Hoffa became its chairman in 1940. That same year, Hoffa became president of the Michigan Conference of Teamsters. The next year, at the behest of the national leader of the Teamsters, Dan Tobin, Hoffa led goon squads to prevent Dobbs and his supporters from taking the Central Conference of Teamsters out of the AFL and into the more militant Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). When the CIO led a counterattack against Hoffa's base in Detroit, Hoffa allegedly sought help from Santo Perrone and "Scarface Joe" Bommarito, two gangsters based in Detroit.

Links to organized crime would color the rest of Hoffa's career. He stood trial in 1946 for extortion. The indictment alleged that he took part in a conspiracy to compel small grocers to purchase "permits" from the Teamsters to make deliveries with their own trucks. As part of a plea bargain, the charges were reduced and Hoffa received two years probation, in exchange for which he made restitution to the grocers. In 1951, the Kefauver crime commission exposed evidence that a Detroit local of the Teamsters acted as a front for organized crime to extort money from jukebox distributors.

Hoffa represented the contradictory traditions of militant trade unionism and corrupt business unionism. Although he obtained good settlements for his workers, Hoffa had no reservations about using strong-arm tactics to win contracts or to defeat rivals within the labor movement. His alliance with organized crime figures enabled Hoffa to intimidate workers, unionists, and employers. In addition, his connections with organized crime figures in other Midwestern cities enabled Hoffa to expand his geographic base. For example, in 1949 Hoffa worked out an agreement with PAUL "RED" DORFMAN, a former member of Al Capone's organization, that allowed Hoffa to expand his operations in Chicago. In exchange, Dorfman's son, Allan, was appointed insurance broker for the Central States Drivers Council's health and welfare fund.

Although his strength in the central states gave him a base from which he might have challenged Seattle's Dave Beck to succeed Tobin as president of the Teamsters in 1952, Hoffa supported Beck. In return, Beck gave Hoffa a free hand in the Midwest. Hoffa became one of nine vice presidents of the Teamsters in 1952 and president of the Central Conference of Teamsters the following year. By the middle of the decade, Hoffa had become the undisputed boss of the Teamsters in the Midwest. He personally approved all strikes, and an order from him could tie up all trucking in the region. He also controlled the finances of the Central States Drivers Council.

Hoffa used a web of political contacts as well as violence and intimidation to prevent authorities from interfering with his operations. Internal opponents encountered the same obstacles. Dissidents within the Teamsters found no support from Beck, and local officials, who were either on the take from Hoffa or intimidated by him, refused to prosecute those charged with intimidating dissidents.

In the second half of the 1950s, Hoffa extended his power to the East Coast and throughout the nation. He moved first to gain control of the Teamsters in the New York metropolitan area. With the help of two reputed organized crime figures, Tony "Ducks" Corallo and Johnny Dio, Hoffa set up a number of paper locals that gave him a majority on the local representative body, the Teamsters

Jimmy Hoffa, 1959 (Library of Congress)

Joint Council. He also secured control of the Philadelphia locals. Through an alliance with Tony Provenzano, an official of the Teamsters in New Jersey and a reputed mobster, Hoffa established his power in that state. In addition, Hoffa established ties with the International Longshoremen's Association, a union expelled from the AFL because of its corruption. This enabled Hoffa to tie up not only trucking but also the docks on the East Coast. When charges of corruption forced Beck to resign in 1957, Hoffa became president of the Teamsters. Some even believed that Hoffa leaked the evidence that discredited Beck.

Beginning in 1957, the Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Sen. JOHN L. McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), conducted an extended investigation into Hoffa's activities as leader of the Teamsters. ROBERT F. KENNEDY, the committee's majority counsel, supervised the investigation and led the questioning of witnesses. The hearings documented Hoffa's ties with organized crime. On numerous occasions, Kennedy listed names of racketeers on Hoffa's payroll and asked if Hoffa was aware of their past and if he intended to remove them from their positions. Hoffa promised to dismiss those tied to organized crime, but he never did. The panel also uncovered evidence of how Teamsters officials enriched themselves by extorting money from companies with which the Teamsters had contracts in exchange for labor peace. Employers paid off the Teamsters officials by putting them on the payroll for nonexistent jobs. The committee further found that Hoffa personally profited from his connections with the Teamsters. Under his wife's name, he was part owner of a trucking business. The Taft-Hartley Act prohibited union officials from owning businesses with which their unions bargained. Hoffa also borrowed union money for personal investments by having a union member take out a loan and transfer it to him. Hoffa then invested the money, often in his wife's maiden name. On his income tax form, Hoffa annually listed $10,000 as "collections." At hearings, he told Kennedy that he won the money at the racetrack, but many believed that it came from kickbacks from employers who received favorable treatment from Hoffa and the union.

During the lengthy probe into his activities, Hoffa developed techniques to evade questioning. He conveniently could not remember transactions, events, and people. He dodged questions by expounding on his philosophy of labor relations. He scheduled plane flights for just after a hearing to limit questioning. Although his conduct frustrated members of the committee, enough evidence of Hoffa's wrongdoing emerged to convince Congress of the need for legislation to prevent corruption in organized labor. In 1959, Congress passed the Landrum-Griffin Act, which prevented individuals with criminal records from holding positions of leadership in unions. It also increased fines and prison sentences for union officials convicted of misusing union funds.

In 1957, the AFL-CIO expelled Hoffa and his union for unethical practices. The action did not bother Hoffa, who believed that, because the Teamsters was the largest union in the federation, it would hurt the AFL-CIO more than it would the Teamsters. The AFL-CIO would have to do without dues from the Teamsters, and the Teamsters would benefit from keeping the money. Moreover, Hoffa had cultivated contacts with leading officials of the AFL-CIO, and, in spite of GEORGE MEANY's order to isolate the Teamsters, leaders of the AFL-CIO did not cooperate.

During the late 1950s, the federal government tried to bring criminal charges against Hoffa. He was indicted for attempting to bribe a lawyer on the staff of the Senate committee investigating him. Although the case seemed open-and-shut, a Washington jury acquitted Hoffa. Halfway through the trial, a black newspaper featuring a pro-Hoffa article on the cover was delivered to the homes of black jurors. The great black fighter, Joe Louis, came to court and had his picture taken with his friend, Jimmy Hoffa. In addition, it later came out that four members of the jury had criminal records. In 1958, Hoffa was indicted twice for wiretapping fellow Teamsters. The first case ended in a hung jury; the second ended with an acquittal.

As president of the Teamsters, Hoffa centralized leadership of the union, expanded organizing activities, and moved into organization of white-collar employees. When ROBERT F. KENNEDY became attorney general in 1961, the Justice Department embarked on a relentless campaign against Hoffa. Hoffa was convicted of jury tampering and fraud in 1963 and 1964. Nevertheless, he managed to negotiate the first national contract in the trucking industry in 1964. Having exhausted his appeals, Hoffa began serving an eight-year prison sentence for jury tampering followed by an additional five years for fraud. He left the Teamsters in the hands of Frank Fitzsimmons, a loyal assistant, who had been vice president of the Teamsters since 1966. Nevertheless, Hoffa did not resign the presidency, and some speculated that he continued to exercise influence from prison. He retired in June 1971, upon which he received the title president emeritus and an award of $1.7 million in lieu of a pension. In December of that year, President RICHARD NIXON pardoned him on the condition that Hoffa not engage in union affairs until 1980. Before long, however, Hoffa initiated legal action in an effort to invalidate the provision keeping him out of union affairs. He also engaged in a feud with Fitzsimmons.

On July 30, 1975, Hoffa left a restaurant in the Detroit area. He called his wife and told her that Anthony Giacalone, an alleged member of organized crime in Detroit, had failed to meet him. Hoffa was never seen or heard from again.

Hoffer, Eric

(1902–1983) philosopher and longshoreman

The only child of Alsatian immigrants, Hoffer was born in the Bronx, N.Y., on July 25, 1902. German was his first language, and he spoke English with a heavy accent. At the age of nine, he lost his eyesight; it inexplicably returned when he was 15. Hoffer never attended school. He lost both parents while he was still young. His mother died when Hoffer was a young boy, and, when his father died in 1920, Hoffer left New York for southern California. He lived for 10 years on skid row in Los Angeles, working at odd jobs and borrowing books from the public library to educate himself. He spent another 10 years picking crops in the valleys of California, during which time he borrowed books from libraries located along the rail lines. When the United States entered World War II, Hoffer attempted to join the military but was rejected because of a hernia. Instead, in an attempt to aid the war effort, he went to work as a longshoreman in San Francisco. He worked there until his retirement in 1967.

Steady employment enabled him to organize the ideas he had developed during 20 years of reading and travel into a book, published by Harpers in 1951, The True Believer. In it, he contemplated the origins of mass movements, from religions to Soviet communism and German fascism. The book reflected Hoffer's focus on the threat of totalitarianism, especially as manifested in Hitler's Germany and Stalin's Soviet Union. Hoffer found the origins of these "madhouses" in human psychology. He argued that fanaticism derived from frustration born of insecurity and self-hatred. Fanaticism found fertile soil in those who would commit themselves to any cause that offered significance to their meaningless lives. Mass movements, maintained Hoffer, offered "a flight from the self." Hoffer wrote: "A man is likely to mind his own business when it is worth minding. When it is not, he takes his mind off his own meaningless affairs by minding other people's business." The book won wide critical acclaim and a large audience; its admirers included President DWIGHT EISENHOWER. Hoffer went on to write 10 more books. His second book, The Passionate State of Mind (1955), which featured a collection of philosophical aphorisms, also focused on the threat posed by totalitarianism and the true believer.

In the 1960s, Hoffer conducted seminars as an adjunct instructor at the University of California at Berkeley. He also published prolifically. The Ordeal of Change (1963), regarded by some as his best work, dealt with the fear of the new. The Temper of Our Time (1967) collected previously published pieces of social commentary. Working and Thinking on the Waterfront (1969) was a daily journal. Hoffer became something of a celebrity when he appeared on a television special with Eric Severeid on CBS in 1967. On the program, Hoffer praised the embattled president, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, who invited Hoffer to the White House. This increased Hoffer's fame, but it also diminished his reputation with liberal intellectuals. That reputation took another blow when, serving as a member of Johnson's Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence from 1968 to 1969, Hoffer scolded black witnesses.

He continued to publish until the end of his life. His later works included: First Things, Last Things (1976), Before the Sabbath (1979), Between the Devil and the Dragon (1982), and Truth Imagined (1983). Hoffer was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom on February 23, 1983, and died in San Francisco on May 29 of that same year.

Hoffman, Clare E(uгене)

(1875–1967) U.S. congressman; chairman, Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments; chairman, Government Operations Committee

Born in Vicksburg, Pa., on September 10, 1875, Hoffman attended public schools and received an LL.B. from Northwestern University in 1895. He intended to gain admission to the Michigan bar, but he was too young, so he took some business courses at Valparaiso University. In 1896 he was admitted to the bar in Michigan and commenced the practice of law in Allegan, Mich. He served as prosecuting attorney of Allegan Co. from 1904 to 1910. After that, he served as an attorney for the city. Hoffman chaired the Republican Party in Allegan Co. for several decades before he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1934. His campaign emphasized individual initiative, and he maintained that business, unencumbered by the federal government, offered the best means to end the depression. He won election to 13 succeeding Congresses.

A conservative and an isolationist, Hoffman voted against most New Deal measures, including both Agricultural Adjustment Acts, Social Security, and the Wagner Act. He also earned the enmity of organized labor for a number of positions he took. Hoffman was the most vehement congressional critic of the sit-down strike in Flint, Mich., in 1937, and advocated the use of troops to end it. He also attacked the Congress of Industrial Organizations and its leader, JOHN L. LEWIS. Before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hoffman repeatedly voted against measures that he feared would lead to American involvement in World War II, such as the Lend-Lease Act and the Selective Service Act. After Pearl Harbor, he supported defense measures.

After the war, Hoffman bitterly opposed many of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's policies. He criticized Truman for failing to root out communists in the government and became an outspoken supporter of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Hoffman also opposed a Fair Employment Practices Commission, legislation to abolish the poll tax, and antilynching legislation as infringements on states' rights. In 1947, Hoffman became chair of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. In that capacity, he led investigations of the disposal of surplus war property, federal enforcement of antiracketeering legislation, and a meatpacking strike in the Midwest. He also could claim a large share of the credit for the National Security Act, which reorganized the military. Republican leaders waived the rule limiting members to service on one standing committee in order to allow Hoffman to hold on to his seat on the Education and Labor Committee. In January 1947, Hoffman introduced a bill that would have outlawed the closed shop, work slowdowns, picketing, dues, checkoffs, and certain types of strikes. Many of his ideas did not make it into the Taft-Hartley Act, passed later that year. Hoffman voted for the measure but considered it barely adequate.

The elections of 1952 put a Republican in the White House and gave the party control of both houses of Congress. Once again chair of the Committee on Expenditures, the name of which had been changed to the Committee on Government Operations, Hoffman focused his attention on gangsterism in labor unions, which he described as "twice as dangerous to the country" as communism. Hoffman appointed a special subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee, which included himself, to cooperate with a panel of the Education and Labor Committee in an investigation of labor corruption in Kansas City. In September, he signed the joint subcommittee's report recommending that a federal grand jury investigate. Hoffman also investigated JIMMY HOFFA of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. Some of the evidence Hoffman developed was later used to help convict Hoffa of misusing union pension funds in 1964.

Hoffman came into conflict with other members of the Government Operations Committee when he asked chairs of subcommittees to reduce their staffs and expenditures after July 31, 1953. In retaliation, the committee voted 23-1 to limit Hoffman's power to appoint ad hoc panels for special investigations. On July 29, the full House voted 171-6 to allow the subcommittees of the Government Operations Committee to spend all the funds allotted to them.

Even with a Republican in the White House, Hoffman found much to criticize. He was one of the few Republican representatives to vote against the Eisenhower administration's civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. In 1957, he also opposed a bill, sponsored by the administration, to provide federal aid for school construction. Along with five other Republicans on the Education and Labor Committee, Hoffman asserted that the classroom shortage was "nowhere near as serious" as supporters of the measure contended and that states and localities could cope with whatever needs existed. In 1960 Hoffman denounced a minimum-wage bill.

After 1955, with the Democrats again in control of Congress, Hoffman lost much of his ability to influence legislation. The Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959 limited secondary boycotts and picketing, ideas Hoffman had long advocated.

Hoffman was one of the few isolationist members of Congress of the 1930s who continued to take an isolationist position during the 1950s. In 1955, he abstained in the vote on the administration's Formosa resolution, stating, "I think it is a declaration of war, and I don't think the cost in lives will justify it." Two years later, Hoffman voted against the Eisenhower Doctrine for the Middle East, declaring that "the minding of our own business" was more essential than ever.

As a member of the Republican right, Hoffman criticized the appointment in 1957 of MEADE ALCORN, an exponent of what President Eisenhower called "modern Republicanism," as Republican national chairman. Hoffman said that Alcorn's appointment meant the "conservative wing of the Republican Party . . . was being liquidated." Early in 1958, after the administration submitted a record $71.8-billion budget, he contended that President Eisenhower and "his left-wing, free-spending, international one-world advisers propose to disinfect, fumigate, purify, renovate, unify and remake the Republican Party."

His health failing, Hoffman chose not to run for reelection in 1962. He retired to his home in Allegan, Mich., where he died on November 3, 1967.

Hoffman, Paul G(ray)

(1891–1974) U.S. delegate to the United Nations

Paul Hoffman was born in Chicago on April 26, 1891, and grew up in Western Springs, Ill., a nearby suburb. He attended public schools in Western Springs and the University of Chicago, which he left after his freshman year. Hoffman then took a job with Halladay Cars in the Chicago suburbs and became a successful salesman. After moving to Los Angeles in 1911, he began selling Studebaker automobiles, and by 1915 Hoffman became district sales manager. He served in the army during World War I, rising from private to first lieutenant.

After leaving the service, he returned to California and to Studebaker. In 1919, he purchased Studebaker's distributorship for southern California. By 1925, when Hoffman became vice president in charge of sales, he was reportedly doing $7 million worth of business annually. Its business curtailed by the Great Depression, Studebaker went into receivership in 1933. Hoffman helped draft the reorganization plan, and the company emerged from receivership two years later with Hoffman as its president. Hoffman held that post for 13 years. He maintained good relations with labor unions, emphasized fuel efficiency, and became a leading advocate for automobile safety. He persuaded other automakers to create and finance the Automotive Safety Foundation and became its first president. During World War II, Studebaker made airplane engines and heavy military trucks. After the war, Studebaker emerged as the most successful of the smaller automakers.

Hoffman had always believed that corporate executives should involve themselves in civic affairs. He became chairman of United China Relief in 1942. He also helped found the American Policy Commission (APC), a group of scholars, business leaders, and leaders of organized labor formed to seek solutions to current economic problems. During the war, the APC changed its name to the Committee for Economic Development (CED), and Hoffman became chairman. After the war, the CED concentrated on ensuring economic freedom but, at the same time, supported many reforms of the New Deal as well as governmental measures to expand international trade. A strong internationalist, Hoffman lobbied for the Marshall Plan, and in 1948 HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Hoffman to be the first administrator of the European Recovery Program. In that capacity, Hoffman oversaw the distribution of approximately $10 billion for the economic development of Europe. A highly efficient administrator, Hoffman also demonstrated skill in dealing with members of Congress and European officials.

In November 1950, with the European Recovery Program well under way, Hoffman accepted an offer to become the first president of the Ford Foundation. During his time at the foundation, he initiated programs designed to deal with social problems such as poverty and racial injustice. He particularly expanded its operations in the area of education. The foundation's Fund for the Advancement of Education spent about $6 million a year on travel and study fellowships for high school and college teachers and on expanded liberal arts programs for students. In addition, the Ford Foundation for Adult Education spent over $25 million, a third of which went for educational radio and television, between 1951 and 1955. Under Hoffman's leadership, the foundation also created programs to aid Eastern European individuals and groups fleeing from or resisting communism.

In the early 1950s, Hoffman became an outspoken defender of civil liberties. His public denunciation of Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) brought criticism and congressional scrutiny to the Ford Foundation.

Hoffman was an early, enthusiastic supporter of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for president. As far back as 1949, he tried to persuade the general to run, believing that Eisenhower was the one man who could unite postwar America and lead a "moral crusade" to return the country to traditional values. In addition, Hoffman saw Eisenhower as a man able to reorient the Republican Party. "I think," he said, "[Eisenhower] is going to put 'new heart' in the Republican Party and recast it in the image of Abraham Lincoln. We can use a party which takes its orders neither from the NAM [National Association of Manufacturers] nor the CIO [Congress of Industrial Organizations]."

As chairman of the Advisory Committee of Citizens for Eisenhower in 1952, Hoffman, along with HENRY CABOT LODGE, led the efforts to persuade Eisenhower to run for the Republican presidential nomination. During March 1952, Hoffman campaigned for the general in New Hampshire, where Eisenhower's name had been entered on the primary ballot without his public consent. Hoffman told a large audience at the University of New Hampshire that a vote for Eisenhower was the only way to ensure the continuance of a vital two-party system. After Eisenhower's dramatic victory in the New Hampshire primary, Hoffman spent several days with the general in Europe, persuading him to return to the United States and campaign openly. During the primary and the general election race, Hoffman gave a considerable number of speeches and press conferences. He repeatedly made the case that only Eisenhower could unify the Republican Party; ensure peace by negotiating with the Soviets; win the votes of the South, independents, and youths; and restore the domestic economy.

In early 1953, trustees of the Ford Foundation pressed Hoffman to resign, in large part because of his political activities. Hoffman returned to Studebaker as chairman of the board, only to discover that the company had problems with production, sales, and labor relations. After negotiating a merger with Packard, he yielded control to a new management team. During this time, Hoffman maintained a close personal relationship with the new president and served as an adviser. He also served as chairman of the Fund for the Republic, an organization dedicated to protecting civil liberties. In 1954, Hoffman urged Eisenhower to attack McCarthy directly. At the same time, he also criticized the administration for what he considered its reluctance to rid itself of subversive elements.

Hoffman urged Eisenhower to run for reelection in 1956, despite the president's earlier heart attack, and campaigned vigorously for Eisenhower's reelection. Sometimes his zeal for Eisenhower and modern Republicanism proved embarrassing. In an article that appeared in the October issue of Collier's, Hoffman described what he saw as Eisenhower's concern for transforming the Republican Party from a series of factions into a unified party. Hoffman maintained that Eisenhower could "achieve something unique in American politics, a party that is fundamentally pressure-proof; something profoundly superior to its rival, the Democratic Party, whose irreconcilable differences leave it permanently open to the pressures of contending narrow interest groups." Hoffman maintained that, although the president had unified the party to a great degree, "senators claiming the label Republican who embrace none or very little of the Eisenhower program and philosophy" remained within the party. He divided these individuals into "unappeasables," including McCarthy, Sen. WILLIAM E. JENNER (R-Ind.), and HERMAN WELKER (R-Ida.) and "faint hopes," including Sen. BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.). Upset by the article, Goldwater asked presidential aide SHERMAN ADAMS to clarify his standing with Eisenhower. Adams assured him that Eisenhower did not intend to avoid him. The president also assured Republicans that there was room for dissent within the party.

In 1956, Eisenhower appointed Hoffman a member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations General Assembly. Conservatives, led by McCarthy, predictably opposed the nomination. Nevertheless, he won confirmation in July. During his tenure, he urged the UN to form a permanent military force. In March 1959, Hoffman called on the developed nations to increase their private and public foreign aid by 100 to 400 percent over the next 10 years to promote peace. He asked the United States in particular to raise aid from $1.4 billion per year to an aggregate of $30 to $40 billion over the next 10 years.

In 1958, Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld named Hoffman director of the new UN Special Fund to assist the economic development of poor and underdeveloped nations. The post required him to raise $250 million in contributions from member nations annually. Hoffman advocated a capitalist approach to economic development and insisted that the program's fund must be used as seed money. After 1966, the Special Fund became known as the UN Development Program. Hoffman retired from the UN in 1972.

In addition to his career in business and government, he wrote several books, including Marketing Used Cars (1929), Peace Can Be Won (1951), and World Without Want (1962). Hoffman died in New York City on October 8, 1974.

Hoffman, Walter E(dward)
(1907–1996) U.S. district judge

Born in Jersey City, N.J., on July 18, 1907, Walter Hoffman graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1928 and received his law degree from Washington and Lee University in 1931. He then entered private practice in Norfolk, Va. A Republican who made unsuccessful races for Congress and for state attorney general, he was among the first party leaders in Virginia to support DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952. At the Republican National Convention in Chicago, Hoffman's firmness in backing the general within the divided Virginia delegation reportedly contributed to Eisenhower's nomination. Eisenhower appointed Hoffman the U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Virginia in 1954. Hoffman took his seat that September.

On the bench, Judge Hoffman insisted on compliance with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the school desegregation case of May 1954. In September 1956, the Virginia legislature passed a series of laws designed to thwart school desegregation, including a pupil-placement act and a measure requiring the governor to close any public school faced with a final desegregation order. In January 1957, Hoffman held the pupil-placement law unconstitutional because it took race into consideration in the process of assigning pupils to schools. The next month, he enjoined school officials in Norfolk, Va., from assigning students to schools based on race. The order was stayed pending appeal. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit upheld Hoffman's decision, and the Supreme Court denied certiorari on October 21, 1957.

Hoffman ruled in June 1958 that his order should take effect no later than the beginning of the school year that fall. In July, the school board established criteria for evaluating the applications of black students applying to previously all-white schools. The criteria included academic, physical, and moral fitness as well as social adaptability. One hundred fifty-one black pupils applied for admission to previously all-white schools. On August 18, however, the State Supreme Court of Appeals issued an order restraining the schools from enrolling or placing students in Norfolk's public schools. That same day, the school board rejected all of the applicants. Although many were rejected on academic or technical grounds, 24 students applied to attend schools in areas where racial tensions were high, and the school board decided that assigning them to these schools would create "racial conflicts and grave administrative problems." The school board found that four more students would be so racially isolated in the schools to which they applied that they would suffer psychological harm. Of the students who applied for a transfer, 30 petitioned Hoffman to set aside the school board's decision. On August 25, Hoffman instructed the board that achievement tests and interviews could be used in determining suitability for transfer if they were fairly administered. Racial tension or the isolation of black students, however, did not constitute valid grounds for refusing a transfer. Hoffman ordered the board to reconsider the requests for transfer and to report back to him on August 29. The school board reluctantly agreed to assign 17 black students to six formerly all-white schools. At the same time, the board delayed the opening of schools until September 22, appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and filed a motion requesting postponement of Hoffman's desegregation order until September 1959. Hoffman denied the motion on September 2 but reserved the right to reconsider his action pending the Supreme Court's decision in the case arising out of the desegregation crisis in Little Rock, Ark. (Aaron v. Cooper). The Supreme Court handed down its decision in Aaron v. Cooper on September 12, and on September 18, Hoffman filed a memorandum declaring that "there is no longer any legal or justifiable reason further to consider defendant's request for a one year deferment." The school board postponed the opening of the city's secondary schools until September 29 and asked the chief judge of the Fourth Circuit, SIMON E. SOBELOFF, for a stay of Hoffman's order; Sobeloff denied the stay but offered to convene a special session to hear an appeal on the merits of the case. The Fourth Circuit heard the appeal on September 27 and on the same day issued a decision affirming Hoffman's order.

Gov. J. LINDSAY ALMOND, JR., responded to the Fourth Circuit's decision by closing the six junior and senior high schools involved. Faced with court orders to desegregate elsewhere in the state, Almond closed schools in other districts. By the end of September, roughly 13,000 students had been locked out of public schools throughout Virginia. As a result, moderates began to exert pressure to end Virginia's policy of "massive resistance."

On January 19, 1959, both a three-judge federal court in Richmond (consisting of Sobeloff and CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH, JR., from the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals and Hoffman) and the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals handed down decisions declaring Virginia's school-closing law unconstitutional.

The governor then called a special session of the state legislature, which repealed the massive-resistance laws but passed other, less transparently defiant laws to try to discourage school desegregation. In Norfolk, after final orders from Hoffman, 17 black students finally began attending the reopened white public schools on February 2, 1959.

Hoffman also ruled against segregation in cases not involving the school system. In July 1955, for example, he ordered the desegregation of Virginia's Seashore State Park. Hoffman granted a preliminary injunction in August 1956 that prohibited the city of Portsmouth from operating a golf course that did not admit blacks. In January 1958, Hoffman joined a majority on a three-judge panel that found three of Virginia's anti-NAACP laws unconstitutional.

Hoffman's commitment to follow the rulings of the Supreme Court made him a favorite target for verbal abuse from Virginia's segregationists. He received a flood of phone calls and letters denouncing him, and he was socially ostracized. In response, Hoffman declared, "I will do my duty if it costs me my last friend on earth."

Norfolk began token desegregation of its schools in 1959, but the NAACP continued to challenge in court the city's plan for limited and gradual desegregation. The litigation finally ended in March 1966, when Hoffman approved a desegregation plan that resulted from negotiations between the school board, the NAACP, and the Justice Department.

Hoffman served as chief judge for the Eastern District of Virginia from 1961 to 1973. The chief judge of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals selected Hoffman to preside over the criminal trial of Vice President Spiro T. Agnew in 1973. Hoffman also served as the director of the Federal Judicial Center. He took senior judge status in 1974 and continued to sit until his death in Norfolk, Va., on November 21, 1996.

Hofstadter, Richard (1916–1970) historian

The son of a Jewish immigrant father and a Protestant mother, Richard Hofstadter was born in Buffalo, N.Y., on August 6, 1916. He grew up in that city, attended public schools, and graduated with honors from the University of Buffalo in 1937. Under pressure from his family, he prepared for a career in law. He worked as a clerk for Judge Irving R. Kauffmann and enrolled at the New York School of Law, but he found the study of law uninteresting and performed poorly. After one term, he withdrew and entered the graduate program in history at Columbia University, where he earned his Ph.D. in 1942. Both as an undergraduate and as a graduate student, he was involved in leftist politics and may have become a member of the communist party for a brief while. By 1939, however, he had become disillusioned with the communist party and with Marxism. At the same time, he maintained his intense dislike for capitalism. Hofstadter came to identify himself as a critic of liberalism from within the liberal tradition. As a graduate student, Hofstadter taught at Brooklyn College and the City University of New York. He defended his doctoral dissertation, "Social Darwinism in American Thought, 1860–1915," in 1942 and that same year took his first full-time academic appointment at the University of Maryland. Hofstadter returned to Columbia University as an assistant professor in 1946. He became a full professor in 1952.

Hofstadter published The American Political Tradition and the Men Who Made It in 1948. A collection of incisive, iconoclastic profiles of those who shaped American political history from the founders of the republic to Franklin D. Roosevelt, the book maintained that American leaders, despite disagreements on specific issues, "shared a belief in the rights of property, the philosophy of economic individualism, the value of competition." The book won a Pulitzer Prize and became assigned reading for a generation of students of American history.

Hofstadter's emphasis on the common assumptions and values held by Americans over time, rather than the conflicts that divided them, was a common theme of a group of postwar American historians known as the "consensus" school. Unlike those members of the consensus school who celebrated the fundamental accord they found in the American experience, however, Hofstadter never denied the reality of conflict in American history, and he criticized the inflexibility and intellectual stagnation he believed consensus imposed on American political life.

In the 1950s, Hofstadter emerged as a leading academic critic and analyst of the American right and Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). In the spring of 1954, the directors of the American Civilization Program at Barnard College invited Hofstadter gave a talk on political dissent. He chose as his topic right-wing or, as he called it, pseudo-conservative dissent. The lecture was published in The American Scholar and later included in Daniel Bell's The New American Right (1955). In that highly influential essay, "The Pseudo-Conservative Revolt," Hofstadter wrote that "although they believe themselves to be conservatives and usually employ the rhetoric of conservatism," the people he identified as "pseudo-conservatives" demonstrated "signs of a serious and restless dissatisfaction with American life, traditions, and institutions." This manifested itself in pseudo-conservatives' "hyper-patriotism and hyper-conformism," their belief in an internal conspiracy permeating American life, their accusations that national leaders were guilty of betrayal, and their desire for authoritarian solutions. Indeed, "in the name of upholding traditional American values and institutions and in the process of defining them against more or less fictitious dangers," pseudo-conservatives "consciously or unconsciously aim[ed] at their abolition." Thus, they had "little in common with the temperate and compromising spirit of true conservatism."

While not denying the economic and political causes of this discontent, Hofstadter stressed its social and psychological elements. For Hofstadter, "the rootlessness and heterogeneity of American life" led to "a peculiar scramble for status" and a secure identity. This, in turn, gave rise to pseudo-conservatism's focus on "status politics," rather than traditional "interest politics." Since, however, it was difficult to give pragmatic expression to status politics, Hofstadter concluded that such discontent found expression not in legislative proposals, but in "grousing." He located intense concerns over status in certain groups, among them old-stock Anglo-Saxons, who felt displaced in modern America, and certain ethnic groups, whose members experienced anxiety about their Americanism and felt a need to prove it. Both groups found satisfaction in advertising their patriotism and challenging the loyalty of others. A decade later, Hofstadter acknowledged that he had “overstated the role of certain ethnic minorities in the right wing” and ignored the role of religious fundamentalism.

By the mid-1950s, Hofstadter’s position had changed from that of The American Political Tradition. No longer did he criticize reform movements for the inadequacy and conservatism of their leadership. Instead, he drew connections between McCarthyism and what he regarded as earlier mass movements. In his widely read and enormously influential book, The Age of Reform: From Bryan to F.D.R. (1955), Hofstadter applied the critical concepts he had used to analyze the right wing in postwar America to Populism and Progressivism. He regarded the two movements suspiciously for responding emotionally rather than rationally to social change and for being motivated by status rather than economic concerns. Indeed, he found that elements of Populism and Progressivism, particularly Populism, seemed “very strongly to foreshadow some aspects of the cranky pseudo-conservatism” of the 1950s. According to Hofstadter, the Populists sought solace in a romanticized vision of America’s agrarian past, spun conspiracy theories, and succumbed to panaceas such as free silver. He argued that the origins of the Progressive impulse lay in the status anxieties of a middle class afraid of vulgar plutocrats above and urban immigrants below. Moreover, Hofstadter found cause for alarm in the provincialism, chauvinism, and anti-Semitism of the Populists and the moralistic nostalgia of the Progressives. Hofstadter won his second Pulitzer Prize for The Age of Reform.

By the end of the 1950s, Hofstadter had become one of the most highly regarded and widely read historians of his era. His work ranged over a wide variety of subjects, something made possible by the fact that his research consisted of extensive reading in the historical literature and examination of published primary sources rather than archival research. Hofstadter offered interpretations based in large part on historical imagination rather than carefully researched theses. His engaging prose style carried readers along, even when Hofstadter failed to offer substantial supporting evidence. Columbia University made him DeWitt Clinton Professor of American History in 1959.

In the 1960s, Hofstadter’s scholarship continued to reflect his perception of the relationship between current events and history. He unequivocally stated that Anti-Intellectualism in American Life (1963) “was conceived in response to the political and intellectual conditions of the 1950s.” In The Paranoid Style in American Politics (1965), he updated his analysis of “pseudo-conservatism” and offered a critique of the Goldwater phenomenon. He published two more traditional works of history, The Progressive Historians (1968) and The Idea of a Party System (1969), and was at work on a social history of America in the 18th century when he died of leukemia in New York City on October 24, 1970. A completed fragment of that work, America in 1750: A Social Portrait, was published posthumously in 1971.

Hogan, Frank S(mithwick)

(1902–1974) district attorney

The son of Irish immigrants, Frank Hogan was born in Waterbury, Conn., on January 17, 1902. He attended parochial school in Waterbury and worked his way through Columbia University, from which he graduated in 1924. After working for a year, he entered Columbia Law School, where he was an average student. Upon receiving his degree in 1928, Hogan joined a law firm in Manhattan’s financial district. After a short time, he left to begin his own practice, specializing in insurance and real estate law, with Anthony J. Liebler. The practice struggled to get by, and in 1935, Hogan joined the staff of THOMAS E. DEWEY, who had been appointed special prosecutor to investigate organized crime. Dewey gained fame for his successful prosecutions of the mobster Charles (“Lucky”) Luciano for racketeering and of James Hines, the Democratic party leader, for corruption. Dewey won election as district attorney for New York Co. (Manhattan), and when he took office in 1937, Hogan followed him as an assistant district attorney. When Dewey resigned to run for governor in 1941, Hogan gained the endorsement of the Republican, Democratic, and Labor parties and was elected to succeed him. Hogan won reelection every four years until 1973.

During his 32 years as Manhattan's district attorney, Hogan won acclaim as a model of an aggressive, nonpartisan prosecutor. He gained national attention for the successful prosecutions his office conducted against organized crime and corrupt politicians. In 1945, in the only case he personally tried as district attorney, Hogan won convictions against Joseph S. Fay and James Bove for corrupt union practices. After a years-long investigation of FRANK COSTELLO, the head of an organized crime family who had great influence with Tammany Hall, Hogan's office provided crucial information on Costello to Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER's Select Committee on Organized Crime. Hogan also secured convictions in 1951 against Joe Adonis, a gangster operating primarily in Brooklyn and New Jersey, and Frank Erickson ("King of the Bookmakers") in 1953. In addition, Hogan focused his attention on corrupt politicians. He oversaw the successful prosecution of James J. Moran, a deputy fire commissioner who had organized an extortion racket that victimized contractors with the city.

Hogan's office investigated and prosecuted some of the most highly publicized scandals of the 1950s, including college basketball's point-shaving scandal, the bribery ("payola") of radio disc jockeys, the television quiz-show scandals, and corruption in city government. During the 1960s, Hogan's office investigated payoffs in New York's State Liquor Authority and uncovered most of the evidence used by federal prosecutors to convict the city's water commissioner, James Marcus. In another famous incident, Hogan exposed Clifford Irving's scheme to profit from a fraudulent biography of HOWARD HUGHES.

Hogan twice ran for higher office. In 1949, Mayor William O'Dwyer, the Democratic incumbent, indicated that he would not seek reelection. Hogan gathered sufficient support, including that of Tammany Hall, to gain the nomination. O'Dwyer then changed his mind, and Hogan withdrew from the race. Hogan ran for reelection as district attorney instead and won easily.

In 1958, CARMINE DESAPIO, the boss of Tammany Hall, helped Hogan win the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate. DeSapio insisted on Hogan, perhaps because he wanted to choose a new district attorney, who would have the power to appoint over a hundred assistants. Two other Democrats, however, sought the nomination, former Secretary of the Air Force THOMAS K. FINLETTER and Thomas Murray, former head of the Atomic Energy Commission, who had the support of Gov. AVERELL HARRIMAN. Hogan took little part in the bitter struggle for the nomination, but DeSapio's raw exercise of power to secure the nomination for Hogan at the Democratic state convention created a backlash. While Hogan's personal integrity was not an issue, his links to DeSapio and Tammany Hall engendered hostility from reformers in the Democratic party and hurt him in the general election, which he lost to KENNETH B. KEATING.

For most of his years in office, Hogan was America's most famous prosecutor. He built a well-deserved reputation for personal honesty, and the office he headed was respected for both its integrity and competence. Hogan's office maintained a high conviction rate, and the talented young lawyers Hogan hired went on to occupy high positions in the legal profession and on the bench of New York. By the late 1960s, however, the luster began to fade. Some came to regard Hogan as overzealous and out of touch. More seriously, some accused Hogan of pursuing personal agendas. Two of his prosecutions proved particularly controversial. In the first of these, Hogan brought obscenity charges against the comedian Lenny Bruce in 1964. Although Hogan obtained a conviction, an appeals court overturned the decision, ruling that "it was error to hold that the performances were without social merit." In the second matter, Hogan, a proud and active alumnus of Columbia, insisted on prosecuting hundreds of students involved in protests at the university in 1968, even though the university had withdrawn the charges. Toward the end of Hogan's tenure, the Knapp commission exposed systemic corruption in New York City's police department. The commission criticized prosecutors for failing to move against that corruption aggressively.

Seeking vindication, Hogan ran for a ninth term in 1973, even though he suffered a disabling stroke that summer. For the first time in many years, he faced a serious opponent in the primary. Unable to return to work after the stroke, Hogan was forced to rely on aides to run his office. Voters nevertheless reelected him by a two-to-one margin. Hogan resigned as district attorney the day after Christmas, less than two months after his reelection. He died in New York City on April 2, 1974.

Holifield, Chet (Chester) (Earl)

(1903–1995) U.S. congressman

Born on December 3, 1903, in Mayfield, Ky., Holifield moved with his family to Springdale, Ark. He left high school before graduation, and after working in a tailor shop, established his own men's clothing business. He entered Democratic politics during the 1930s as a party leader in the Los Angeles area. In 1942, he won election as a Democrat to the U.S. House of Representatives from California's 19th district, a predominantly blue-collar area with a substantial Mexican-American population. On Capitol Hill, Holifield focused his attention on the problems of atomic energy development. A proponent of civilian control of the atom, he was placed on the newly created Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, which supervised the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) in 1947. During the mid and late 1940s, Holifield was an outspoken opponent of the House Un-American Activities Committee and defended AEC chairman David Lilienthal and Edward U. Condon, nuclear physicist and director of the National Bureau of Standards, against charges of being "soft on communism."

During the Eisenhower administration, Holifield emerged as a leading champion of public development of atomic energy. In 1954, he opposed an administration-backed bill permitting the AEC to license private construction of atomic power plants. Holifield charged that the bill, which proposed a five-year period of compulsory patent sharing, "would set a pattern of monopoly" in the industrial use of atomic energy and contended that the period should be extended to at least 10 years. He also objected to its limitations on the AEC's authority to produce power, to its allegedly insufficient safeguards for protecting the public interest, and to a "built-in subsidy" for industry in the provision for government purchase of privately produced nuclear materials. However, the legislation passed Congress in essentially the form requested by the administration.

In 1956, Holifield supported a bill authorizing $400 million for expanding the construction of reactors by the AEC. He asserted that the building of reactors during the experimental stage should be undertaken by government rather than by private enterprise. The administration opposed the bill, and in July the House, by a vote of 203 to 191, recommitted the bill to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Holifield was a leading critic of the controversial Dixon-Yates contract. The dispute began in 1954, when the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) proposed building a new steam plant at Fulton, Tenn., to supply power to the city of Memphis. The consumption of TVA power by the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) installations at Paduca meant that the city of Memphis would face a shortage of electricity within four years. Eisenhower, who preferred private development of power, could not see the justification for the federal government to pay for a plant to supply power to a particular city. He ordered JOSEPH DODGE, the director of the Bureau of the Budget, and LEWIS L. STRAUSS, chairman of the AEC, to explore the possibilities of having private industry build the plant. EDGAR H. DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company, organized the Mississippi Valley Generating Company to build a plant that would supply power to the TVA to replace the power the TVA sold to the AEC. The Dixon-Yates proposal was considered acceptable by the AEC, TVA, and the Bureau of the Budget, and, upon the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, Eisenhower approved it.

Holifield was prominent among a group of liberals who argued that the private power would cost more than that provided by TVA, and he charged that Eisenhower was using the AEC to subsidize a private utility and undermine the government-owned agency. After the Democrats gained control of Congress in 1955, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy recommended cancellation of the contract. When the city of Memphis decided to build its own municipal power plant, which freed up power from existing TVA facilities for use by the AEC, the administration cancelled the Dixon-Yates contract.

In 1953, Holifield served as a member of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government, chaired by former president HERBERT HOOVER. The commission's report of 1955 urged drastic cutbacks in many government activities. The leading dissident on the panel, Holifield charged the commission with exceeding its jurisdiction and distorting facts. He denounced its opposition to public power and its call for reductions in federal legal and lending services.

During 1957, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy's Special Subcommittee on Radiation, Holifield held hearings on the consequences of radioactive fallout from nuclear weapons. At the conclusion of the probe, he denounced the AEC for "playing down" the hazard of fallout. Meanwhile, in 1957 and 1958, the Government Operations Committee's Subcommittee on Military Operations, also chaired by Holifield, investigated civil defense policy. During the course of the hearings, Holifield emerged as a strong proponent of fallout shelters, and his subcommittee was instrumental in persuading the Office of Civil Defense to request $32 billion for the construction of shelters.

Holifield was one of the founders of a liberal House Democratic caucus in 1957. Among the measures the group endorsed were federal aid for housing, school construction, and medical education; assistance to depressed areas; repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act; and the elimination of the national origins system from immigration and naturalization laws. The caucus was formally organized as the Democratic Study Group in 1959, and, the following year, Holifield was chosen its chairman.

During the 1960s, Holifield rotated with Sen. JOHN O. PASTORE (D-R.I.) as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. In the early 1960s, he supported the Kennedy administration's program to spend billions of dollars on fallout shelters. A consistent supporter of nuclear power development, he also supported the administration's plan, passed by Congress in 1962, to permit the AEC to add electric generating facilities to its plutonium production reactor in Hanford, Wash. In 1970, Holifield supported appropriating $2 billion to develop a breeder reactor. After 1965, Holifield faced increasing criticism from former liberal allies for his support of the war in Vietnam and appropriation requests from the Pentagon. He became chair of the Government Operations Committee in 1971. In 1974, Holifield announced that he would not seek reelection. He returned to California, resumed the manufacture and sale of men's clothing, and died in Redlands, Calif., on February 6, 1995.

Hollister, John B(aker)

(1890–1979) executive director, Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch; director, International Cooperation Administration, State Department

Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 7, 1890, Hollister graduated from Saint Paul's School in Concord, N.H., and from Yale University in 1911. After studying at the University of Munich, he attended Harvard Law School, where he received his degree in 1915. He was admitted to the Ohio bar and began practice in Cincinnati that same year. Following service in the artillery during World War I, he helped administer U.S. relief in Poland and Lithuania. He returned to Ohio to practice law. In 1924 joined with his lifelong friend, ROBERT A. TAFT, Taft's brother Charles, and John Stettinius to form the partnership of Taft, Stettinius, and Hollister. Hollister won a special election in 1931 to fill a vacancy in the House of Representatives created by the death of Nicholas Longworth (R-Ohio). A conservative Republican, Hollister's position on the House Banking and Currency Committee gave him a platform to oppose many New Deal measures. He was reelected twice but lost his bid for reelection in 1936. He returned to his law practice in 1937 but remained active in Republican politics throughout the 1930s and 1940s.

In 1953, HERBERT HOOVER appointed Hollister executive director of the Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch. During the next two years, Hollister investigated the allocation of foreign aid by the State Department's Foreign Operations Administration (FOA). His report recommended cutting $360 million annually from foreign aid appropriations and increasing efficiency in the allotment of technical aid.

In April 1955, President Eisenhower, seeking to appease conservative Republicans, appointed Hollister head of the newly created International Cooperation Administration (ICA), a semiautonomous agency within the State Department that replaced the FOA. As director of the ICA, Hollister coordinated economic and military aid "except for matters which . . . requir[ed] final decision by the President."

As director, Hollister supported increased exports by Western nations to Soviet satellite nations in an effort to lessen their dependence on the USSR, a policy that drew the wrath of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Hollister refused to appear in open hearings before the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee on the issue but agreed to testify behind closed doors.

The administration requested that Congress appropriate $4.67 billion for mutual security for fiscal 1957, nearly $1.4 billion more than the amount authorized by Congress for the previous year and almost $2 billion more than Congress actually appropriated for foreign aid in fiscal 1956. The proposal encountered widespread opposition in Congress. In hearings before the House Foreign Affairs Committee in March and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in April, Hollister defended the administration's proposal. After much maneuvering, Congress appropriated $3.8 billion for the mutual security program in fiscal 1957. Conservative Republicans generally opposed foreign aid, and other members of Congress objected to giving aid to "neutralist" nations such as India and Yugoslavia. In addition, Congress made its greatest cuts in military assistance. Congress cut $73 million from Eisenhower's requests for nonmilitary assistance and $982 million from his request for $3 billion in military aid.

In 1957, the administration included the creation of a Development Loan Fund (DLF) in its proposals for the mutual assistance program for 1958. The DLF would make public loans for the purpose of economic development to Third World countries, and those loans would be repayable in local currencies. Once again, Congress substantially cut the president's requests, but it did approve a modified version of the DLF. Although he publicly defended the administration's foreign-aid program, Hollister, a conservative Republican, disagreed with the president on fundamental matters relating to foreign aid. After the passage of the foreign-aid bill, Hollister submitted his resignation in July 1957. Hollister's dissent became public as he was about to leave his post. In a directive issued on September 12, 1957, the day before his departure, Hollister criticized American assistance to government-owned enterprises. He argued that the ICA's policy was to administer American aid "in such a way as will encourage the development of the private sectors" of foreign countries.

After leaving the ICA, Hollister returned to his old law firm. He died in Cincinnati on January 4, 1979.

Hook, Sidney

(1902–1989) philosopher

The son of an immigrant Jewish garment worker, Sidney Hook was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., on December 20, 1902, and grew up in Williamsburg, a neighborhood populated by Jewish immigrants. He graduated from City College of New York in 1923 and earned his Ph.D. in 1927 from Columbia University, where he studied philosophy under John Dewey. The same year he earned his degree, Hook joined the philosophy department at New York University and published his dissertation, The Metaphysics of Pragmatism. He became chair of that department in 1934.

During the 1930s, Hook gained prominence both as a radical intellectual and an activist. He published a translation of Lenin's works in 1927. In 1932, Hook organized a group of intellectuals to endorse William Z. Foster, the communist candidate, for president. Soon after, however, Hook grew increasingly disgusted by the practices of the Communist Party (CP) and broke with it in 1933. He moved toward the independent socialism of A. J. MUSTE and helped organize the American Workers Party in 1933, which merged with the Trotskyists in 1934. Hook also produced a prodigious body of intellectual work. He published Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx (1933), in which he drew a distinction between Marx and Marxism (by which he meant the practice and official orthodoxy of the Soviet Union). The CP's harsh attacks on the book contributed to Hook's ultimate break with the party. In The Meaning of Marx (1934), Hook reinterpreted Marx's understanding of Hegel's dialectic in terms of pragmatism. Like much of Hook's writing at this point in his career, the book attempted to find common ground in Marx and Dewey. From Hegel to Marx (1936) explored the intellectual genesis of Marxism.

By the late 1930s, Hook had become an outspoken critic not only of Joseph Stalin but of communism. As the decade drew to a close, he began to draw parallels between Nazism and Stalinism as forms of totalitarianism. In particular, Hook vigorously attacked Soviet science and Stalin's purges, both of which violated his commitment to free and open discourse. In 1939, along with Dewey, NORMAN THOMAS, and other leftist intellectuals, Hook organized the Committee for Cultural Freedom and issued a manifesto critical of Stalin's Soviet Union. During these years, Hook also began to extend his critique to Marx and Marxist thought.

As the cold war got under way, Hook identified himself as a social democrat and a "Cold War liberal." He believed that the West, despite its flaws, represented the best hope of freedom and expounded his views in books as well as articles in the New York Times, Commentary, and the New Leader. Hook maintained a kind of friendship with WHITTAKER CHAMBERS and supported his charges against Alger Hiss. In 1949, Hook published an article in Commentary, in which he called for the ouster of all communist teachers from American classrooms. He argued that communists were not unfit to teach because of their ideas but because they had committed "professional misconduct in joining a conspiratorial organization, one of whose declared purposes is corruption of the teaching process for political purposes." Hook worried that a still greater menace to American education lay in the "little army of 'progressive' intellectuals" who supported Soviet foreign policy, lent their names to various front groups, and opposed "even the mildest and most justified of administrative measures" to restrict communist academics. In Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No (published as articles in 1950 and 1951, later as a pamphlet, and then as a book in 1952), Hook maintained that communists had no right to teach because they did not subscribe to the principles of free and open debate and were engaged in a conspiracy, directed by an enemy power, to subvert academic freedom. Rather than teach, communists "indoctrinated" students. Extending the argument beyond the classroom, Hook maintained that communism was a "secret or underground movement which seeks to attain its ends not by normal political or educational processes, but by playing outside the rules of the game." Therefore, party members, who functioned as virtual "agents of a foreign power," were not entitled to the protection of civil liberties. At the same time, he argued for the necessity of distinguishing communist conspiracy from dissent or "heresy." For Hook, the First Amendment protected heresy; it did not protect conspiracy. Hook defended the Smith Act, which made it illegal to advocate the overthrow of the government by force or violence, because he thought it necessary to deal with American communists, whom he believed represented a "clear, present, flourishing, and extremely powerful" threat to "national survival." That threat derived not from their numbers or their ideas but because of their "organizational ties" to the Kremlin.

In 1950, Hook joined with a group of American and European intellectuals to found the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The organization encouraged Western intellectuals to unite against communist aggression and against myths that minimized the threat it posed. Many years later, it would come out that the CIA supported the Congress for Cultural Freedom; but the CIA's role was not known at the time, and the intellectuals involved did not need the CIA to instruct them in anticommunism. In 1951, Hook joined JAMES BURNHAM, ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR., the novelist James T. Farrell, and others in organizing the American Committee for Cultural Freedom (ACCF), an affiliate of the European Congress, which Hook regarded as a necessary counterbalance to those intellectuals who supported the Soviet Union or turned a blind eye to the threat of totalitarianism. Hook readily acknowledged that America was no "paradise of liberty," especially for African Americans, yet he found incomprehensible the inability of many European intellectuals to see the difference between an imperfect democracy and a "totalitarian inferno."

As a member of ACCF's committee on academic freedom, Hook supported the removal of communist teachers but maintained that academic tenure should be left in the hands of colleges and boards of education and not turned over to congressional bodies, such as the House Un-American Activities Committee. While condemning what he called the "cultural vigilantism" of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.), he disagreed with liberals who derided the anticommunist activities of that era as a "witch hunt." Hook and the ACCF protested the government's refusal to permit Charlie Chaplin to reenter the United States and its probe of ARTHUR MILLER. They also criticized McCarthy's investigation of the Voice of America. Nevertheless, Hook and the ACCF attacked those writers they believed exploited civil liberties to the advantage of communism.

Hook defined himself as a secular humanist, which he explained meant that he adhered to "the view that morals are autonomous of religious belief, that they are relevant to truths about nature and human nature, truths that rest on scientific evidence." Rooted in pragmatism, Hook's philosophy held that action was fundamental to thought. Thought contemplated action and its consequences. That process resulted in the construction of norms, which could, in turn, be modified and applied in new contexts. Further, the point of any theoretical construct was to serve as a basis for action, and the consequences of that action would confirm or discredit the theory.

During the 1960s, Hook continued to write extensively on civil liberties, Marxism, American politics, progressive education, and philosophical theory. He supported the withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam, but only if North Vietnamese forces also withdrew. While he debated publicly with Bertrand Russell, Hook criticized American universities for refusing to allow Russell to teach in the United States because of his political views. The New Left frequently criticized him for his positions on the Vietnam War and academic freedom. Hook responded by publishing Academic Freedom and Academic Anarchy (1968), an attack on the New Left. In addition to his scholarly and public engagement, Hook held the chair of the philosophy department at NYU for 35 years, surrendering it only on his retirement in 1969. As attempts to remedy past discrimination led to affirmative action, he criticized quotas in university admissions as perversions of the concept of equality of opportunity and as inconsistent with academic freedom. In 1973, he became a senior research fellow at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford University. Hook was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1985 and published an autobiography, Out of Step: An Unquiet Life in the 20th Century in 1987. He died of congestive heart failure in Stanford, Calif., on July 12, 1989.

Hoover, Herbert (Clark)

(1874–1964) president of the United States; chairman, Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch

Born in West Branch, Iowa, on August 10, 1874, and orphaned at the age of nine, Herbert Hoover migrated to California to live with relatives. He graduated from Stanford University in 1894. Over the next 20 years, Hoover made a fortune as a mining engineer and executive. He directed various Allied relief efforts during World War I and headed the U.S. Food Administration from 1917 to 1918; his personal assistants included ROBERT A. TAFT and LEWIS L. STRAUSS. Between 1921 and 1928, Hoover served with distinction as secretary of commerce. With a large national following originating from his World War I humanitarianism, and representing the Republican Party during an economic boom, Hoover easily won election to the presidency in 1928.

Hoover had the bad fortune to be president at the onset of the Great Depression. Although he took unprecedented actions to reverse an economic downturn (his was the first administration actively to intervene in the economy in peacetime), his approach was limited by his commitment to voluntary cooperation and his distrust of the coercive power of government. His efforts proved unsuccessful in reversing the downturn. Hoover also lacked the skilled, charismatic leadership necessary at a time of great national crisis. He could manipulate neither the Congress nor public opinion. The voters rejected him for reelection in 1932 by a wide margin. For the rest of Hoover's long life, Democratic orators and large numbers of people identified him and his party with the depression. Nevertheless, as Rexford Tugwell, one of Franklin D. Roosevelt's "Brain Trust," later confessed, "We didn't admit it at the time, but practically the whole New Deal was extrapolated from programs that Hoover started."

Hoover remained out of government through the Roosevelt administration. He became an increasingly strident critic of the New Deal and grew more conservative with age. He regarded the emerging American welfare state with its expanding bureaucracy as a threat not only to free enterprise but to individual initiative and dignity. From his presidency onward, Hoover rejected coercive approaches to foreign policy. Above all, he hoped to avoid military conflict. He opposed American entry into World War II, and, for all his hatred of communism, did not become an avid cold warrior. Indeed, he opposed what he considered to be the excessive anticommunist rhetoric of HARRY S. TRUMAN and his administration. Hoover opposed the creation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, was critical of the conduct of the Korean War, and advocated withdrawing American forces from Europe.

Hoover returned to government after Roosevelt's death. In early 1946, Truman asked Hoover to draw up a program to deal with food shortages, and Hoover directed efforts to provide relief to war-torn Europe. The following year, Truman appointed Hoover to head a Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government, which became known as the "Hoover Commission." The commission presented a series of recommendations in 1949 that focused on creating a more efficient, vertical organization of the executive branch.

The election of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, the first Republican president since Hoover, further improved the ex-president's national stature. Although Hoover had not supported Eisenhower for the presidential nomination and disagreed with him on many matters of policy, he and Eisenhower became good friends. Hoover attended White House functions as well as Western fishing outings and barbecues. The president named Hoover's eldest son, HERBERT HOOVER, JR., undersecretary of state in August 1954.

During the Eisenhower administration, Hoover chaired the Second Hoover Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch. After receiving the appointment from Eisenhower in 1953, Hoover once again strove to make the executive branch less wasteful. But he also determined that a reformed administration would be one more accountable to the people through a better, more systematic presentation of official "facts and records" for public discussion. In addition, the second commission, unlike its predecessor, enjoyed the broader mandate of surveying policy as well as functional coordination.

The commission covered much ground in issuing its reports through the first half of 1955. Its 11 members, from both parties and several special study groups, studied such diverse problems as intelligence gathering, foreign aid, budget and accounting, military supply, administrative procedure, and water power. In all, the commission investigated 95 percent of all executive departments and agencies. Many of its findings related gross examples of mismanagement and poor planning. In April 1955, for example, the commission reported that the navy's supply of hamburger would last 60 years. Hoover promised that, if adopted, his panel's recommendations would save the government billions of dollars.

The Hoover commission's reports proved to be conservative in domestic policy. The panel uncovered about 3,000 examples of governmental competition with the private sector and requested that one-third of the programs be dismantled. Others, it declared, should be denied certain exclusive privileges. The Rural Electrification Administration, it proposed, should be forced to operate on a self-supporting basis. (Hoover himself privately wished to sell the popular Tennessee Valley Authority [TVA], a product of the New Deal era.) The commission also called for the dissolution of such federal lending programs as the Agricultural Marketing Act Revolving Fund and the Federal Farm Mortgage Act.

Eisenhower had mixed reactions to the commission's findings. He approved of certain structural reforms, in budgeting for example, but he refused to endorse the commission's more conservative recommendations. He politely ignored Hoover's idea

(and own draft) of a message to Congress promoting them. Of the Second Hoover Commission's 314 suggestions, the administration adopted 64 percent (compared to the 72 percent adopted by the Truman administration).

Hoover, for his part, played the role of elder statesman practically to the very end of his life. He addressed and was well received by the Republican National Conventions in 1956 and 1960, while remaining an object of derision at Democratic ones. His public image did improve; in December 1959, a Gallup survey listed him ninth on a list of Most Admired Americans. Eisenhower's Democratic successor, JOHN F. KENNEDY, whose father, Joseph P. Kennedy, served on the Second Hoover Commission, consulted with Hoover. Throughout his life, Hoover published numerous works, including Principles of Mining (1909), American Individualism (1922), The Challenge to Liberty (1934), The Memoirs of Herbert Hoover, 3 vols. (1951–52), and The Ordeal of Woodrow Wilson (1958). He died in New York City on October 20, 1964.

Hoover, Herbert, Jr.

(1903–1969) special consultant to the secretary of state, undersecretary of state

The son of the 31st president of the United States, Herbert Hoover, Jr., was born in London, England, on August 4, 1903. He graduated from Stanford University in 1925, received his M.B.A. from Harvard Business School in 1928, and remained at Harvard as an instructor for the next two years. Hoover worked as a communications engineer from 1929 to 1934 for Transcontinental and Western Air, Inc. In 1935, he was a teaching fellow at the California Institute of Technology. Like his father, Herbert Hoover Jr. was a mining engineer. After inventing a number of radio and electronic devices to detect oil, Hoover founded the United Geophysical Co. at Pasadena, Calif., in 1935, which employed over 1,000 persons prospecting all over the world. During World War II, Hoover's company became a major defense contractor. He invented several instruments to measure the vibration and strain in aircraft.

Hoover enjoyed such standing in the oil industry that he became a consultant to the governments of Venezuela, Brazil, Chile, and Peru. He played a central role in negotiating an agreement between Venezuela and several oil companies. As a result of his dealings with the oil producing nations, Hoover was asked to negotiate the settlement of the Iranian-British dispute over the Abadan oil fields in 1953–54.

The dispute began in May 1951, when the Iranian prime minister, Mohammad Mossadeq, nationalized the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, of which the British government owned 52 percent. In October the British shut down the Abadan refinery and ordered British technicians to leave Iran. Great Britain refused to buy oil from Iran and placed legal obstacles in the way of any other country willing to do so. Without revenue from the sale of oil, Iran faced an economic crisis. Iran retaliated by ordering the British to close all their consulates in January 1952 and severed diplomatic relations with Great Britain in October. By the beginning of 1953, two years of negotiations had failed to resolve the dispute. Late that year, a coup, supported by major segments of the Iranian population and the Central Intelligence Agency, overthrew Mossadeq and restored the Shah to power.

Herbert Hoover, Jr., undersecretary of state

The State Department selected Hoover to arrange a settlement. Iran desperately wanted a resolution, because not only had the country lost revenue over the previous two years, but Britain and the United States had shifted much of their oil trade to other Middle Eastern countries. Nevertheless, the competing interests of various oil companies, the British and American governments, and Iran made the negotiations difficult. Hoover's skill and knowledge of the oil industry guided the negotiations to a successful settlement in the summer of 1954. Under the agreement, the Iranian government gained ownership of its nation's oil reserves. Iran paid the British $70 million. An international consortium of oil companies signed a 25-year agreement with Iran to manage production and sell the oil. The consortium agreed to pay the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company $600 million. Within the consortium, the old Anglo-Iranian Company got a 40 percent share, Royal Dutch Shell got 14 percent, the Compagnie Française des Pétroles got 6 percent, and American companies (Gulf, Standard Oil of New Jersey, Texaco, and Socony-Mobil), which had previously been shut out of Iran, got 40 percent.

For his efforts, Hoover received the Presidential Medal of Freedom, and Eisenhower appointed him undersecretary of state in August 1954. Hoover proved to be less than adept as a diplomat. His interest in foreign affairs seemed not to extend past questions relating to the oil industry, and he lacked tact.

At the height of the Suez Crisis in 1956, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES was recovering from an operation for the cancer that would eventually kill him, and Hoover was acting secretary of state. When Egypt's leader, Gamal Abdel Nasser, nationalized the Suez Canal in July 1956 and the British, French, and Israelis, contrary to the wishes of the American government, resorted to military action, the United States declined to support the weakening British pound and refused to provide oil to the British and French until they withdrew their forces from Egypt. Hoover's obvious lack of sympathy for the British position and his curt manner did little to repair relations with America's closest ally.

Hoover retired from the State Department in 1957, returned to Pasadena, Calif., and resumed his career as an engineer. He died in Pasadena on July 9, 1969.

Hoover, J(ohn) Edgar

(1895–1972) director, Federal Bureau of Investigation

Born in Washington, D.C., on January 1, 1895, J. Edgar Hoover grew up in Washington, where his father worked for the Coast and Geodetic Survey. After graduating from high school in 1913, Hoover worked as an indexer for the Library of Congress and attended National University Law School (later George Washington University Law School) at night. He received his degree in 1916 and in 1917 went to work as a clerk for the Department of Justice. Hoover's ability and capacity for work impressed his superiors, who before long placed him in charge of the alien registration section of the Bureau of Investigation. His work there brought him to the attention of Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer. After a series of bombings, including that of Palmer's house, in June 1919, the attorney general put Hoover in charge of the newly created General Intelligence Division of the Justice Department, created to study subversive activities. Hoover planned and directed the raids on radicals in November 1919 and January 1920 that became known as the Palmer raids. In 1921 Hoover became assistant director of the Bureau of Investigation. After the Teapot Dome scandals, which had tainted the Justice Department and its Bureau of Investigation, the new attorney general, Harlan Fiske Stone, recognized the need to clean house at the Bureau of Investigation and promoted Hoover to director. Hoover depoliticized the agency and introduced a merit system for recruiting agents. He brought in honest and capable people, shaped them into a disciplined unit, and built the bureau into a model of scientific law enforcement. He established a national fingerprint file in 1925 (which evolved into a world-renowned unit for the identification of fingerprints), a pioneering crime laboratory in 1932, and a training school for local police officers in 1935. Hoover also began a system for the collection and analysis of national crime statistics. The New Deal extended the authority of the federal government, and Hoover took advantage of the new political climate to expand the powers of his agency. In 1934, Congress granted the bureau, originally an investigative organization, authority over a long list of newly defined federal crimes and authorized its agents to make arrests and carry firearms. The capture of celebrity criminals like George “Machine Gun” Kelly and the killing of others (including “Pretty Boy” Floyd, “Ma” Barker and her son Fred, “Baby Face” Nelson, and John Dillinger) in shootouts made Hoover and his “G-men” national heroes. In 1935, the agency was renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

As he became increasingly concerned over the rise of Adolf Hitler and the activities of American Nazis, President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued a secret presidential directive in 1934 authorizing the bureau to investigate activities of American Nazis and their sympathizers. Over the next two years, Roosevelt asked Hoover and the FBI to investigate various right-wing groups. In 1936 Roosevelt authorized the director to monitor communist activities. After Hitler’s invasion of Poland in 1939, Roosevelt placed Hoover in charge of all domestic counterintelligence. During World War II, the FBI and Hoover enhanced their reputations with a carefully crafted public relations campaign and a number of spectacular arrests. Immediately after Pearl Harbor, the FBI rounded up German and Japanese agents, which accounted, at least in part, for the success in suppressing enemy espionage and sabotage during the war. When a German U-boat put ashore eight saboteurs on Long Island in 1942, Hoover’s agents apprehended them all within 48 hours.

With the developing cold war, Hoover’s agency became more involved in investigating communist subversion. The FBI had collected reports on communist infiltration during the late 1930s, but America’s entry into World War II and the alliance with the Soviet Union rendered these insignificant to an administration preoccupied with maintaining the wartime alliance. As U.S. relations with the Soviets deteriorated after the war, however, fear of espionage and that American communists held sensitive positions in government led President HARRY S. TRUMAN to continue the FBI’s surveillance of extremist organizations. Truman also established a Federal Loyalty Program for government employees that involved FBI background checks for all federal employees and applicants for federal jobs. Dissatisfied with Truman’s response, however, Hoover lent his support to the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC), which conducted hearings on communists in government and in Hollywood. Investigations by the FBI provided important information for the prosecution of Alger Hiss for having lied about passing documents to the Soviets and for the prosecution under the Smith Act of leaders of the American Communist Party. In 1950, Hoover and his agents exposed the atomic scientist Klaus Fuchs as a spy, which resulted in the arrest and conviction of JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG in 1951. Truman expanded the FBI’s authority to engage in wiretaps in 1952, and Hoover stretched that authority to include opening mail and conducting illegal break-ins.

Throughout the cold war, Hoover conducted a large-scale, public campaign to warn the American citizenry against the dangers of communism. He published books and articles (largely written by FBI personnel), made speeches, and cooperated with anticommunist groups inside and outside of government. Typically for the master bureaucratic infighter, Hoover quickly distanced himself and his agency from allies who became liabilities, most notably in the case of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Hoover’s best-selling book, Masters of Deceit: The Story of Communism in America and How to Fight It (1958), explained the history and objectives of communism and asked Americans to guard against communist subversion and report any evidence of it to the FBI. He had the bureau’s public relations unit cooperate with authors and producers of movies and television programs that featured the FBI in an effort to ensure that the agency would be presented in a favorable light.

Shortly after the new Eisenhower administration took office, Hoover became embroiled in a heated controversy. In November 1953, he testified before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee in support of Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL's charge that Truman had appointed Harry Dexter White to be director of the International Monetary Fund after being informed that White was a communist. Brownell managed to produce evidence that the White House had received a damning FBI report on White before the latter assumed his position. Years later, the opening of Soviet archives after the fall of the Soviet Union and the release of the Venona decrypts would support the charge that White had passed information to the Soviets. At the time, the charges were extremely controversial and became the focus of intense partisan conflict. However, the controversy over the White affair burned hot briefly, quickly cooled, and passed from the public's attention.

After a series of Supreme Court decisions in 1956 effectively limited prosecutions under the Smith Act, Hoover created COINTELPRO (Counter Intelligence Program) to disrupt and neutralize the communist party in the United States. COINTELPRO used "dirty tricks," including illegal wiretaps and break-ins, leaking information about the party's activities, and sending letters to employers demanding the dismissal of communist employees. Hoover's campaign against MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., began out of suspicion arising from the communist background of some of King's associates. It developed into a personal vendetta inspired by Hoover's racism, his outrage over King's personal conduct, and his resentment over King's criticism of the FBI regarding civil rights cases.

In the late 1950s, the FBI made a series of spectacular arrests. The agency uncovered Colonel Rudolph Abel, the head of a large Soviet espionage ring in 1957, which led to his arrest by the Immigration and Naturalization Service that June. The following year, the bureau broke another major spy operation. Hoover's fears of espionage led him to oppose increasing economic and cultural contacts with the Soviet Union and its allies.

From the Roosevelt through the Nixon administrations, Hoover provided presidents personal information about political opponents. In the 1950s, he informed Eisenhower about the activities of ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, NORMAN THOMAS, and Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, among others. Hoover used such services further to entrench his own position and that of his agency.

Despite congressional investigations of organized crime during the second half of the 1950s, Hoover refused to acknowledge the existence of the Mafia. According to some critics, he devoted little attention to the problem because convictions against organized crime required enormous resources and because convictions were difficult to obtain. Instead, Hoover focused the bureau's attention on crimes such as kidnapping, which attracted public attention, and auto theft, which was relatively easily solved.

In the 1960s, Hoover continued his crusade against domestic communism long after the issue had ceased to occupy the primary attention of the public or politicians. His reluctance to involve the bureau in civil rights matters became a point of criticism, and his campaign against King reached its climax when the FBI sent King tape recordings of his extramarital affairs and threatened to make them public. For many in the New Left and civil rights movements, Hoover became a symbol of unquestioning patriotism and repressive governmental authority. Ironically, Hoover's loyalty to his bureau made him an obstacle to the attempts of President RICHARD M. NIXON to use the FBI to cover up the Watergate affair.

Hoover died in Washington, D.C., on May 2, 1972. After Hoover's death, Sen. FRANK CHURCH's Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities investigated Hoover's career and revealed the long history of harassment of dissidents. After examining his activities, the Church committee concluded that Hoover represented a classic case of the abuse of governmental authority. Perhaps a more balanced assessment would take into account Hoover's role in the professionalization of law enforcement and in maintaining national security in times of crisis, including World War II and the cold war, while weighing it against his undoubted abuses of power and his disregard for civil liberties.

Hope, Clifford R(agsdale)

(1893–1970) U.S. congressman; chairman, Agriculture Committee

Born in Birmingham, Iowa, on June 9, 1893, Hope moved with his family to Garden City, Kans., when he was 13. He attended Nebraska Wesleyan University and received an LL.B. degree in 1917 from Washburn Law School in Topeka, Kans. After gaining admission to the bar, he volunteered for military service. He served as a second lieutenant in World War I, and, upon his discharge in 1919, opened a law office in Garden City. He served in the Kansas state legislature from 1921 to 1927. In 1925 he became the youngest person ever to be chosen speaker of the house of representatives in Kansas.

Hope won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1926. For the next 30 years he served in the House and played an important role in shaping farm legislation, particularly in the post-World War II era. From his freshman term, he was a member of the Agriculture Committee. An early backer of Gov. Alf Landon's candidacy for the presidency, Hope was named to chair the Republican National Committee's farm division. After Landon captured the nomination in 1936, many observers anticipated that Hope would become secretary of agriculture if Landon won the election. When Republicans gained control of the House in the 1946 elections, Hope became chair of the House Agriculture Committee. He generally supported the Democratic program of high price supports and in 1948 backed a measure establishing 90 percent of parity for basic commodities. The following year, however, he opposed a plan, supported by the Truman administration, to give Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan increased authority to limit farm production.

A moderate Republican, Hope was one of 19 representatives who sent a letter to DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in February 1952 urging him to seek the Republican presidential nomination. Following the Republican landslide of that year, Hope again became chairman of the Agriculture Committee. In 1953 he supported a bill sponsored by Eisenhower administration that increased the authority of the secretary of agriculture within his department. Hope also backed the administration's proposal authorizing the president to use farm products stored under the price support program to relieve famine conditions abroad. He warned that the program would fall into disrepute if the stored crops rotted while people starved.

In 1953, Hope introduced a measure reorganizing the Farm Credit Administration, divorcing it from the Agriculture Department and increasing "farmer participation and control of the farm credit system." The next year, Hope and Sen. GEORGE D. AIKEN (R-Vt.) introduced a bill authorizing the secretary of agriculture to cooperate with state and local agencies to improve soil conservation in the upriver watershed or "subwatershed" areas of streams and rivers.

In 1954, Hope opposed the major feature of the administration's omnibus farm program, which was the establishment of flexible price supports between 75 percent and 90 percent of parity for the six basic farm commodities. The bill that emerged from his committee retained 90 percent parity payment through 1955. The final measure provided flexibility but limited it to between 82.5 percent and 90 percent of parity. In 1955, as ranking minority member of the agriculture panel, Hope favored a Democratic-inspired proposal to reestablish 90 percent parity. However, he declined to join other Midwestern Republicans in publicly criticizing Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON.

Hope did not run for reelection in 1956. He returned to Garden City, where he wrote a weekly newspaper column and was president of Great Plains Wheat, Inc., from 1959 to 1963. Hope died of a stroke in Garden City on May 16, 1970.

Hughes, Emmet J(ohn)

(1920–1982) administrative assistant to the president

The son of Irish Catholic parents, Hughes was born in Newark, N.J., on December 26, 1920. After graduating summa cum laude from Princeton University in 1941, he received a graduate fellowship in history from Columbia University. His graduate career was cut short when his adviser was appointed ambassador to Spain and Hughes accompanied him as his press attaché. During World War II, Hughes, while continuing to serve at the American embassy, enlisted in the army and served with the Office of Strategic Services. He also published a revised version of his senior thesis at Princeton, The Church and the Liberal Society, in 1944. After the war, Hughes remained with the embassy until 1946. That year, he accepted a job with Time-Life; he was bureau chief in Rome from 1947 to 1948 and head of the bureau in Berlin from 1948 to 1949. He became articles editor for Life magazine in 1949.

Hughes took a leave of absence from Life in 1952 in order to volunteer as a speechwriter for the Republican presidential candidate, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. An independent liberal, Hughes nevertheless believed a Republican victory in 1952 was vital. He wrote some of the most significant speeches Eisenhower gave during the campaign. In a speech scheduled to be given in Wisconsin, Hughes included a passage that denounced the tactics of Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and praised Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall, whom McCarthy had denounced as a "front man for traitors." At the urging of Wisconsin Republicans, particularly Gov. WALTER KOHLER, who was running for reelection, Eisenhower reluctantly agreed to remove the passage criticizing McCarthy and praising Marshall, and he gave the speech without it. The campaign, however, had already given the press copies of the uncut speech, and the omission generated considerable controversy. Hughes also wrote the speech in which Eisenhower promised "I shall go to Korea." Delivered in October, the speech contributed to Eisenhower's convincing victory in November.

During the transition period after the election, Hughes drafted speeches and statements. His principal duty, however, was to work with the president-elect on the inaugural address. When Eisenhower took office, Hughes assumed a position as assistant to the president. His primary responsibility consisted of writing speeches. Hughes helped to write "The Chance for Peace," a speech delivered in 1953 at a meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors that warned of the dangers of the arms race.

During his eight months in the White House, Hughes became increasingly disillusioned with the president and his administration. In particular, Hughes wanted Eisenhower publicly to denounce McCarthy. After McCarthy attacked the State Department, and his aides traveled through Europe to investigate subversive literature in U.S. libraries, Hughes once again urged the president to take the offensive against the junior senator from Wisconsin. Eisenhower, however, refused, as he put it, "to get in the gutter with that guy." Hughes took advantage of a request from the American Library Association for a presidential message by drafting a warning against McCarthy's excesses, and Eisenhower signed the letter. In general, however, Hughes was unable to persuade Eisenhower to mount a frontal assault against McCarthy.

In September 1953, Hughes, who maintained that he had never intended to stay on past the election, resigned and returned to Time-Life as a special European correspondent for Life. He continued his criticism of the administration. In November 1953, he sent a long letter to the president explaining that bickering within the cabinet made the administration appear indecisive. Hughes, nevertheless, readily accepted an invitation to speak at the Republican National Convention in 1956. He also joined the president's staff as a special assistant on speeches and campaign strategy. In that capacity, he drafted the speech, given on November 1, in which the president responded to the Suez Crisis by condemning the British, French, and Israeli action and urging the United Nations to intervene.

After Eisenhower's reelection, Hughes considered remaining with the administration. He would have liked a position as an adviser on foreign policy, but Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES blocked him from a major post in the State Department. The day after Eisenhower's second inaugural address, Hughes ended his career in the White House. While he occasionally worked on speeches and played a major role in drafting a presidential speech on foreign aid in May 1957, Hughes otherwise resumed his work with Time-Life. He was editor of Fortune magazine from 1956 to 1957 and chief foreign correspondent for Time-Life from 1957 to 1960. Hughes also vented his frustration against Eisenhower and Dulles in America the Vincible (1959), a book that criticized the direction of American foreign policy during Eisenhower's second term but saved its harshest criticism for Dulles.

From 1960 to 1963, he served as an adviser to the Rockefeller family. Hughes also published a memoir, Ordeal by Power (1962), that described the inner working of the administration and presented a highly unfavorable portrait of Eisenhower. In the days before presidential aides regularly published insider accounts of the administration they served, Hughes's book created something of a sensation. Based on the documentary evidence available at the Eisenhower Library, most historians today reject many of Hughes's conclusions and his portrayal of the president. At the time, however, the book enjoyed a favorable critical response. From 1963 to 1968, Hughes was a columnist and an editorial consultant for Newsweek. He served as a special assistant to Gov. NELSON ROCKEFELLER during the latter's unsuccessful bid for the Republican nomination in 1968 and worked as an aide to the governor until 1970, when Hughes joined the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. He held that position until he died of a heart attack in Princeton, N.J., on September 19, 1982.

Hughes, Howard R(obard), Jr.

(1905–1976) industrialist

The son of a Texas oil wildcatter, Hughes was born in Houston, Tex., on December 24, 1905. His father, Howard Hughes, Sr., patented a rotary drill bit that revolutionized oil drilling; he then formed what would become the Hughes Tool Company. The bit made him a wealthy man. Hughes, Jr., attended Fessenden School and Thatcher School. Although he never graduated from high school, Hughes sat in on classes at California Institute of Technology and enrolled at Rice Institute. His mother died in 1922, and his father died in 1924. Upon his father's death, Hughes inherited 75 percent of the Hughes Tool company. He dropped out of Rice and, within a year, bought out the other 25 percent from various relatives. The income from his ownership of the company allowed Hughes to pursue other interests. In 1925, he moved to Los Angeles and began to produce films. He made several films of varying quality (Two Arabian Nights, made in 1927, won an Academy Award for director Lewis Milestone) before making an epic about fighter pilots in the Royal Air Force during World War I, Hell's Angels (1930), which he wrote and directed. A series of unsuccessful films followed before he produced two classics, The Front Page (1931) and Scarface (1932).

From early on, Hughes demonstrated mechanical talent and a love for flying. He founded the Hughes Aircraft Company in 1933 and forged a distinguished career as an aviator. He set several speed records, including the fastest transcontinental flight (1936) and the fastest flight around the world (1938). His exploits made him a national hero and won him a ticker tape parade down Broadway as well as an invitation to the White House. In 1939, Hughes acquired stock in Trans World Airlines.

During World War II, Hughes joined with Henry J. Kaiser, a shipbuilder, to win a contract to build a huge troop and cargo carrier made of wood known as the H-4 Hercules and, more popularly, as the "Spruce Goose." The contract was canceled when it became obvious that the planes would not be available before the war ended. Hughes also received a contract for the XF-11 reconnaissance plane, which, like the H-4 Hercules, was not produced before the end of the war. Hughes also set up a film production company and made The Outlaw (1943), initially banned by censors and universally panned by critics after its release. Thanks largely to the controversy surrounding its release and to Jane Russell, whose anatomical gifts far exceeded her acting ability, the film made an enormous profit.

After the war, Hughes produced a couple of unsuccessful films. He also was determined to prove that the two planes he developed during the war, the XF-11 and the H-4 Hercules, were airworthy. With Hughes at the controls, the XF-11 prototype made its first flight on July 7, 1946. An engine malfunctioned, the plane crashed, and Hughes was nearly killed. He recovered quickly and immediately began flying again; he successfully flew the second prototype on April 6, 1947. The Senate War Investigating Committee questioned him in August 1947 on his failure to deliver on wartime contracts. On November 2, 1947, in an attempt to prove the H-4 airworthy, he piloted the plane on its only flight.

Hughes bought RKO Studios in 1948. His eccentric management style brought harsh criticism from within the company, and he sold his shares in 1955 for a profit. Movies constituted only one of his areas of interest. During the postwar era, he expanded TWA into a major international carrier.

A fervent anticommunist, Hughes used his positions as a producer and the head of a studio to blacklist suspected communist sympathizers. He fired Paul Jarrico, one of RKO's leading writers, in 1951 for refusing to cooperate with the House Un-American Activities Committee. Hughes even ordered Jarrico's name removed from the credits of a film he had recently written. Jarrico sued Hughes over the matter, but a court ruled in Hughes's favor in 1957. His anticommunism even led the reclusive Hughes to make a rare public appearance, when he addressed the American Legion's Hollywood post in January 1953. In his speech, he expressed the opinion that communists had infiltrated the motion picture industry and maintained that an individual's refusal to disclose whether or not he was a communist was sufficient to incriminate him. He further argued that those who defended the civil liberties of communists did not have the best interests of the nation at heart. In addition to the speech, Hughes lent his support to the Legion's ultimately successful efforts to bar Charlie Chaplin's film, Limelight, from American theaters because of Chaplin's left-wing sympathies.

Although his behavior had always been somewhat erratic, he became more so in the years after World War II. He suffered a nervous breakdown in 1958. In the late 1950s, because of increasing competition and poor management, TWA began to lose money. He sold TWA in 1966 for $566 million. In 1967, he bought the Desert Inn in Las Vegas and made it his home. He then proceeded to build an empire in Las Vegas that included several other casinos, a radio station, and real estate. Hughes took over Air West in 1970. To avoid taxes, he moved to the Bahamas that same year. He never returned to the United States. Hughes became a recluse, moving from one luxury hotel to another and finally settling in Acapulco, Mexico. He sold Hughes Tool Company to the public in 1972 for $150 million. In 1974, the government indicted him for alleged irregularities in his purchase of Air West. At the time, Hughes was living in the Bahamas and could not be extradited. Long a hypochondriac with an acute fear of germs, he became increasingly obsessed with such matters. His behavior crossed into the bizarre; he refused medical attention, ate peculiar diets, and took drugs (apparently his addiction to painkillers dated from his recovery after the crash of the XF-11 in 1946). At the time of his death, he weighed only 94 pounds. As his health failed catastrophically, his aides put him on a plane to take him from Acapulco to Houston, but Hughes died in flight on April 5, 1976.

Hughes, Rowland R(oberts)

(1896–1957) director, Bureau of the Budget

Born in Oakhurst, N.J., on March 28, 1896, Hughes graduated from Brown University in 1917. He worked for the National City Bank of New York from his senior year in college until he joined the Eisenhower administration in 1953. In the 10 years following his graduation, he worked at the bank's branches in Shanghai, Bombay, Osaka, and Tokyo. Recalled to New York in 1927, Hughes was made assistant controller in 1929 and controller in 1934. Beginning in the 1940s, he became an active member of the tax committees of the Controllers Institute of America, the American Bankers Association, and the Council of State Chambers of Commerce.

Hughes entered the Eisenhower administration in April 1953 as assistant director of the budget. He became deputy director in August and in April 1954 succeeded JOSEPH M. DODGE as director. Hughes's background and beliefs placed him in full accord with the administration's objective of reducing the size of the federal budget. Seeking to promote economy and efficiency by example, he reduced his own agency's appropriation request by $33,500 in May 1955. In July, the government announced that the federal deficit for fiscal year 1955 had been $300 million less than expected.

Hughes also vigorously sought to end government competition with private business wherever possible. On January 25, 1955, he directed all government agencies to complete by April 15 an inventory of their commercial activities and report by July 15 which of their manufacturing facilities could be shifted to the private sector.

Hughes was a key figure in the Dixon-Yates affair, the Eisenhower administration's most controversial attempt to replace government activity with private enterprise. The plan was to have a southern utilities combine construct a steam power plant near West Memphis, Ark., to supply power to Atomic Energy Commission installations in the area and to surrounding municipalities previously served by the Tennessee Valley Authority. The project had originated in the Budget Bureau when Hughes was second in command. Hughes took part in drawing up the contract with utility executives EDGAR DIXON and Eugene Yates, promoted it within the government, and defended it before congressional committees. His testimony, however, was ambiguous and contradictory. His appearance before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in November 1954 prompted the New Republic to remark that Hughes "proved to be as inept a witness as reporters could remember. He appeared to know so little about the major provisions of the Dixon-Yates contract, which he had approved, that with some justification Sen. CLINTON ANDERSON (D-N.Mex.) asked him if he had ever read it."

Early in 1955, critics of the contract charged that one of the officials responsible for drawing it up was guilty of conflict of interest. A consultant with the Bureau of the Budget, Adolphe Wenzell, was an employee of the First Boston Corp., which acted as a financial agent for the Dixon-Yates combine. Testifying before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee in June, Hughes stated that Wenzell's role had been insignificant and that Wenzell had "never had anything to do with the policy of Dixon-Yates." Hughes also professed ignorance of the fact that First Boston was acting as a financial agent of Dixon-Yates. A few days later, however, Wenzell himself contradicted Hughes's statements, asserting that he had been called to Washington in January 1954 by Hughes to serve as an expert in the financing of the project, had attended some 20 meetings on the subject, and had made First Boston's interest in the contract "abundantly clear" to Hughes. The subcommittee report, issued in August 1955, concluded "the testimony that Hughes gave . . . defies understanding." By that date, President Eisenhower had ordered the contract canceled.

Within the Eisenhower administration, Hughes was the focal point of conflicting pressures to spend more in individual cases while balancing the total budget. On March 30, 1956, the day before his retirement, Hughes submitted a memo to the president criticizing special interests and department heads, "special pleaders for particular expenditures," for lobbying for increased allocations "regardless of the impact on the budget as a whole." The chief offender, in Hughes's view, was Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON, who persistently sought larger appropriations for new projects. Such pressures undermined the administration's zeal for reducing expenditures, Hughes maintained. As it happened, the government enjoyed a $1.75-billion budget surplus for fiscal year 1956, the first surplus since 1951.

Hughes died of arteriosclerosis in San Francisco on April 2, 1957.

Humphrey, George M(agoffin)

(1890–1970) secretary of the treasury

Born in Cheboygan, Mich., on March 8, 1890, George Humphrey grew up in Saginaw, Mich., and attended the University of Michigan, from which he received a law degree in 1912. After gaining admission to the Michigan bar that same year, he commenced the practice of law with his father's firm. In 1918, he became general counsel for the M. A. Hanna Company of Cleveland, Ohio. Humphrey rose rapidly in the firm, becoming partner in 1920, vice president in 1922, and president in 1929. When Humphrey joined M. A. Hanna, it was a money-losing shipper of iron ore and coal in the Great Lakes region. Under his leadership, it became a prosperous, expanding industrial enterprise that branched out into mining and became involved in steel, rayon, plastics, oil, and copper production, and banking. Through mergers Humphrey placed the National Steel Co. and the Pittsburgh Consolidated Coal Co. under M. A. Hanna's corporate umbrella. By 1952, when Humphrey was elected chairman of the board, M. A. Hanna had assets totaling more than $120 million.

After World War II, Humphrey became active in public affairs. He was named chairman of the Department of Commerce's Business Advisory Council in 1946. The following year, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him to a 12-member advisory board established by the Taft-Hartley Act.

In 1948, PAUL HOFFMAN, head of the Economic Cooperation Administration, chose Humphrey to head a five-member Reparations Survey Committee to advise the Allied powers regarding the dismantling of German industrial plants. Humphrey enthusiastically supported Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT's unsuccessful attempt to gain the Republican nomination in 1948. He supported Taft again in 1952, but DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER defeated Taft for the nomination, and Humphrey served as chair of the Republican finance committee. After Eisenhower won the election, he chose Humphrey as his secretary of the treasury on the recommendation of Gen. LUCIUS CLAY and Hoffman. The Senate confirmed his nomination, and Humphrey took the oath of office on January 21, 1953.

Although Eisenhower hardly knew Humphrey before designating him secretary of the treasury, the two men quickly established a warm personal rapport. The president frequently visited Humphrey's plantation in Thomasville, Ga., where they hunted quail and played golf. Eisenhower and Humphrey shared a common outlook on fundamental economic issues. Armed with the president's trust and his own forceful personality, Humphrey played a significant role in formulating policy during Eisenhower's first term. Nevertheless, Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, recalled that "while Eisenhower had great respect for Humphrey's judgment, it seemed to him that Humphrey was sometimes too quick to think of government economic problems in the terms of private industry and occasionally too impatient for fast action." Despite Humphrey's personal relationship with the president and his undoubted influence, historians have sometimes overestimated that influence. Indeed, his economic advice was, at times, less influential than that of ARTHUR BURNS, Eisenhower's first chair of the Council of Economic Advisers.

Humphrey's views were staunchly conservative. He believed that the federal government had become too large and intervened in too many areas of life. In addition, he worried that the expansion of government hindered economic growth and eroded individual initiative. He favored cutting taxes, because he believed that high taxes impeded investment, and held that chronic budget deficits posed a serious threat of inflation.

George Humphrey, secretary of the treasury
(Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

During the winter of 1952–53, the incoming administration debated continuing the wage and price controls Truman had imposed after the beginning of the Korean war. The most vocal advocate of eliminating all controls, Humphrey maintained that they brought only economic stagnation. While some of Eisenhower's advisers worried about inflation, Humphrey argued that the elimination of controls would result in increased production that would absorb any wage increases. He further contended that a policy of tight money would forestall price inflation. Humphrey prevailed, and Eisenhower announced in his State of the Union message that all controls on prices and wages would be removed shortly. The ensuing decontrol did not result in a harmful increase in prices.

Eisenhower and Humphrey worried about the effects of constant deficits and intended to cut federal spending. Truman's proposed budget for fiscal year 1954 projected a deficit of $9.9 billion. It quickly became apparent, however, that the new administration would not be able to meet its election promises of a tax cut in 1953 and a balanced budget by 1954. Humphrey's commitment to balance the budget superseded his desire to cut taxes, and the administration essentially adhered to that priority. Seeking to reduce spending, Humphrey persistently argued for cuts in foreign aid and military spending as well as in social programs. The administration submitted a revised budget to Congress in April that cut the deficit to $3.1 billion. Most of the cuts in the budget came from defense spending. Taxes imposed to pay for the Korean War scheduled to expire in mid-1953 were extended to the end of the year. The budget did not please conservative Republicans in Congress. Taft, the majority leader in the Senate, and DANIEL A. REED (R-N.Y.), chair of the House Ways and Means Committee, led the call for greater reductions in spending and for tax relief. They wanted to allow both the excess profits tax and the increase in income tax to expire on July 1, 1953. Humphrey argued that allowing the excess profits tax and the income tax increase to expire on July 1 instead of December 1 of that year would cost the government revenue, exacerbate the deficit, and fuel inflation. Ultimately, the administration prevailed. When Taft first learned that the budget would not be balanced as soon as expected, he had a heated meeting with Eisenhower. Humphrey, an old Taft supporter, supported the president and did so in such a way as to prevent a rift between Taft and Eisenhower.

Humphrey believed in the efficacy of monetary policy in controlling inflation, and, in the interest of stability, he preferred long-term over short-term borrowing. When Humphrey took office, most of the national debt was in the form of short-term borrowing. This made it difficult to stabilize federal finances. In addition, short-term borrowing by the treasury tended to increase the supply of money and therefore increase inflationary pressure. In June 1953, Humphrey brought out an issue of 30-year bonds bearing an attractive interest rate of 3.25 percent. Democrats denounced that issue as deflationary. It did have the effect of drawing funds out of the mortgage market and therefore increasing the cost of financing a house. Thus, the increase in rates contributed, to a degree, to the economic slump in the summer and fall of 1953 that accompanied the end of the Korean War. The Federal Reserve eased the crisis by lowering the reserve requirements of member banks, thereby increasing the money available for loans. Humphrey urged relying on markets to end the recession. Burns, however, advocated increasing spending and cutting taxes. Eisenhower sided with Burns. Humphrey later admitted that he had tightened credit too much. As the administration moved to stimulate the economy, Humphrey proposed removing excise taxes on various luxury products, a measure Congress passed and Eisenhower signed in April 1954. Humphrey recommended exempting from taxation a portion of income derived from stock dividends. Liberal Democrats objected that this favored the wealthy. Humphrey countered that such a policy would stimulate equity financing as well as capital spending and thus ultimately benefit low-income families by creating jobs and stimulating prosperity. Congress passed that measure, too. The economy began a recovery by September 1954.

Humphrey was not entirely successful in his effort to reduce the concentration of short-term debt or in balancing the budget. Nevertheless, the administration held down deficits during the recession of 1953 and early 1954. The budget for fiscal 1955 showed a modest deficit of $1.2 billion, and the budget for fiscal 1956 produced a surplus of $1.75 billion. Going into the election of 1956, Humphrey and Eisenhower could legitimately claim that they had soundly managed the nation's financial affairs.

Despite his oft-repeated sermons about the desirability of tax reduction, Humphrey frequently used his influence to block tax cuts, particularly broad-based tax reductions initiated by Democrats in Congress. In March 1955, he attacked a Democratic plan to stimulate the economy by giving each taxpayer a $20 tax cut as "silly," "irresponsible," and a "political quickie gimmick." The House approved the tax cut, but the Senate rejected it. At the same time, Congress approved the administration's request to defer scheduled excise and corporate tax cuts for a year, which added $2.8 billion to government income. In 1956 and 1957, Humphrey's concern over the budget continued to override his discomfort over high taxes. He declared in a speech on February 1, 1956, that taxes should be cut as soon as possible because they were so high that they were curtailing the "very basis of our freedom—incentive.” However, he testified two days later before the Joint Economic Committee that the anticipated budget surplus for fiscal 1956 was too small to permit a tax cut.

Humphrey exercised influence in policy areas outside the normal authority of treasury secretaries. He sat on the National Security Council at the president’s invitation. His fiscal conservatism often led him to oppose ambitious new weapons systems. He was unpersuaded by the arguments of some generals in favor of an increased, highly mobile force of ground troops equipped with sophisticated arms and materials. His cautionary counsel about the fiscal impact of such an expensive undertaking reinforced Eisenhower’s view that high troop levels were not worth the expense. Humphrey was also a vigorous proponent of the Saint Lawrence Seaway, which he had supported for years as president of M. A. Hanna. The project, which converted the Saint Lawrence River into an inland waterway connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean by building a deepwater navigation channel, was completed in 1959.

In the first half of 1957, his last months as treasury secretary, Humphrey played a controversial and unconventional role in the battle over the budget for fiscal 1958. In January he declared to reporters that the $71.8 billion spending figure submitted by the administration was too high and invited Congress to make cuts in the administration’s own requests, although he did not specify where. He said that the government must reduce “the terrific tax take we are taking out of this country,” because “if we don’t over a long period of time, I predict that you will have a depression that will curl your hair.” In response to the stir caused by Humphrey’s dire prophecy, Eisenhower, a week later, said that Humphrey was not talking about the near future but about the consequences of “long-term continuation of spending of the order of which we are now doing.” He affirmed his “complete agreement” with his treasury secretary’s view that Congress should make cuts in the budget. As it turned out, congressional conservatives enthusiastically slashed appropriations for several departments and programs more deeply than the administration found acceptable. The Eisenhower administration ended up pleading, with mixed success, for the restoration of money, particularly for foreign aid and defense. The appropriations bill passed in August totaled $4 billion less than the president’s January request, a serious setback for Eisenhower.

In June 1957, Humphrey defended the Eisenhower administration’s fiscal performance, asserting that it had cut government spending, balanced the budget, arrested inflation, achieved a “record-breaking tax reduction” of $7.4 billion in 1954, and “encouraged an expansion of enterprise to new high levels.” He conceded that the administration had failed to cut non-defense spending below the levels of the Truman administration and to achieve “some of our debt management objectives.”

Humphrey left the Treasury in July 1957 and became chairman of the board of National Steel. He also returned to M. A. Hanna as honorary chairman until the liquidation of the company in 1965. He died in Cleveland on January 20, 1970.

Humphrey, Hubert H(oration)

(1911–1978) U.S. senator

The son of a druggist, Hubert Humphrey was born in Wallace, S.Dak., on May 27, 1911. His father’s reverence for William Jennings Bryan and Woodrow Wilson profoundly influenced him. He was a star debater and class valedictorian in high school, but he had to leave the University of Minnesota in 1931 to work in his father’s drugstore. He became a registered pharmacist in 1933 and managed the store, while his father participated actively in South Dakota Democratic Party politics. Humphrey returned to the University of Minnesota in 1937, earning his B.A. in 1939 and an M.A. in political science from Louisiana State University a year later. His master’s thesis, entitled “The Political Philosophy of the New Deal,” was a tribute to Franklin D. Roosevelt’s response to the depression.

After a brief teaching career, Humphrey plunged into Minnesota politics. He played a key role in the merger of the Farmer-Labor and Democratic Parties in 1944 and won election as mayor of Minneapolis the next year. As mayor, he waged a war against vices, created the first municipal fair-employment practices commission in the United States, expanded the city's housing program, and took an active part in settling strikes. After winning reelection in 1947, Humphrey helped organize the liberal, anticommunist Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) and fought a successful battle to purge the communist faction from the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party. He gained national attention at the Democratic National Convention in 1948 with a stirring oration in favor of a strong civil rights plank. Humphrey's speech, in which he called on the Democratic party to "get out of the shadow of states' rights and walk forthrightly into the bright sunshine of human rights," moved the convention to reject the Truman administration's modest civil rights plank in favor of the stronger one he favored. In November, Humphrey unseated Sen. Joseph Ball, the Republican incumbent.

Humphrey quickly moved into the vanguard of the Senate's liberal minority. He advocated legislation promoting civil rights, tax reform, aid to education, and organized labor. The first bill he introduced was a proposal to establish medical care for the aged, financed through the Social Security system. It did not pass, but years later, as vice president, he would help President LYNDON B. JOHNSON pass Medicare. In 1949, he joined an unsuccessful attempt to change Senate rules regarding the filibuster. That same year, he failed in an attempt to move civil rights legislation. He also made an unsuccessful effort to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. At this point, early in his career, Humphrey alienated powerful conservatives in the Senate with his sharp verbal attacks and his effusive liberalism. Their hostility and his own ignorance of Senate procedures rendered Humphrey largely ineffective.

Taken aback by his succession of defeats and his ostracization by the established leaders of the Senate and of his party, Humphrey changed his approach. Working closely with then-senator Lyndon Johnson (D-Tex.), Humphrey toned down his rhetoric and moderated his intensely ideological approach. He set himself to his committee work and learned the rules of the Senate. Although he continued to sponsor dozens of bills each session, he accepted compromises when he saw a chance to make some modest gain, rather than holding out unsuccessfully for everything he wanted. For example, he opposed an antidiscrimination amendment to the bill that became the Housing Act of 1954 because the amendment would have cost support from southerners necessary for passage of the bill. Humphrey became the liaison between the liberal wing of the Democratic Party and the Senate's fabled "inner club," dominated by southern conservatives. In this way, he eased his way into the Senate's "establishment."

Humphrey consistently supported the interests of farmers, who made up a large part of his constituency. He relentlessly opposed the Eisenhower administration's reduction of agricultural price supports. Partly in an effort to aid his rural constituents, Humphrey became a leading advocate of the distribution of American agricultural surplus to needy nations abroad, which, he argued, would "avert famine and combat communism." He was instrumental in passing Public Law 480, passed in 1954, which authorized the distribution of U.S. agricultural surpluses abroad. In 1961 he helped expand the law into the Food for Peace program. In another attempt to aid farmers, he proposed reducing surpluses with a domestic food stamp program.

On foreign policy, Humphrey generally supported the Eisenhower administration. He joined other Democrats, however, in criticizing the "New Look" defense policy's reliance on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent and argued against reductions in conventional forces. With Johnson's sponsorship, Humphrey became a member of the Foreign Relations Committee in 1953 and chair of that committee's Disarmament Subcommittee in 1955. As chair of the Disarmament Subcommittee, he held hearings in 1956 and 1958 on a ban on atmospheric nuclear testing.

Although strongly anticommunist, Humphrey heatedly denounced Republican red-baiters and, in particular, Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). At times, however, his own anticommunist zeal and jockeying for political advantage led him to outdo the right-wing Republicans. In 1950, he and other liberals sponsored an amendment to an omnibus internal security bill that granted the president authority to detain subversives in time of emergency. It was a vote he claimed immediately to regret. Nevertheless, facing a campaign for reelection in 1954, Humphrey introduced an amendment to the bill that became the Communist Control Act of 1954, a repressive measure opposed by the Eisenhower administration. Humphrey's amendment declared that the communist party was an "agency of a hostile foreign power" and therefore not entitled to the rights and immunities of legal bodies. To civil libertarians, who protested that the amendment represented a gross violation of civil liberties, Humphrey replied, "I do not intend to be half patriot." Supported by Lyndon Johnson, the amendment narrowly passed; the entire bill passed with only ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) voting no. Although he continued to defend his actions at least as late as 1959, Humphrey later admitted that the Communist Control Act was "not one of the things I'm proudest of."

Whatever his disregard for the civil liberties of communists, Humphrey continued to be a leading supporter of civil rights for African Americans. His role as Johnson's bridge to the liberals in the Senate and his willingness to compromise in order to achieve some gains played out in the contribution he made to passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The Senate substantially weakened the administration's civil rights bill, eliminating authority for the attorney general to enter civil suits and adding an amendment making it civil, rather than criminal, contempt to violate federal court orders enforcing voting rights. As Johnson's lieutenant, Humphrey was an important figure in forging the compromise that weakened the bill and avoided a filibuster by southern Democrats.

Humphrey had long considered a run for higher office, and in 1956 he mounted an abortive bid for his party's vice presidential nomination. Fully expecting that ADLAI STEVENSON would chose him for the second spot on the ticket, he was shocked when Stevenson announced that he would let the convention pick the vice presidential nominee. Unprepared for a floor fight, Humphrey ran a poor fifth on the first ballot and withdrew. He then threw his support to Kefauver, who became Stevenson's running mate.

When he opened his campaign on December 30, 1959, Humphrey became the first candidate to declare for the presidency in 1960. The most liberal of the Democratic hopefuls, he had recently burnished his foreign-policy credential by serving on the U.S. delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in 1956 and to UNESCO in 1958. In the latter capacity, he visited the Soviet Union and had a private meeting with the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, that lasted over eight hours. Humphrey's only active rival in the months before the convention was Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), who ran a well-financed, tightly organized campaign. Humphrey's poorly organized and poorly financed campaign was no match. Kennedy defeated Humphrey in Wisconsin, and the West Virginia primary emerged as a crucial test. Kennedy needed a win in an overwhelmingly Protestant state to lay to rest questions about whether his Catholicism made him unelectable. Humphrey just needed a win. The candidates debated the state's depressed economic condition, but, given the stakes, the campaign devolved into bitter personal attacks. Humphrey emphasized Kennedy's wealth and privilege. Kennedy's supporters accused Humphrey of dodging the draft during World War II (he received a deferment because of a double hernia and color blindness). Kennedy won a decisive victory in West Virginia, and Humphrey withdrew from the race. After Kennedy captured the nomination, Humphrey supported him and won election to his third term in the Senate.

Humphrey became majority whip in 1961 and was a key figure in guiding through the Senate a variety of measures, some of which he had advocated for years, including the Peace Corps (enacted in 1961). He also played an important role in passing the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency that same year.

After Kennedy's assassination, Humphrey urged President Johnson to move ahead with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, as floor leader, cooperated with Johnson in breaking the southern filibuster that made passage of the measure possible. Johnson chose Humphrey as his running mate in 1964, and the Democratic ticket overwhelmed the Republican candidate, BARRY GOLDWATER, in November. Humphrey loyally served Johnson as vice president and cooperated with the congressional leadership to gain passage of Medicare and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Although he initially had reservations about the growing American involvement in Vietnam, he became a fervent supporter of the war. When Johnson withdrew from the presidential race in 1968, Humphrey announced his candidacy and inherited much of Johnson's support. He ultimately won the nomination, despite challenges from antiwar candidates ROBERT F. KENNEDY, who was assassinated before the convention, and EUGENE MCCARTHY. In the general election, Humphrey was damaged by his association with the unpopular Johnson administration and the war as well as by the third-party candidacy of Gov. George Wallace of Alabama. Although trailing desperately in late September, Humphrey gained steadily in the polls. Ultimately, he lost the election by a narrow margin to RICHARD M. NIXON. Humphrey returned to Minnesota to teach at Macalester College. When Eugene McCarthy decided not to seek reelection to the Senate in 1970, Humphrey successfully ran for the vacant seat. Upon his return to the Senate, he once again espoused a number of liberal positions. He supported limiting the development of the antiballistic missile system and opposed Nixon's decision to impound funds appropriated by Congress for social programs. Humphrey announced his candidacy for the presidency in 1972 but gained little support. In 1975, he became chair of the Joint Economic Committee. He sponsored the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and National Growth Act of 1978, passed after his death, which set general guidelines by which the nation could coordinate economic growth and established a goal of 3.5 percent unemployment within five years. Although a minor boom developed in support of a presidential bid in 1976, Humphrey decided to run for reelection to the Senate and won. He died of cancer in Waverly, Minn., on January 13, 1978.

Hutcheson, Maurice A(lbert)

(1897–1983) president, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America

Born in Saginaw Co., Mich., on May 7, 1897, Maurice Hutcheson was the son of William Hutcheson, president of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners (UBC) and one of the most powerful union leaders in the 20th century. The family moved to Indianapolis in 1913, when his father became president of the carpenters' union. In 1914, Maurice became a carpenter's apprentice. After serving as a carpenter's mate in the navy during World War I, he worked as a journeyman from 1918 to 1928, when he became an auditor for the UBC. In 1938, he was elected first vice president of the UBC; he became president upon his father's retirement in 1952.

Shortly after assuming that office, Hutcheson took the union out of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in a dispute over a no-raiding agreement the AFL had negotiated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). He reaffiliated with the AFL a few weeks later and became a vice president of the federation and member of the Executive Council in 1953. When the AFL merged with the CIO in 1955, Hutcheson retained these positions. In 1954, Hutcheson negotiated an end to a long-standing jurisdictional feud with the International Association of Machinists.

In 1957, Hutcheson was charged with bribing an Indiana state highway official to obtain advanced information on the location of a planned highway. Hutcheson, it was maintained, then bought up the land and sold it to the state at a huge profit. A grand jury in Lake Co., Ind., failed to indict the union leader on the charges. However a grand jury in Marion Co. did indict on similar charges the following year.

While his case was pending, the Senate Committee on Improper Relations in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), ordered Hutcheson to testify on that case and on other questionable activities. These included charges that William Hutcheson had embezzled money from the UBC and that Maurice Hutcheson had conspired with JIMMY HOFFA to fix a jury. The committee also contended that Hutcheson had paid Max Raddock, whom it termed a "shrewd confidence man," $519,000 in union funds "with noticeably little return." According to an investigator for the committee, Hutcheson had used Raddock as a "fixer in a successful move to block the Lake Co., Ind., indictment." Hutcheson refused to testify on the grounds that it could prejudice the case pending in Indiana. The Senate cited him for contempt of Congress, and a federal district court convicted him in May 1960. He was sentenced to six months in prison and fined $500. The Supreme Court upheld that conviction.

In November 1959, two members of Baltimore Local 107 of the UBC asked the Marion Co. Circuit Court to appoint monitors to halt alleged corruption in their union. They accused Hutcheson and 13 other union officers of bribery, threatening opponents with injury or death, destroying possibly incriminating union records, withholding pensions of retired members who opposed them, and of not letting rivals speak at union conventions. The members also reported that the officials had accepted more than $100,000 in "gratuities" from employees and maintained that they had paid back income taxes for individuals who knew what they had done.

Hutcheson's legal difficulties jeopardized his position in the AFL-CIO. In 1958, the Executive Council asked him to explain his indictment in Indiana and his refusal to answer questions before the McClellan committee. Hutcheson absented himself from council meetings, but he sent AFL-CIO president GEORGE MEANY a letter denying any violation of the AFL-CIO's ethical code. JAMES B. CAREY, president of the International Union of Electrical Workers, proposed suspending Hutcheson until he appeared before the council, but the panel deferred action until Hutcheson appeared. The union never took disciplinary action against the UBC's leader.

Hutcheson was convicted in the Indiana highway case in 1960 and sentenced to 2-to-14 years imprisonment. This verdict was overturned in October 1963 by the Indiana Supreme Court, which held that the trial record contained insufficient evidence to establish a conspiracy.

During the 1960s, Hutcheson and other union leaders resisted efforts to eliminate racial discrimination in the construction trades. However, they eventually approved a compromise plan on the issue that made entry into trade unions based on merit. Hutcheson was appointed to a panel established by the labor and management Construction Industry Joint Conference to administer the compromise plan.

Hutcheson still faced a prison sentence for the contempt of Congress conviction. Meany, a long-time ally, and other labor leaders petitioned the federal district court to convert the sentence from prison to probation. In 1964, a federal district judge in Washington reduced the sentence to two years probation. Later that year, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON pardoned Hutcheson, who continued to serve as president of the UBC until his retirement in 1972. Upon retiring, Hutcheson moved to Florida, where he lived until his death in Lakeland, Fla., on January 9, 1983.

Hutchins, Robert M(aynard)

(1899–1977) associate director, Ford Foundation; chief executive officer, Fund for the Republic; president, Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions

The son of a Presbyterian minister who taught at Oberlin College and became president of Berea College, Hutchins was born in New York City on January 17, 1899. He moved with his family to Oberlin, Ohio, in 1907, when his father took up a teaching position there. After attending Oberlin College for two years, Hutchins left in 1917 to serve in the ambulance corps of the United States and Italy during World War I. Italy awarded him the Croce di Guerra for bravery under fire. Upon his discharge in 1919, he returned to the United States and enrolled at Yale University, where he earned an A.B. in 1921. After graduating, he taught at the Lake Placid School until 1923, when he became secretary to the Yale Corporation. Hutchins earned an LL.B. from Yale Law School in 1925 and immediately began teaching there. He was appointed acting dean in 1927 and dean in 1928. Influenced by legal realism, he revised the law school's curriculum to include a greater emphasis on legal philosophy and to rely less on the case method. He also introduced seminars that linked law and the social sciences. His tenure as dean was marked by Hutchins's dazzling style and energy. It also revealed some of Hutchins's shortcomings as an administrator. When alumni and some faculty members expressed reservations about the direction he was taking the law school, Hutchins brusquely dismissed their concerns.

Hutchins became president of the University of Chicago in 1929 and quickly emerged as perhaps the most outspoken, innovative, and controversial university president in the country. He argued that universities overemphasized research at the expense of teaching, advocated a strong core curriculum built around the “great books” of the Western tradition, and criticized the emphasis on vocational training as well as narrow specialization in undergraduate education. The faculty blocked implementation of many of Hutchins’s ideas, but he did manage to make significant changes in the approach to the undergraduate curriculum. Hutchins also abolished intercollegiate football. Under Hutchins, Chicago was a place of considerable intellectual excitement, but his high-handed style brought him into constant conflict with the faculty. After an investigation in 1937–38, the American Association of University Professors criticized tenure and promotion practices at Chicago and recommended a number of changes. The university accepted those recommendations and incorporated them into university policy.

As Hutchins established a national reputation, his public advocacy of liberal positions brought him to the attention of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his administration. Although considered for several positions in the New Deal, Hutchins refused to engage in the necessary political maneuvering. He did receive an offer to chair the Securities and Exchange Commission, which he turned down. Hutchins really wanted an appointment to the Supreme Court, but his chances for that evaporated when he opposed Roosevelt’s rearmament policies in 1940 and 1941.

The conflicts and controversies at the University of Chicago began to wear on Hutchins, and he sought other outlets for his energy and creativity. He was chair of the board of editors of the Encyclopædia Britannica from 1943 until his retirement in 1974 and took a leave of absence from the University of Chicago in 1946 to serve as its editor. In spite of his own disregard for faculty governance, Hutchins emerged as a leading voice for freedom of speech and academic freedom in the late 1940s. Hutchins led the Commission for Freedom of the Press, funded by HENRY LUCE, which published seven volumes in 1946 and 1947 as well as a summary statement, A Free and Responsible Press. His opposition to loyalty oaths for faculty members led to an investigation by a subcommittee of the Illinois state legislature in 1949.

Hutchins left the University of Chicago in 1951 to take up a position as associate director of the Ford Foundation. In that capacity, he set up three semi-independent funds: the Fund for the Advancement of Education, the Fund for Adult Education, and the Fund for the Republic. Hutchins’s outspoken positions on free speech and other issues brought him into conflict with the foundation’s board. In 1954, the board, as a means of easing him out of the foundation, appointed him director of the Fund for the Republic and provided the fund with a $15-million terminal grant. Hutchins described the Fund for the Republic as a “wholly disowned subsidiary of the Ford Foundation.” Cut loose from the foundation, the fund undertook “activities directed toward the elimination of restrictions on freedom of thought, inquiry, and expression . . . and the development of policies and procedures best adapted to protect those rights.” It supported research on the federal loyalty and security program, blacklisting in the entertainment industry, civil rights, and civil liberties.

The fund’s activities brought scrutiny from right-wing critics. FRANCIS E. WALTER (D-Pa.) of the House Un-American Activities Committee wrote Hutchins asking if the fund was “friend or foe in the fight against communism.” Hutchins replied that the letter had cast “unjust and unwarranted” doubt on the integrity of the fund’s officers. The national commander of the American Legion, Seaborn P. Collins, Jr., launched a verbal assault on the fund and on Hutchins. Hutchins aggressively defended himself and the fund against such attacks, but some members of his board worried about the danger to the fund and to their own reputations. With his job security uncertain and two-thirds of the Ford money gone, Hutchins reorganized the fund in 1959, moved it from New York City to Santa Barbara, Calif., and renamed it the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. According to Hutchins, the center was “directed at discovering whether and how a free and just society may be maintained under the strikingly new . . . considerations of the 20th century.” Rather than giving grants for research, the center focused on creating ongoing discussions of basic issues, such as freedom and responsibility, education in a democracy, world peace, and the legal system. The center included practicing politicians as well as academics in its discussions and distributed pamphlets reporting on those discussions. It also published a journal titled The Center. In 1962, Hutchins became chair of the center's board as well as its president. He stepped down to become a senior life fellow in 1974 but returned as president in 1975. In the last number of years he headed the center, he struggled with diminishing funds. He died in Santa Barbara on May 14, 1977. The center closed two years after his death.

Ives, Irving M(cNeil)
(1896–1962) U.S. senator

Ives was born of old New York stock in Bainbridge, N.Y., on January 24, 1896. He attended public schools and enrolled at Hamilton College. His college career was interrupted in 1917, when he enlisted in the army. After serving overseas during World War I, he was discharged as a first lieutenant and returned to Hamilton. Upon his graduation in 1920, he went into banking. He spent three years as a clerk for Guaranty Trust Company in New York City and then took a position as a manager with Manufacturers Trust Company in Norwich, N.Y. In 1930, he established his own insurance firm. That same year, with the support of a reform faction of the Republican party in Chenango County, he won election to the first of eight terms in the New York State Assembly. He became minority leader in 1935 and speaker in 1936. A revolt within the party cost him his speakership the next year, and he was demoted to majority leader, a position he held until he left the assembly in 1946.

In the legislature, he earned a reputation as a moderate liberal and a careful legislative craftsman. He supported social welfare legislation and laws to protect labor unions. In 1945, he cosponsored legislation to establish the nation's first Fair Employment Practices Commission (FEPC), empowered to prevent discrimination in employment on the basis of race, religion, or ethnicity. Ives hoped to gain the Republican nomination for the U.S. Senate in 1944 but failed when Gov. THOMAS E. DEWEY backed another candidate. Ives took a position as dean of the new Industrial and Labor Relations School at Cornell in 1945. In 1946, he gained Dewey's support, captured the Republican nomination for New York's other Senate seat, and easily defeated former Gov. HERBERT LEHMAN in the general election. Ives was sufficiently popular with organized labor that the state American Federation of Labor withheld its customary endorsement of the Democratic candidate. His support of the FEPC drew the votes of many black and Jewish voters.

In the Senate, Ives quickly emerged as a leader of the liberal Republicans. An internationalist since World War I, he supported the Truman administration's policy of containment and voted for the Marshall Plan and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Nevertheless, he supported a resolution in 1950 criticizing the administration's Asian policy and demanding the resignation of Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON, whom Ives believed had lost the confidence of the American people. On domestic issues, Ives established himself as an expert on labor-management issues. While more liberal than many congressional Republicans on such matters, he did support the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947. At the same time, he led an effort to moderate the bill. While he supported bans on secondary boycotts, jurisdictional walkouts, and the closed shop, as well as a provision authorizing the president to seek injunctions to delay strikes for 80 days, he persuaded Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) to eliminate a provision that would have restricted industry-wide collective bargaining. His vote for the bill soured his relations with organized labor, and WIL-LIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, vowed to defeat Ives in 1952. In spite of Green's efforts, Ives won reelection with over 55 percent of the vote.

On another significant domestic issue, Ives deplored the reckless red-baiting of Sen. JOSEPH McCARTHY (R-Wis.). In June 1950, he was one of seven Republican senators to sign a "Declaration of Conscience" charging that the Senate had been "debased to the level of a forum of hate and character assassination sheltered by the shield of Congressional immunity." When the Senate censured McCarthy in December 1954, Ives voted for the censure resolution.

Ives was among the first to enlist in the effort to persuade Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to run for the Republican nomination in 1952. After Eisenhower's election, Ives consistently supported the president's foreign and domestic policies. He backed the administration's civil rights bills in 1956 and 1957 and was a key contributor to several important pieces of labor and social legislation. As chair of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's Subcommittee on Welfare and Pension Plans, he conducted investigations that led to the passage in 1958 of legislation compelling pension plans to register with the Labor Department and submit annual reports on funding and operations.

In 1957 and 1958, Ives served as vice chair of Sen. JOHN L. McCLELLAN's (D-Ark.) Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. The committee's investigations drew attention to widespread racketeering in certain labor unions and forced the resignation of DAVE BECK, the head of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. In the wake of these disclosures, Ives cosponsored with Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) a bill containing both strong provisions to eliminate corruption in labor unions and several amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act favored by the AFL-CIO. The bill passed the Senate by 88 to 1, but vigorous opposition from some business leaders and Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell led to its defeat in the House. The Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959 contained many of the anticorruption measures but did not contain the changes in the Taft-Hartley Act favored by organized labor.

In 1954, Gov. Dewey persuaded a reluctant Ives to seek the governorship of New York. Ives lost to the Democratic candidate, W. AVERELL HARRIMAN, in the closest statewide election in a century. It was the only time Ives lost an election.

In 1958, Ives announced that he would not seek reelection due to ill health. He retired to Norwich, N.Y., where he died on February 24, 1962.

Jackson, C(harles) D(ouglas)

(1902–1964) special assistant to the president for cold war planning

The son of a marble importer, C. D. Jackson was born in New York City on March 16, 1902. He attended the Sillig School in Switzerland for his early education and the Hill School in Pottstown, Pa., from which he graduated, from 1915 to 1920. From there he went to Princeton University, where he majored in French and earned his B.A. in 1924. He had intended to teach French, but his father died the year he graduated from college, and Jackson took over the family business. The business failed during the Great Depression, and Jackson sold it in 1931. That same year, he approached HENRY R. LUCE, the head of Time magazine, for a job. Luce hired him as an assistant to the president. Jackson remained with the Luce publishing empire for the rest of his life. Soon after the launch of Life magazine in 1936, Jackson became its general manager and served in that capacity from 1937 until 1940, when he became a vice president of Time, Inc. After serving in World War II, Jackson was managing director of Time-Life International, which placed him in charge of the company's news-gathering and publishing activities outside the United States. He became publisher of Fortune magazine in 1949, vice president in charge of general management in 1954, and administrative vice president in 1959. He was publisher of Life from 1960 until his death in 1964.

His long career with the Luce empire was interrupted frequently with government service.

He took a year's leave of absence beginning in late 1940 to organize the Council for Democracy, an organization dedicated to countering isolationist sentiment. In 1942, he went to Turkey on a mission for the State Department and the Bureau of Economic Warfare. His task was to renew a contract for the purchase of Turkish chrome. On his arrival, Jackson found that the Turkish government had reached an agreement to sell its chrome to the Germans. Jackson successfully negotiated an acceleration of mining operations during the remaining months of the American contract with Turkey, and he managed to impede the subsequent shipments of chrome to Germany. In the spring of 1943, he became deputy chief of the Psychological Warfare Branch of Allied Headquarters for North Africa, Sicily, and Italy. In early 1944, he was assigned to London to help organize the Psychological Warfare Division (PWD) at the headquarters of Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, who had recently been chosen supreme commander of the Allied Expeditionary Forces. The PWD planned and executed propaganda activities; a large part of that mission was to rally the people of France to support the Allied invasion in June 1944. The PWD also participated in denazification after the war.

Jackson returned to Time, Inc., in 1945. Six years later, he took another leave of absence to serve as president of the National Committee for a Free Europe. He returned to Europe and, under the auspices of Radio Free Europe, established radio broadcasts to Soviet-occupied Czechoslovakia and other countries in Eastern Europe under Soviet domination.

Eisenhower and Jackson had become friendly during the war, and they maintained the friendship after the war ended. Jackson became an early and active supporter of Eisenhower's candidacy for the presidency in 1952. With HERBERT BROWNELL and HAROLD STASSEN, Jackson served as a member of Eisenhower's unofficial strategy team. In addition to developing themes for speeches, he also researched and helped write them. Eisenhower credited Jackson with proposing that the candidate pledge to "go to Korea." Shortly after the election, Eisenhower appointed Jackson a special assistant for cold war planning. Jackson had a role in the preparation of the inaugural address and Eisenhower's first State of the Union message. When Eisenhower took office, Jackson became special assistant to the president to deal with psychological warfare.

Jackson's position involved him with many major issues early in the administration. When, in 1953, Eisenhower rejected appeals for clemency in the case of the convicted spies JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG, Jackson objected to what he regarded as Eisenhower's failure to consider the opinion of America's allies. In March 1953, Jackson helped write the first major foreign-policy address Eisenhower gave as president. Delivered on April 16 and titled "The Chance for Peace," the speech responded to the Soviet "peace offensive" after the death of Joseph Stalin and intended to seize the psychological initiative on the issue of peace. It welcomed the recent Soviet statements regarding the need for peace and appealed to the new leaders of the Soviet Union for "clear and specific acts" to signify that they shared this goal. Jackson participated in the debate over the U.S. response to the growing demands for an end to the arms race. He joined J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER in urging full disclosure of the realities of atomic warfare. Eisenhower, however, believed that such an approach would only alarm the American people and set off panicky demands for large, ineffectual defense appropriations. Instead, the president proposed establishing an international agency to increase the supply of fissionable materials and make it available to other nations for peaceful purposes. Jackson played a major part in the preparation of Eisenhower's "Atoms for Peace" address to the United Nations in 1953, which presented that proposal to the world. He also accompanied Eisenhower to the Bermuda Conference in 1953 and the Berlin Conference in 1954, convened to discuss terms for peace treaties with Austria and Germany.

Jackson urged Eisenhower to publicly confront Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) and his reckless charges, but the president rejected Jackson's advice. Eisenhower did not want to "get down in the gutter" with the senator, and he believed that a public attack by the president would only give McCarthy more publicity, on which he fed, and possibly cause the Senate to rally around one of its own. Aware of Jackson's position, McCarthy called him a man who was "unsympathetic toward 'strong patriotism' and Americanism who would coddle communists and left-wingers in government and listen to their advice."

Jackson resigned his position in the White House in March 1954 to return to Time, Inc. He nevertheless served as a member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations beginning in September 1954. In early 1964, he was one of the organizers of the International Executive Service Corps, a private initiative that sought to aid the development of business overseas by providing advice regarding management. Jackson served as chairman of the board of the International Executive Service Corps from June 1964 until his death. He was also involved in numerous civic, cultural, and social organizations and served on the boards of the Metropolitan Opera Association, the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, the Boston Symphony, the Carnegie Corporation, the United Negro College Fund, and Project Hope. Jackson died of cancer in New York City on September 18, 1964.

Jackson, Henry M(artin)

(1912–1983) U.S. senator

The son of Norwegian immigrants, Jackson was born on May 31, 1912, in Everett, Wash., a mill town and minor seaport north of Seattle. His father was a small-time building contractor and an official in the local plasterers and cement masons union. The younger Jackson was nicknamed "Scoop," after a comic-strip character of the time (a newspaper reporter who got others to do his work for him). After earning a law degree from the University of Washington in 1935 and gaining admission to the bar the same year, he began the practice of law in Everett, Wash. He won election as prosecuting attorney of Shohomish Co. in 1938. In that office, he quickly made a name for himself with raids on illegal gambling houses and bootleg liquor establishments. Based on his reputation as a crusading prosecutor and his avid support of the New Deal, he won election as a Democrat to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1940. An isolationist before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he became a committed internationalist afterward. Given that he was of draft age and single, Jackson felt political pressure to join the military and enlisted in the army as a private. He served only a few months before President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered members of Congress to surrender their seats or leave active duty; Jackson returned to Congress. Like most politicians from the west coast, Jackson supported the internment of Japanese Americans. He was reelected five times and, during his time in the House, compiled one of the most liberal voting records in Congress. An effective advocate for his district's maritime interests, he developed expertise in areas of particular interest to the west, including public lands, reclamation, and the development of hydroelectric power. Jackson supported national health insurance and public power.

Jackson opposed the anticommunist investigations of the Truman administration. He voted against funding for the House Un-American Activities Committee and against overriding the president's veto of the Internal Security Act of 1950. However, he strongly supported Truman's anticommunist policies abroad. As a member of the Interior Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, he was instrumental in gaining public works projects for his state and in promoting the Pacific Northwest as a center for the defense industry.

In 1952, Jackson ran for the Senate against the Republican incumbent, Harry P. Cain. A charismatic war hero and one of the most vocal conservatives in the upper house, Cain had lost popularity among the state's voters for his opposition to federal funds for Washington's Grand Coulee Dam, the world's largest irrigation and hydroelectric project. Campaigning as a champion of public power and public development of atomic energy, Jackson stressed the state's strategic role in nuclear fission, created by its vast hydroelectric reserves. With the backing of the Grange, farm co-ops, and organized labor, he won the election, one of only two Senate contests in which a Democrat unseated a Republican in the Eisenhower landslide.

Arriving in the upper house in 1953, Jackson was assigned to the Government Operations Committee and its Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, both chaired by Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Although he initially raised no objections to the subcommittee's wide-ranging and sensational investigations of alleged communist subversion in the State Department and Armed Services, Jackson began to express cautious criticism of McCarthy's methods in June 1953. In July, Jackson and Senators JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.) and STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.) made headlines by demanding the firing of committee staff director, J. B. MATTHEWS, who had written a magazine article accusing the Protestant clergy of being riddled with communist sympathizers. When McCarthy refused to permit a vote on the issue, the three Democrats resigned from the subcommittee. They returned in January 1954 after McCarthy permitted them to hire their own staff assistant, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, as minority counsel.

Jackson again came before the public eye during the nationally televised Army-McCarthy hearings of 1954. In March, the army charged McCarthy and his aide, ROY COHN, with threatening to use the investigations subcommittee to "wreck the Army" unless special privileges were given their recently drafted associate, G. DAVID SCHINE. McCarthy retaliated by accusing the army of trying to blackmail him into discontinuing his investigation of security leaks at Fort Monmouth, N.J. During the subcommittee's hearings in April, May, and June, Jackson pursued a methodically legalistic line of questioning aimed at uncovering clear-cut perjury on either side. No decisive conclusion emerged from the tumultuous proceedings, but Jackson did succeed in putting McCarthy on the defensive at several points.

For his role in the hearings, the Democratic leadership rewarded him with a seat on the Interior and Insular Affairs and the Armed Forces Committees. In January 1955, when the Democrats had regained control of the Senate, he was given a place on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, making him the only freshman senator with four committee assignments. On the Interior Committee, Jackson helped lead the fight for a federally financed Hells Canyon Dam. He was also involved throughout the 1950s in problems of power development, reclamation, national parks, and mining—issues of deep concern to his constituents.

During the Eisenhower administration, Jackson compiled a strong liberal and pro-labor record in the Senate. He received the highest ratings among his colleagues by the liberal Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), and he never voted against legislation favored by the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE). Although a consistent advocate of increased welfare spending, federal aid to education, national health insurance, and civil rights, Jackson did not take the lead on these issues. Instead, he focused on military affairs and defense policy, interests that arose from his conviction that "the cold war was going to be the greatest challenge of [our] time. Just as the challenge of the 1930s was the depression, now the predominant issue was the survival of the Western world." He consistently attacked the Eisenhower administration for spending too little on defense.

As a member of the Armed Forces and Atomic Energy Committees, Jackson became a strong critic of the administration's defense policies and a leading exponent of the thesis that a "missile gap" existed between the United States and the USSR. In January 1956, Jackson made a major Senate speech warning that the Russians were ahead of the United States in the development of an intermediate-range ballistic missile that would enable them to engage in what he called "nuclear blackmail." Coming at the beginning of an election year, the speech stirred up a raging controversy. From then on, Jackson relentlessly attacked the president and Defense Secretary CHARLES E. WILSON, insisting that the administration's defense policy was causing the United States to "lose our lead" in weapons technology. Stressing the urgent need to develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM), he advocated a crash program similar to the Manhattan Project that had produced the atomic bomb during World War II. Jackson also worked closely with Adm. HYMAN G. RICKOVER in promoting the nuclear submarine program, and he repeatedly came to Rickover's assistance when the navy attempted to force the admiral into retirement.

In 1959, Jackson chaired the newly created Government Operations Committee's National Policy Subcommittee, which conducted a two-year investigation of the government's methods in the making and conducting of foreign policy. As a result of these investigations, he became intimately acquainted with the inner workings of the Defense and State Departments and acquired an expertise that made him the foremost Democratic spokesman on defense matters. Jackson's ominous warnings of a missile gap were taken up by Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) in the presidential campaign of 1960. They were later proved to have been erroneous.

During his first term in the Senate, Jackson began to develop a strongly personal, almost non-partisan, appeal among Washington voters and the state's private interests. His popularity derived, in large part, from his ability to bring federal money and jobs to his constituents in the form of reclamation, defense, and aerospace projects. But it was also the result of his assiduous courting of businessmen and Republican voters. (Washington's blanket-primary system allowed Republicans to cross over and vote for Democrats.) During his reelection campaign in 1958, in which he won 68 percent of the vote, Jackson received contributions from important corporations that generally supported Republican candidates. He began a particularly close association with the Boeing Co., one of the country's largest defense contractors and the state's biggest private employer.

As chair of the Interior Committee's Subcommittee on Territories, Jackson led the successful fight for Alaskan statehood. The following year, he managed the bill granting statehood to Hawaii. Although sometimes criticized as the "senator from Boeing," Jackson had emerged as one of the Senate's acknowledged authorities on national security policy and a major figure in the Democratic Party.

Although Jackson had been mentioned as a vice presidential possibility in 1956, he emerged as a serious contender for the second spot on the Democratic ticket in 1960. Endorsed in the opening days of the Democratic National Convention by Mayor ROBERT WAGNER of New York, Gov. PAT BROWN of California, and Sen. MIKE MANSFIELD (D-Mont.), he was also Robert F. Kennedy's personal choice. John Kennedy, however, chose Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) in the belief that the ticket could not win without carrying Texas. Jackson was asked to serve as a chairman of the Democratic National Committee. He reluctantly accepted the post but found that Robert Kennedy was the real director of the Kennedy campaign. On election day, Jackson was unable to prevent RICHARD M. NIXON from carrying Washington, and he resigned from the committee as soon as the election was over.

Jackson's relations with the Kennedy administration were distant. In the early 1960s, he criticized proposals to control nuclear weapons that he thought might sacrifice American advantages over the Soviet Union. He reluctantly supported the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty in 1963. That same year, he succeeded to the chair of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. From that position, he oversaw passage of much of the environmental legislation of the 1960s.

Jackson enthusiastically supported the policy of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations in Southeast Asia. Like Kennedy, he considered Vietnam an important battlefield in the cold war, and, as the 1960s went on, his support for Lyndon Johnson's escalation of the war drove a wedge between Jackson and liberal Democrats. In the late 1960s, Jackson supported the development of an antiballistic missile (ABM) system. When Richard Nixon won the presidential election in 1968, he offered Jackson the position of secretary of defense, which Jackson declined. Jackson continued to support development of the ABM and a robust military. These positions led to opposition from the left wing of his party and a challenge in the Democratic primary of 1970, but Jackson easily captured the nomination and won reelection in the fall.

Jackson opposed Nixon's policy of détente with the Soviet Union. He criticized the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT I) treaty of 1972 for giving an advantage to the Soviet Union, and won approval for an amendment declaring that any future agreement must provide for numerical equality between American and Soviet weapons. At the same time, he supported Nixon's opening to China.

In the early 1970s, Jackson became widely known as a strong supporter of the state of Israel. A long-term critic of Soviet abuses of human rights, he called attention to Soviet restrictions on the right of Jews to emigrate. He cosponsored the Jackson-Vanik amendment in 1974, which made increased American trade with the Soviet Union conditional on the moderation of Soviet restrictions on emigration.

Jackson launched his first bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1972 but won only the Washington state caucuses. He mounted a better effort in 1976 but ultimately lost the nomination to Jimmy Carter. Jackson continued his opposition to the strategic arms limitation process and led the attack on SALT II in 1979. Even had Carter not withdrawn the treaty to protest the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan, the treaty most likely would have failed in the Senate. In the late 1970s and 1980s, Jackson found new admirers among Republicans and neoconservative intellectuals. He agreed with President Ronald Reagan that communism and Soviet influence in Central America constituted a major strategic threat, and he supported the armed opposition to the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. Despite the discomfort of many in his party with his positions on Central America and nuclear weapons, Jackson easily won reelection in 1982. He died unexpectedly, of a ruptured aorta, on September 1, 1983, in Everett, Wash.

Jackson, Robert H(oughwout)

(1892–1954) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

Robert Jackson was born in Spring Creek, Pa., on February 13, 1892. At the age of five he moved with his family to Frewsburg, N.Y. Immediately upon graduating from high school, Jackson became a clerk in the law offices of his cousin, a prominent lawyer in Jamestown, N.Y., and an active Democrat. Jackson did attend Albany Law School for a year, but essentially he learned the law through the apprentice system. After gaining admission to the bar in 1913, Jackson built a thriving practice in Jamestown and a reputation as one of the best trial lawyers in western New York. He was active in the bar association and in Democratic politics. After Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected as governor of New York, Jackson served as an adviser, and, after Roosevelt became president, Jackson accepted a position as general counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in February 1934. Jackson moved to the Justice Department as assistant attorney general in charge of the tax division in March 1936. After only two months, he shifted to assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division. When Roosevelt appointed STANLEY REED to the Supreme Court in 1938, he named Jackson to replace Reed as solicitor general. As the "government's lawyer," Jackson won acclaim for his skill as an appellate advocate. In 1940, Roosevelt made Jackson attorney general. The next year, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes resigned, and Roosevelt elevated Justice Harlan Fiske Stone to the chief justiceship. In June 1941, Roosevelt appointed Jackson to fill the vacancy as an associate justice. The Senate confirmed Jackson a month later.

On the bench, Jackson did not gravitate toward other active New Dealers Roosevelt had elevated to the Court, such as HUGO BLACK, WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, and Frank Murphy. He quickly established himself as a powerful advocate of both nationalism and judicial restraint. As such, he voted regularly with another Roosevelt appointee, FELIX FRANKFURTER. The issue of federalism was crucial to the New Deal, and Jackson consistently championed national over state power. He filed a concurring opinion in Edwards v. California (1941), which struck down California's so-called Okie law that limited the right of entry into the state by those who had no visible means of support. Jackson argued that the right to enter any state was a "privilege" of U.S. citizenship. "If national citizenship means less than this," wrote the new justice, "it means nothing." Based on his reading of the commerce clause of the Constitution, Jackson was willing to grant the federal government broad authority to regulate the economy. He wrote the majority opinion in Wickard

v. Filburn (1942), which upheld the second Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Jackson's record was more mixed when it came to civil liberties. He often eloquently defended the individual's freedom of thought, but he also contended that the government could limit the right of free speech if the speech involved was intrusive, aggressive, or a threat to public order. He wrote for the majority in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), which struck down a state statute requiring school children to salute the flag. When, in Korematsu v. U.S. (1944), the court upheld the conviction of an American-born citizen of Japanese descent for failing to report to a relocation center, Jackson dissented.

From May 1945 to October 1946, Jackson took a leave from the Court to act as chief U.S. prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials of senior Nazi officials. Jackson regarded it as the most important work of his life.

Jackson's commitment to judicial restraint brought him into ideological and personal conflict with other Roosevelt appointees, particularly Black. The feud with Black exploded into an embarrassingly public war in 1946. When Stone died in April 1946, HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed a loyal friend, FRED M. VINSON, to be chief justice. Jackson, who was in Nuremberg when Stone died and Truman pondered a replacement, believed that Black's active opposition had cost him the chief justiceship. He responded by issuing a blistering public attack on Black that harmed Jackson more than it did his adversary.

Influenced by his work at Nuremberg and by the emergence of the cold war, Jackson increasingly perceived a need to balance freedom and public order. In Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), he dissented from a majority ruling that overturned the conviction for a breach of the peace by a defrocked Catholic priest whose fascist and anti-Semitic speech "provoked a hostile mob and incited a friendly one, and threatened violence between the two." Jackson warned that the majority's "doctrinaire" view of the First Amendment would "convert the . . . Bill of Rights into a suicide pact." Similar concerns led Jackson to uphold federal measures to restrict communist activities. In American Communications Association v. Douds (1950), the Court upheld a section of the Taft-Hartley Act requiring officers of labor unions to sign affidavits affirming that they were not members of the communist party and did not believe in the unlawful overthrow of the government. Jackson concurred in part and dissented in part. He was willing to allow the government to inquire into membership in the communist party but drew the line at efforts by the government to inquire into private beliefs. The following year, in Dennis v. U.S., he voted with the majority to affirm the conviction of officers of the communist party for conspiring to teach or advocate the overthrow of the government in violation of the Smith Act. Jackson unwaveringly supported the separation of church and state. He dissented when, in Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township (1947), the Court upheld a New Jersey statute that authorized school boards to reimburse parents of children who attended Catholic schools for the cost of transportation. Similarly, Jackson dissented from the majority's position in Zorach v. Clauson (1952), which upheld a New York law allowing release time for religious instruction during school hours providing that the instruction took place off school property.

While he had generally supported the expansion of civil rights for African Americans, Jackson had reservations about the school desegregation cases. After participating in the oral arguments, he did not think that the legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment supported a decision striking down segregated public schools, and he considered filing a separate concurring opinion. Ultimately, Chief Justice EARL WARREN persuaded him of the need for unanimity. Although Jackson suffered a heart attack on April 1, 1954, he returned to the bench on May 17 to be present when Warren read the Court's decision. It was a dramatic demonstration of the Court's unity and of Jackson's support for the decision. Shortly after commencement of the fall term, Jackson suffered a second heart attack and died on October 8, 1954, in McLean, Va.

A superb prose stylist and legal craftsman, Jackson remains one of the most frequently quoted American jurists. His commitment to judicial restraint continues to influence American jurisprudence.

Javits, Jacob K(oppel)

(1904–1986) U.S. senator

Javits's father, a rabbinical student in Austria, emigrated to New York City and worked as a janitor in a tenement and a Tammany Hall ward heeler on the Lower East Side. Jacob Javits was born on May 18, 1904, in New York City. After graduating from high school, he attended night classes at Columbia University and in 1923 enrolled in New York University Law School. He supported himself with part-time jobs and earned his J.D. in 1926. After gaining admission to the bar in 1927, he joined with his older brother to form the law firm of Javits and Javits, specializing in bankruptcy and corporate reorganization. The firm enjoyed considerable success. Repulsed by the corruption of Tammany Hall, he joined the Republican-Fusion party in the 1930s and was an avid supporter of Fiorello H. La Guardia. He served in the Chemical Warfare Department in Washington, D.C., during World War II and achieved the rank of lieutenant colonel. In 1945, he was the chief of research for the Republican-Liberal-Fusion ticket's unsuccessful mayoral candidate. The following year, the Republican party nominated him to run for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives from the city's Upper West Side. Javits became the first Republican to carry the district since 1920.

Javits immediately established himself as among the most liberal Republicans in Congress. He regarded himself as a political descendant of Theodore Roosevelt and argued that a healthy political party had to have room for more than one point of view. His views led him to support the Truman administration on a number of controversial issues. He voted to uphold President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto of the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947 and supported the Marshall Plan as well as the Truman Doctrine. An outspoken opponent of discrimination, he supported legislation to outlaw the poll tax in 1947 and 1949. Alarmed by its excesses, he also voted against funding for the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1948. In addition, Javits emerged as an early and enthusiastic supporter of the state of Israel.

After the Republican victory in 1952, Javits frequently had to defend his Republican credentials against colleagues who regarded him as too liberal.

He described himself as a mainstream Eisenhower Republican, but, in fact, he frequently took positions more liberal than those of the administration. In April 1954, Javits proposed an amendment to the administration's omnibus open housing bill that would have banned segregation in housing financed through federal mortgage insurance. The amendment failed.

In August, he criticized a bill, requested by Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL, to give the Justice Department authority to grant immunity to congressional and court witnesses. Critics of the bill claimed that it would have the effect of compelling witnesses to testify or go to jail. Javits voted against the bill, but Congress passed it, and President Eisenhower signed it later in the month.

In 1954, Javits did not run for reelection and instead ran for attorney general of New York State. His opponent, Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr., was well-known, well-funded, and expected to win. Javits, however, combined support from the Jewish community, a strong showing with New York City's liberal vote, and traditionally Republican voters upstate to pull off the upset. As New York's attorney general, he supported legislation banning employment discrimination and a health insurance program for state employees. He also continued to speak out on national issues, backing aid to Israel, expanded federal public housing, and a higher federal minimum wage.

Javits sought the seat in the U.S. Senate vacated by the retirement of HERBERT LEHMAN (D-N.Y.). His bid ran into difficulty when, shortly before the Republican state committee met in September to choose a nominee, Julian G. Sourwine, former counsel to the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, accused Javits of having been "mixed up" with a staff member of the communist Daily Worker. Javits aggressively countered the charge, and the convention unanimously selected him as the nominee on September 10. In November, he defeated his Democratic opponent, New York City's mayor, ROBERT F. WAGNER, by approximately 450,000 votes.

In the Senate, Javits resumed his role as a leading Republican congressional liberal. He endorsed the administration's civil rights bill in 1957 as "the minimum which should be enacted at this time." Three years later, Javits unsuccessfully sought to strengthen the administration's civil rights bill by expanding its voting rights provisions and establishing a permanent Commission on Equal Job Opportunity. In August 1959, Javits and Sen. HUGH SCOTT (R-Pa.) were the only two Republicans in the upper chamber who voted to override a veto of a public housing bill, which President Eisenhower had criticized as "extravagant." In May 1960, Javits was among five Republican senators to support an effort to override a presidential veto of an area redevelopment bill. The Senate sustained both vetoes.

Javits believed that government had a constructive role to play in improving the lives of citizens. He also believed in a mixed economy and attempted to support private enterprise. In 1960, liberal Democrats supported the Forand bill, which provided for the establishment of a medical care plan for the aged within the Social Security system. Javits and seven other Republicans offered a voluntary plan involving federal and state grants to subsidize the purchase of private health insurance.

In the area of foreign policy, Javits staunchly supported the administration. He backed the Eisenhower Doctrine for the Middle East in 1957. Two years later, Javits endorsed the administration's program of foreign military and economic assistance, and criticized Sen. MIKE MANSFIELD's (D-Mont.) proposal for reducing economic aid.

During the 1960s, despite his position as part of the liberal minority within the minority party, Javits became one of the most prominent figures in Congress by serving on as many committees and subcommittees as possible and by speaking out on a wide range of issues. Javits also continued his support of civil rights. As part of that effort, he backed an attempt to change the Senate rules to make it easier to end a filibuster in 1961. He supported a bill banning the discriminatory use of literacy tests in federal elections in 1962 and the civil rights bill offered by President JOHN F. KENNEDY in 1963. In addition, he repeatedly offered riders aimed at denying federal funds to institutions that practiced segregation. Javits backed President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's civil rights measures and much of the Great Society as well.

In 1962, Javits won reelection by almost 1 million votes. He backed NELSON ROCKEFELLER for the Republican nomination in 1964, and, when the conservative BARRY M. GOLDWATER won the nomination, Javits declined to endorse him. That decision did not hinder his own electoral chances. Javits won reelection in 1968, this time by more than a million votes.

Although Javits supported the Johnson administration's policy in Vietnam during the early and mid-1960s, by 1967 he began to have doubts and joined 22 other senators in calling for a peaceful resolution of the conflict. In 1970, Javits supported the Cooper-Church amendment to bar funds for combat operations in Cambodia and voted to repeal the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. He also supported the McGovern-Hatfield amendment designed to end the war in 1971. The following year, he voted for a proposal to cut off funds for all combat operations in Southeast Asia by the end of 1972. Javits sponsored legislation in 1970 to limit the war-making powers of the president. It did not pass that year, but Javits persisted, and Congress passed the War Powers Act over Nixon's veto in 1973.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Javits became a leading advocate of consumer protection legislation. He cosponsored a bill in 1970 to create a consumer protection agency. The bill died on the Senate floor in 1972, again in 1974, and yet again in conference committee in 1975. While Javits opposed Nixon's policy in Southeast Asia, he responded cautiously as the Watergate scandal unfolded in 1973 and 1974. Javits maintained that Nixon was innocent until proven guilty. That position and the disastrous impact of Watergate on all Republicans in 1974 substantially reduced Javits's margin of victory when he ran for a fourth term in 1974. At this point, Javits increasingly turned his attention to world affairs and, in particular, to the Middle East.

By 1980, Javits's health had begun to fail. Moreover, as his party shifted to the right, his brand of liberal Republicanism grew more and more out of fashion. A conservative challenger, Alfonse D'Amato, defeated him in the Republican primary that year. Javits defiantly ran on the Liberal party ticket, but his presence split the liberal vote, handing D'Amato a victory in the general election. After the election, Javits retired from public life. He died in Palm Beach, Fla., on March 7, 1986.

Jenner, William E(zra)

(1908–1985) U.S. senator

Born in Marengo, Ind., on July 21, 1908, Jenner graduated from Indiana University in 1930. While working as an elevator operator in the Old House Office Building, he took night classes at George Washington University and subsequently earned a law degree from Indiana University Law School. After gaining admission to the bar, he entered private practice in Indiana. He won election to the Indiana State Senate in 1934 and served in that body until 1942. Jenner became minority leader in 1937 and was president pro tempore and majority leader from 1938 to 1941. In 1942, he resigned his seat to serve in the army air corps during World War II. He left the service as a captain in 1944 and returned to Indiana. In November 1944, he won an election to fill the remaining weeks in the Senate term of Frederick Van Nuys (D-Ind.), who had died in office. Jenner did not stand for election for the full term. Instead, he resumed his law practice and became chair of the Republican State Committee. Jenner won a full term in the U.S. Senate in 1946.

Jenner was a member of the "Class of 1946," a group of Republican legislators elected in the Republican landslide of that year who supported a conservative domestic agenda and rejected the Europe-first orientation of the Truman administration's foreign policy. Like others of this group, Jenner believed that America's primary area of interest in foreign policy was in Asia. As such, he opposed the Marshall Plan and the establishment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He also expressed outrage that the United States sent aid to socialist Great Britain. In contrast, Jenner vigorously supported increased aid to Nationalist China. One of the most vocal members of the so-called China bloc, he charged that the Truman administration's refusal to aid Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) led to the fall of China to the Communists. Jenner also supported Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) charges that a communist conspiracy in the State Department was responsible for the loss of China. Indeed, Jenner became McCarthy's closest ally. When the Tydings committee, created to investigate McCarthy's initial charges, issued its report, Jenner attacked it as "the most scandalous and brazen whitewash of treasonable conspiracy in our history.” An outspoken critic of Gen. George C. Marshall, whom he blamed for the fall of China and for failing to stop the spread of communism elsewhere, Jenner described Marshall as “either an unsuspecting stooge or an actual coconspirator with the most treasonable array of political cutthroats ever turned loose in the executive branch of government.” In 1950, Jenner voted against amending the National Security Act of 1947 to permit Marshall to become secretary of defense. In the debate over that measure, Jenner called Marshall a “living lie” and a “front man for traitors.” The senator from Indiana also opposed President HARRY S. TRUMAN’s dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur in 1951 and called for the president’s impeachment.

Jenner supported Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio for the Republican nomination in 1952 and reluctantly backed DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER after the latter won the nomination. Nevertheless, Jenner, running for reelection, campaigned aggressively against the Democratic ticket. He warned that “if ADLAI [STEVENSON] gets into the White House, Alger [Hiss] gets out of jail.” He charged that if Stevenson won, the “Red Network” would be able to operate safely. In typically harsh terms, he predicted that, in the event of a Democratic victory, the “bodies of thousands of American boys would be tossed onto Truman’s funeral pyre in Asia.”

Despite Jenner’s efforts on behalf of the ticket, Eisenhower had little taste for the senator from Indiana. At a rally in Indianapolis on September 9, the candidate sat on the same podium with Jenner. In his speech, Eisenhower endorsed the entire Republican ticket but failed to mention Jenner by name. When Eisenhower finished, Jenner quickly jumped to his feet and embraced the nominee while photographers captured the moment. An embarrassed and furious Eisenhower demanded that Rep. CHARLES HALLECK (R-Ind.) “get me out of here.” Eisenhower later told EMMET HUGHES that he “felt dirty from the touch of the man.” Nevertheless, Democrats and even some Republicans criticized Eisenhower’s unwillingness to publicly repudiate Jenner.

After the Republicans swept the elections in 1952, Taft, the new majority leader, appointed Jenner chair of the Internal Security Subcommittee in an effort to contain McCarthy’s excesses. Although Taft disliked Jenner, he believed that the senator from Indiana would submit to party discipline, something that McCarthy could not be counted on to do. Taft hoped that Jenner would continue to attack past Democratic administrations and not embarrass his own party. Initially, the strategy seemed to work. Jenner repeatedly denounced the Truman administration.

In July 1953, the Internal Security Subcommittee issued a report entitled “Interlocking Subversion in Government.” Reprinted and circulated by the Republican National Committee, it attempted to document what Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL called “the very successful communist espionage penetration in our government during World War II and thereafter.” A noted civil libertarian, Norman Redlich, examined the charges in the February 6, 1954, edition of the Nation. He wrote that the report was a rehash of old charges and questioned the accuracy of the findings.

The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee also resumed the inquiry into the Harry Dexter White affair. Through documents and testimony provided by former Secretary of State JAMES BYRNES, Attorney General Herbert Brownell, and FBI Director J. EDGAR HOOVER, the panel concluded that President Truman had known that White was a communist when he had appointed him to head the International Monetary Fund. Truman defended his actions on national television, and little action was taken on the report. Many years later, the Verona decrypts firmly established that White engaged in espionage for the Soviets.

In early 1954, Jenner claimed that the Republican administration had found “heaps of evidence of the stupidity, the corruption, even the treason of its predecessors.” Jenner said the Democrats had “permitted traitors to bring us close to military defeat.” In a speech in Indiana he said, “The Fair Dealers and their communist brain trusts . . . put every possible handicap on our Armed Forces” and sent them to Korea where they “were supposed to be defeated.”

From 1953 to 1955, Jenner’s subcommittee investigated a wide range of alleged communist activities: subversion in the clergy, army, United Nations and, most particularly, the schools. Jenner proudly claimed that as a result of his probes many teachers had been dismissed. He complimented school systems, such as those in California and New York, for cooperating with his subcommittee in the task of rooting out communists.

Reacting to several decisions by the Supreme Court restricting investigations of subversion, Jenner cosponsored a bill in 1957 to limit the Court's power. One provision would have restored to congressional committees the investigative authority that the Court had limited in Watkins v. U.S. (1957). In Watkins, the Court held that congressional investigations had to be related to a legitimate function of Congress; congressional investigators had no power to expose for the sake of exposure. A second section would have effectively reversed the Court's decision in Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), which overturned a state sedition law on the ground that Congress had preempted the field with the Smith Act. A third provision would have reversed the Court's ruling in Yates v. United States (1957), which had narrowly interpreted the Smith Act by distinguishing between advocacy of the forcible overthrow of the government as an abstract doctrine and advocacy of action toward that end. Moreover, the bill would have barred the Court from accepting or deciding cases dealing with these and related matters in the future. Attorney General WILLIAM P. ROGERS and the American Bar Association condemned the Jenner bill; the Senate rejected it on August 20, 1958.

Even as the Senate moved to censure McCarthy, Jenner remained a loyal ally. In November 1954, he charged the Watkins committee, which had recommended censure of the Wisconsin Republican, with having failed to consider "the most important evidence"—that McCarthy "was fighting a conspiracy." Jenner maintained that the censure movement "was initiated by a communist conspiracy" and that the Watkins committee was aiding it. He interrupted the final debate on condemnation and personally attacked Sen. RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.), whose actions during the spring of 1954 had helped spur the censure movement. Jenner asked the Vermont Republican why he had referred to "Soviet tyrants and murderers as 'my friends, my brothers.'" The words Jenner cited came from a Voice of America broadcast that Flanders had made to the Soviet-bloc countries. Flanders retorted that Jenner had "taken leave of his intelligence." He explained that the broadcast was directed to the Soviet people and not the government. Despite Jenner's efforts, the Senate voted to condemn McCarthy in December.

Jenner continued to be one of the leading members of the China bloc in the Senate. In May 1954 he called on the United States to arm 20 million Nationalist Chinese, Korean, Japanese, and other anticommunists in Asia to support Taiwan's attacks on the mainland and divert communist forces from Indochina. Jenner expressed outrage that the United States prevented Chiang Kai-shek from raiding the mainland and opposed any further attempts by the U.S. government to resume normal relations with communist China. He also asked the president to issue a "final statement" that the United States would not recognize Communist China or sanction its admission to the UN. During the dispute over Quemoy and Matsu in late 1954, Jenner supported a blockade of the mainland. On April 28, 1955, Jenner introduced a resolution that would have repudiated in advance any concessions that the United States might make to Beijing.

Jenner became increasingly dissatisfied with the Eisenhower administration. By 1956, he was making public his view that Eisenhower's leadership had "ruined" the Republican party. He thought the party should reconstitute itself as a conservative party. Near the end of 1957, Jenner surprised political observers and the leaders of his own party when he announced that he would not seek reelection in 1958. He returned to Indiana and resumed his law practice. His other interests included the Seaway Corporation, a land-development company, and four farms he owned. Jenner died in Bedford, Ind., on March 9, 1985.

Johnson, Frank M(inis), Jr.

(1918–1999) U.S. district judge

Born at Haleyville, in the Republican hill country of northern Alabama, on October 30, 1918, Frank Johnson attended Birmingham-Southern College on a football scholarship and Massey Business College in Birmingham before enrolling in the pre-law program at the University of Alabama. He graduated at the top of his law school class at the University of Alabama in 1943. Later that year, he joined the army as a private, was commissioned as a lieutenant, won the Bronze Star for his actions during the Normandy invasion, and was mustered out a captain. He returned to Alabama, began a law practice in Jasper, and became active in Republican politics. In 1952, he headed the Alabama Veterans for Eisenhower and was a state campaign manager for DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's presidential campaign. President Eisenhower appointed him U.S. attorney for the northern district of Alabama in 1953. Two years later, Eisenhower appointed him U.S. district judge for the middle district of Alabama. Johnson began his judicial service on November 7, 1955.

Judge Johnson decided several important civil rights cases and in the process won a reputation among most observers as a fair and principled jurist. On June 6, 1956, during the Montgomery bus boycott led by MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., Johnson joined the majority on a three-judge federal court that held Montgomery's law requiring segregated buses unconstitutional. Three years later, he struck down racial segregation in Montgomery's public parks. Johnson also handed down rulings ordering the desegregation of public schools and colleges, libraries, museums, depots, airports, restaurants, and other places of public accommodation.

In December 1958, Judge Johnson had the first of many run-ins with George C. Wallace, a former law school classmate who was then a state circuit court judge. On December 8, Wallace defied a subpoena from the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and refused to turn over voter registration records in two counties under his jurisdiction. In three separate decrees issued between December 11 and January 9, Johnson ordered Wallace to let agents of the commission examine the records. Wallace kept up his resistance but finally, on January 12 and 13, gave the records to county grand juries, which then let commission employees see the data. On January 26, Johnson dismissed contempt charges against Wallace, explaining that Wallace had complied with court orders, though indirectly, and that punishing him would only promote his political fortunes. In August 1960, Johnson also overturned a state court injunction blocking federal investigators from examining voter registration records in Montgomery. At the same time, he upheld the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 against a challenge from the state.

With his evenhanded, considered approach, Johnson did not always decide civil rights cases in favor of African Americans or the federal government if he thought law or precedent was against them. In one of the first major tests of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, Johnson ruled in March 1959 against the Justice Department. He held that the law did not allow the federal government to bring a voting discrimination suit directly against the state of Alabama. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld his interpretation, and, as a result of the adverse ruling, Congress included a provision to authorize voting rights suits against the states in the Civil Rights Act of 1960. In 1960, Johnson upheld the expulsion without a hearing of six black students from Alabama State College for having led sit-ins in Montgomery and Tuskegee. A higher court later reversed Johnson.

Throughout the 1960s, Judge Johnson's rulings pushed reluctant white Alabamans toward desegregation. In March 1961, he entered a sweeping decree, which served as a model for other federal courts, outlawing voting discrimination in Macon Co. Johnson enjoined a planned civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery in March 1965, but later in the month, he authorized the march and ordered the state to supply police protection to the demonstrators. The day after that march, one participant, Viola Liuzzo, was murdered. A jury in Lowndes Co. failed to convict three Ku Klux Klansmen accused of the crime, despite a witness who testified that he saw one of the defendants commit the murder. The three were later tried on federal civil rights charges, but the jury declared itself deadlocked. Measuring his words carefully to avoid a mistrial, Johnson urged them to try again; the evidence, he instructed, could not be more clear. The jury brought in a conviction, and Johnson sentenced the defendants to the maximum term of three years in prison. Johnson ordered officials in various counties under his jurisdiction to prepare school desegregation plans and in March 1967 was a member of a three-judge court that placed all of Alabama under an order to desegregate its schools. His decisions made him a frequent target of criticism from George Wallace, who had become governor of Alabama. Wallace called him an “integratin’, carpetbaggin’, baldfaced liar.” Johnson was socially ostracized and received countless threats. He was under 24-hour protection by federal marshals from 1961 to 1975. Johnson incurred Wallace’s wrath again in the 1970s with decisions requiring the state to improve the state’s institutions for the mentally ill and retarded as well as its prison system. Johnson also, in 1972, ordered the Alabama State Police, which had never had a black trooper, to end its “blatant and continuous discrimination.” In 1977, President Jimmy Carter nominated Johnson to head the FBI, but Johnson withdrew after undergoing heart surgery. After recovering from that surgery, Johnson returned to the bench. He ruled in 1978 that the hiring practices of Alabama State University discriminated against whites, making him the first federal judge to find a black institution guilty of discrimination against whites. In 1979, Carter appointed Johnson to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Two years later, when the Fifth Circuit was divided in two, Johnson became a judge on the new Eleventh Circuit. He took senior judge status in 1992. Three years later, President Bill Clinton awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Johnson died of pneumonia at his home in Montgomery, Ala., on July 23, 1999.

Johnson, Lyndon B(aines)

(1908–1973) U.S. senator, Senate minority leader, Senate majority leader

Born in Stonewall, Tex., on August 27, 1908, Lyndon Johnson was the eldest son of Sam Johnson, a small farmer and cattle speculator, and Rebecca Baines, the daughter of a prosperous lawyer. At the age of five, he moved from Stonewall, Tex., to nearby Johnson City, founded by his grandfather, a populist politician. Johnson worked his way through Southwest Texas State Teachers College and graduated with a B.S. in 1930. For the next two years, he taught in the Houston public school system.

In 1932, Johnson went to Washington, D.C., as secretary to Rep. Richard Kleberg (D-Tex.) of the 14th district. There he assiduously gathered information about the operation of Congress and took advantage of every opportunity to meet influential people, including Reps. SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and WRIGHT PATMAN (D-Tex.), who had both served in the Texas state legislature with his father. Three years later, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed him Texas Director of the National Youth Administration (NYA). The youngest state NYA director. Johnson proved a capable administrator and built up a political constituency through the gratitude he received from those who obtained NYA jobs.

In 1937, Johnson entered a special election for the congressional seat from Texas’s 10th District, a relatively liberal area in a conservative state. He distinguished himself from his seven opponents by proclaiming total support for President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s programs, including the president’s plan to enlarge the Supreme Court. Johnson received twice the votes of his closest opponent. By making a favorable impression on Roosevelt, Johnson obtained a seat on the powerful Naval Affairs Committee and used it to procure public works projects for his district.

Power in the House was based on seniority, and the impatient Johnson did not want to travel the long road to preeminence. In 1941, he ran for a Senate seat in a special election but lost by 1,300 votes to Texas Gov. Wilbert L. “Pappy” O’Daniel. Immediately after Pearl Harbor, Johnson asked to be called up for active duty. He served as the president’s special emissary in Australia and New Zealand for seven months and returned to Congress in July 1942, when Roosevelt recalled all legislators to their duties in Washington. Six years later, Johnson ran for the Senate again and defeated the conservative former governor, Coke Stevenson, in the Democratic primary by 87 votes, out of 1 million cast, despite the loser’s charge of fraud.

In the Senate, Johnson shifted significantly to the right. His new, statewide constituency was much more conservative than the 10th district. Furthermore, Johnson wanted to associate himself with conservative Sen. RICHARD RUSSELL (D-Ga.), the most powerful figure in the Senate. To get closer to Russell, he requested an appointment to the Georgia senator’s Armed Services Committee, which he received. With Russell’s assistance, he became party whip in 1951.

After the majority leader, Ernest McFarland (D-Ariz.), was defeated in the elections of 1952, Johnson devoted all of his energies to behind-the-scenes efforts to win the post while publicly feigning disinterest. He succeeded with the help of key public endorsements from Russell and Sen. Earle Clements (D-Ky.), who had ties to the liberal wing of the party. Because the Republicans had gained control of both houses of Congress in 1952, Johnson became the Senate minority leader.

The post of party leader was not highly coveted. It had historically been a largely titular office, a front for an informal inner club of powerful senators. McFarland, for example, had merely served as the spokesman for Russell, the real leader of the upper chamber's Democrats. Shortly after assuming the post, however, Johnson subtly expanded his powers to become the center of his party's power structure in the Senate. He reformed the seniority system so that every Democratic senator, including freshmen, was guaranteed a good committee assignment. In the name of a fairer distribution of committee seats, he gained discretionary power in making assignments that previous leaders had not possessed. By party rule, the leader was also chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee. Johnson severed its ties with and accountability to the party as a whole, making it a purely senatorial institution, fully under his control. He eliminated its function of determining legislative programs and limited its responsibility largely to that of determining the flow of legislation to the floor. This gave him considerable influence over senators seeking the passage of particular bills. Johnson virtually eliminated the Democratic Caucus, thereby ending group discussions of issues and depriving Democratic senators of a collective decision-making apparatus beyond the leader's control. Johnson channeled the funds of the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee into the smaller states, where they were more likely to have greater impact. This gave him a clear claim to the gratitude of senators elected with the help of the committee. He used his responsibility for assigning office space to reward cooperative senators with better offices and punish rebellious colleagues with cramped quarters.

Johnson supplemented these powers with an elaborate intelligence network that enabled him to learn the desires and needs of his fellow senators. He used this information to dangle before his party colleagues those rewards or (usually by implication) punishments most likely to influence their votes. Johnson also was extremely skilled in the art of persuasion on a one-to-one basis. Few Democratic senators were completely immune to what became known as the "Johnson Treatment."

Although Johnson succeeded in making himself a powerful party leader, his legislative goals were modest. In February 1953, he declared that Senate Democrats would engage in the "politics of responsibility" rather than the "politics of partisanship," which meant that despite the wishes of liberals in the party, he would not offer a comprehensive alternative to the administration's program. Johnson believed that only the president could initiate major legislation. In addition, his political base in Texas was conservative. Moreover, his style of behind-the-scenes manipulation was conducive to the politics of concession and compromise, not the formulation of ideological programs. Finally, Johnson thought that, given President Eisenhower's great popularity, it would be politically suicidal to attack him frontally.

Therefore, Johnson proceeded cautiously, challenging the administration on a selective basis and only when he believed that his party's conservatives and liberals could unite on the issue involved. He took strong stands in favor of strengthening the Social Security system and extending rural electrification while refusing to move to Eisenhower's left on such controversial issues as public power and civil rights. Often he presented the Democrats as the best ally of the president, supporting him against right-wing Republicans. In 1953, Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) demanded that a resolution, backed by the Eisenhower administration, denouncing Soviet "enslavement" of eastern Europe be amended to include condemnation of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements, an implied attack on the Democrats. Johnson denounced Taft for trying to "divide us in the face of the enemy" and praised Eisenhower for having issued "a clear call for America to speak with a united voice against the Soviet enslavement of free peoples."

Johnson's approach to Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) typified his cautiousness. He feared that a Democratic attack on the Wisconsin senator would unite Republicans and make it appear that the Democrats were trying to cover up the alleged subversive influences in the Truman administration. Johnson did not move against McCarthy until he believed that immediate success was possible. That time came after the Senate, in August 1954, voted to establish a select committee to investigate censure charges. The unanimous Democratic opposition to McCarthy in the censure vote of December 1954 resulted, in large measure, from Johnson's efforts. To avoid charges by McCarthy's supporters that Democrats were soft on communism, Johnson in 1954 suggested that the United States might withdraw from the United Nations if Communist China were admitted and that the nation should act against the left-wing government in Guatemala.

When Johnson became majority leader in 1955, he continued his policy of cautious compromise. During that year, he added protectionist provisions to a reciprocal trade bill to secure its passage. In 1955, he also opposed liberal Sen. PAUL DOUGLAS's (D-Ill.) effort to raise the minimum wage level in an administration bill from 90 cents to $1.25. Johnson agreed to increase the figure to $1. At the same time, however, he eliminated a provision extending minimum-wage coverage to additional workers because he feared that it would split the party along

North-South lines. In July of that year, Johnson suffered a heart attack but recovered by the end of September.

In 1956, Johnson, with Rayburn's backing, headed an attempt to wrest control of the Texas Democratic Party from conservative Gov. ALLAN SHIVERS, who had led most of the organization to bolt from the national party in 1952 and support Eisenhower. To bolster this effort, he offered himself as Texas's favorite-son candidate for president. With the aid of Texas liberals, he won control of the state convention in May 1956 and was elected chairman of the delegation to the National Democratic Convention. Some of his advisers urged him to turn his favorite-son candidacy into an active, full-scale bid for the presidential nomination. Because he was a Southerner with a conservative political base, Johnson decided to forgo the primary popularity contests and rest his hopes on the possibility of a deadlocked convention. However, ADLAI E. STEVENSON won the nomination on the first ballot.

In September 1956, the majority leader split with his Texas liberal allies of the previous spring, leaving the Johnson-Rayburn moderates with exclusive control of the state party. Under their leadership, the organization rejected both state interposition against the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision of 1954, the strategy favored by Shivers, and active implementation of the Court's ruling, the policy backed by the liberals.

In 1956, the Eisenhower administration submitted to Congress a four-part civil rights bill providing for the creation of a civil rights commission, the elevation of the Civil Rights Section of the Criminal Division in the Justice Department to the status of a division, authority for the attorney general to enter civil suits to enforce civil rights, and protection for voting rights. Johnson wanted nothing to do with a battle over civil rights that would divide his party in an election year. When the House passed the civil rights bill, he cleverly outmaneuvered liberals in the Senate and consigned the bill to oblivion by committing it to Sen. JAMES O. EASTLAND's (D-Miss.) Judiciary Committee. After the election, Johnson concluded that, for the sake of his party and for his own presidential ambitions, some form of civil rights bill would have to pass. He warned the southern Democrats that if they continued to block all civil rights legislation, the liberals might muster enough votes to change Rule 22 and eliminate the filibuster. Without the threat of a filibuster, he admonished, the South would face another Reconstruction. When the administration resubmitted the bill the following year, Johnson held his party together, weakened the bill sufficiently to avoid a southern filibuster, and oversaw passage of the first civil rights legislation since Reconstruction. In order to avoid the filibuster, Johnson eliminated Title III, which authorized the attorney general to initiate civil action for preventive relief in a wide range of civil rights matters. To achieve this, Johnson brokered a deal between Democrats from the mountain states and southern Democrats. Johnson promised the western Democrats that if they voted to remove Title III, he would persuade southern Democrats to vote for the Hells Canyon Dam project in Idaho. In addition, he had friendly senators add to Title IV, the section protecting voting rights, an amendment that required a jury trial for those held in contempt of court under the provisions of the act. Johnson's deft maneuvering guided the bill through the Senate, but he also effectively gutted the measure. To add to the frustration of Republicans, Johnson also managed to walk off with most of the credit.

In the furor after the Soviet Union launched Sputnik in October 1957, Johnson arranged for the Armed Services Committee's Defense Preparedness Subcommittee, which he chaired, to hold hearings. He did so, at least partly, in effort to neutralize STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.), a rival for the Democratic nomination in 1960 who intended to use hearings of the full Armed Services Committee to attack Eisenhower for allowing his concern with the budget to imperil the nation. Held from October 1957 to January 1958, Johnson's hearings eschewed direct partisan attacks on the president or the administration. Rather than rehash Democratic criticisms of Eisenhower's cuts in defense spending, the hearings focused on the new issues of space and the development of missiles and how the United States could close the gap. Johnson cautiously avoided partisan recriminations. He understood that taking the high road in this instance also made good politics. In a political masterstroke, Johnson used the hearings to put the Republican administration on the defensive without launching a personal attack on the president or seeming to engage in partisan politics.

The Democratic sweep of the congressional elections in 1958 weakened Johnson's hold over his Democratic Senate colleagues. A number of liberal freshmen Democrats entered the upper house, strengthening the ranks of senators favoring a clear-cut alternative program. Meanwhile, President Eisenhower became more aggressive in his determination to minimize spending. Sen. EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.), the new Republican leader, was much more inclined than his predecessor, Sen. WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.), to exert pressure in order to secure Republican unity. The approaching presidential election of 1960 intensified political polarization. Under these circumstances, Johnson, whose system of operation was founded on compromise, could not function at his best. Early in 1959, in an effort to please liberals, he introduced bills to fund the construction of airports and housing. On the floor, however, he angered liberals by cutting funds from both measures in an effort to secure veto-proof bills. Nevertheless, he still failed to get enough votes to override subsequent vetoes of these measures.

In 1960, Johnson made a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. Johnson was indecisive about running because, as in 1956, he knew the disadvantages faced by Southerners in Democratic presidential politics and feared that a bid for the presidency might destroy his conservative Texas political base. Johnson decided to wait for front-runners Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and Sen. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) to eliminate each other in the primaries before announcing his candidacy. The strategy fell apart in May 1960, when Kennedy eliminated Humphrey in the West Virginia primary. Johnson's second-line strategy was to encourage all candidates to remain in the race in the hope of blocking a first-ballot victory for Kennedy at the Democratic National Convention in July. In a last-minute act of desperation, he and House Speaker Rayburn announced in late June that Congress would recess July 2 and reconvene between the Democratic Convention and the election. This was an act of political blackmail intended to convey the impression that if anyone but Johnson were nominated, the majority leader would stall liberal legislation to the detriment of the candidate. He did not announce his candidacy until July 5.

Johnson's bid failed in part because of his delay in announcing, but his lack of ties to the urban machines, labor unions, and minority groups that formed an essential part of the Democratic party also hurt him. Moreover, Johnson relied on gaining the support of members of his party in the Senate, whom he hoped would influence the selection of delegates. In essence, Johnson ran a traditional insider campaign for the nomination. Kennedy outflanked him by running outside the party organization. He used pollsters and carefully selected state primaries in which to run. The senators on whom Johnson relied had less influence on the selection of delegates than Johnson had expected.

Kennedy won the nomination on the first ballot with 806 votes to 409 for Johnson. Kennedy surprised many observers (and disappointed many liberals) by selecting Johnson as his vice presidential running mate. Having received only 9½ delegate votes from the South, the senator from Massachusetts selected the majority leader to strengthen the ticket in that region. In addition, Kennedy had been a lightweight in the Senate; Johnson was the heaviest of heavyweights. The Texan was a perfect ticket-balancer. Why Johnson decided to accept the candidacy for an almost powerless office remains something of a question, but several considerations seem to have moved him in that direction. For one thing, Johnson had been the most important figure in his party for eight years. If Kennedy won and Johnson remained as majority leader, Johnson's job would be to carry water for the administration. The vice presidency, on the other hand, would free him from his Texas constituency, thus enabling him to establish himself as a national figure, and thereby position him for a subsequent run for the White House. Moreover, if Kennedy lost, Johnson remained in the Senate and a leader of his party. Whatever his reasons for accepting the nomination, Johnson's presence on the ticket played an important role in Kennedy's narrow victory over Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON.

While vice president, Johnson served as chairman of the National Aeronautics and Space Council and of the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity. Nevertheless, Johnson was excluded from the inner circle of the Kennedy administration and exercised little real influence. Most of his responsibilities involved goodwill foreign travel and ceremonial occasions. Accustomed to wielding power, he hated being vice president.

Immediately after Kennedy was assassinated on November 22, 1963, Johnson assumed the presidency with a keen sense of the requirements of the moment and a sure grasp of the legislative process. However, he inherited an administration of strangers, Ivy Leaguers who had adored Kennedy and condescended to Johnson, and now they resented him for sitting in Kennedy's chair. For his part, Johnson both admired and resented the Ivy League "intellectuals" he inherited from Kennedy, and he took great pleasure in humiliating them.

For all the suspicion with which liberals regarded Johnson, he was, on most domestic issues, more liberal than Kennedy. In his first State of the Union message, delivered just two months after the assassination, he declared an unconditional war on poverty. The theme of the speech was "let us continue," but he expanded Kennedy's modest programs and then proceeded to ram them through Congress. In the spring of 1964, Johnson gave a speech at the University of Michigan in which he called for a legislative program that would lead to a "Great Society." His first great achievement was passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. That was followed by the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964.

In November 1964, with Humphrey as his running mate, Johnson overwhelmed his conservative Republican adversary, Sen. BARRY M. GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), with 61 percent of the popular vote. Taking the election as a mandate, Johnson demonstrated his mastery of the process by pushing through Congress a legislative agenda unequaled except by Franklin Roosevelt. In 1965 alone, Congress passed the Appalachian Regional Development Act, the Housing and Urban Development Act, Medicare, federal aid to elementary and secondary schools, the Higher Education Act, and the Voting Rights Act. After that, he added legislation to increase benefits and enlarge coverage of Social Security, to expand federal activity in the field of public health, and to create a department of transportation. The Great Society also included the Land and Water Conservation Act (1964), the National Wilderness Preservation Act (1964), the Truth in Packaging Act (1966), and the Truth in Lending Act (1968).

In spite of his achievements enacting his domestic policy, Great Society legislation did not always accomplish its purpose. Some on both the left and right questioned the approach of relying on centralized federal programs to address social problems. The Vietnam War, however, proved to be Johnson's political downfall. After the Rolling Thunder bombing in 1965, the American presence steadily escalated until well over half a million American troops were in Vietnam. As progress proved difficult and casualties mounted, the war became increasingly unpopular. Sen. EUGENE McCARTHY (D-Minn.), running against the war, came close to defeating Johnson in the New Hampshire primary in 1968. In a national television broadcast on March 31, 1968, Johnson announced that he would not seek reelection.

Johnson retired from public life in January 1969 and set about writing his memoirs and supervising the establishment of the Johnson Library at the University of Texas in Austin. He died of a heart attack in Stonewall, Tex., on January 22, 1973.

Jones, Howard P(alfrey)

(1899–1973) ambassador to Indonesia

Born in Chicago on January 2, 1899, Jones attended the University of Wisconsin for three years, after which he transferred to Columbia University, where he received an Litt.B. in 1921. He then began a career in journalism with the New York branch of the United Press. At the age of 24, Jones became the managing editor of the Evansville (Ind.) Press. A few years later, he was editor-in-chief of a chain of nine newspapers in Michigan. He did graduate work in public affairs at the University of Michigan from 1925 to 1927 and at Columbia from 1929 to 1930.

From 1933 to 1939, Jones served as executive director of the National Municipal League and editor of its publication. In 1938, after an unsuccessful bid for a seat in the New York State Assembly, he was appointed to the state's civil service commission. Jones served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1947. He served on the staff of the Supreme Headquarters, Allied Expeditionary Forces, and rose to the rank of colonel. After the war, he played an important role in the reconstruction of Germany's financial institutions. He joined the Foreign Service in 1948. From 1949 to 1951, he was deputy director and then director of the Berlin office of the U.S. High Commissioner for Germany. In 1952, he was assigned to the Far East as counselor of embassy in Taipei, Taiwan (Formosa). Two years later, Jones became director of the U.S. operations mission to the Republic of Indonesia. As deputy assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern economic affairs from 1955 to 1958, he urged more technical assistance and private investment in Southeast Asia to prevent communist expansion.

Jones was named ambassador to Indonesia in January 1958, replacing JOHN M. ALLISON, who had been removed because he disagreed with the administration's policy toward President Achmed Sukarno. Under Sukarno, the Indonesian government seized a number of Dutch companies, embraced "nonalignment," and accepted increasing amounts of aid from the Soviet Union. Although U.S. policy towards Indonesia remained officially neutral, officials in the State Department had criticized Sukarno's policy of "guided democracy" and his increasing ties to the Soviet Union. In addition, the United States funneled covert aid to a rebel group attempting to overthrow Sukarno.

Shortly after arriving in Indonesia, Jones issued a statement that the United States had no intention of interfering in Indonesia's internal affairs. When an American pilot was shot down and captured after flying a mission for the rebels, Jones issued an official expression of regret "that a private American citizen has been involved as a paid soldier of fortune serving with the rebel forces." Soon after this, the administration cut off support for the rebels.

Jones recommended reaching an accommodation with Sukarno. After the Indonesian government defeated the rebels, Sukarno ended anti-American demonstrations. The United States reciprocated by initiating military and economic aid to Indonesia to counter the aid given by the Soviet Union.

Jones continued as ambassador to Indonesia after the Kennedy administration took office in 1961. At that time, tension was mounting between Indonesia and the Netherlands over the disputed territory of West Irian (the western half of the island of New Guinea). By late 1961, Sukarno threatened to use force to exert his country's control over the area. Jones played a central role in avoiding a war and persuading the Dutch and Indonesians to negotiate. In 1962, the two nations agreed to a resolution of the conflict; after a period of administration by the United Nations, Indonesia would assume control of the territory. Jones also took part in negotiations resulting in an agreement in 1963 between the Indonesian government and foreign oil companies that led to the nationalization of the oil industry with compensation to the foreign companies.

During the mid-1960s, relations between the United States and Indonesia became increasingly strained. Sukarno turned to his country's communist party for support. Jones believed that Sukarno was more a nationalist, but President LYNDON JOHNSON regarded Sukarno, who had established closer ties with Communist China and sent agents to destabilize Malaysia, as a communist threat. After Sukarno withdrew his country from the United Nations in 1965, Jones resigned in despair.

He accepted the chancellorship of the East-West Center, a cooperative organization with the University of Hawaii for the furtherance of understanding between the United States and the Far East. In 1971, Jones published Indonesia: The Possible Dream, in which he recounted his diplomatic career. He died in Stanford, Calif., on September 18, 1973.

Judd, Walter H(enry)

(1898–1994) U.S. congressman

Born in Rising City, Neb., on September 25, 1898, Judd attended public schools and enrolled at the University of Nebraska. His college career was interrupted when he enlisted in the U.S. Army in 1918 as a private. Discharged in 1919 as a second lieutenant, he returned to school and earned his B.A. (1920) and M.D. (1923) degrees from the University of Nebraska. He was an instructor of zoology at the University of Omaha from 1920 to 1924. In 1925, he went to China as a medical missionary and worked there from 1925 to 1931. He did a fellowship in surgery at the Mayo Foundation from 1932 to 1934, after which he returned to his missionary work in China from 1934 to 1938. Judd returned to the U.S. after the Japanese takeover of his hospital in 1938. For the next two years, he toured the Midwest warning of Japanese aggression and calling for U.S. support of China. Discouraged by the widespread isolationist mood in this period, however, he settled down to a medical practice in Minneapolis in 1941. After Pearl Harbor, Judd's views became popular, and in 1942 he won a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives, defeating Oscar Youngdahl, the isolationist incumbent, in the Republican primary and two opponents in the general election.

During the postwar period, Judd emerged as an influential member of the House on foreign policy. Unlike many midwestern Republicans, he supported economic relief and development programs to help stabilize European countries after the war. He also emerged as a leader of the China bloc in Congress. An outspoken critic of the Truman administration's hands-off policy in the Chinese civil war, he continually pressed for support for Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi). Judd blamed the State Department for Chiang's defeat in 1949; after 1950 he began to suggest that the loss was due to communist influence in the government.

Judd became a leading voice for the "China Lobby," a powerful pressure group composed of officials from the Nationalist embassy in Washington, paid propaganda agents, and a large number of American anticommunist business people, journalists, union leaders, and policy groups, who zealously promoted Chiang's cause in the United States. He also served as an adviser to the lobby's two main policy groups, the American China Policy Association and the China Emergency Committee, both of which worked closely with the congressional China bloc in the closing years of the Truman administration.

During the Eisenhower administration, the congressman continued to press for a hard-line policy on Communist China. In the summer of 1953, Judd, who chaired the Foreign Relations Committee's Subcommittee on Far Eastern Affairs, introduced a resolution opposing the admission of Communist China to the United Nations (UN). The congressman believed that it would be “plain hypocrisy” to admit a regime “which brazenly went to war with the UN itself.” More important, he argued, admission would have increased the prestige of the enemies of the United States and the UN. The House unanimously adopted the resolution in July.

In the fall of 1953, Judd and other leaders of the China Lobby formed the Committee for One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the UN. With the blessings of Eisenhower and the backing of the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, and the General Federation of Women’s Clubs, the committee collected the million signatures in just nine months.

Judd reacted vigorously to the Communist Chinese capture of two American flyers in 1954 and the resumption of hostilities between Nationalists and Communists in 1955. He objected to Eisenhower’s call for a cease-fire between the two belligerents. In his opinion, such a move would have neutralized the Nationalist Chinese instead of permitting them to remain a threat to the mainland’s flank and prevent communist expansion into Southeast Asia. He also urged Eisenhower not to permit relatives to visit the downed flyers and thus draw attention away from the conflict.

Shortly thereafter Judd helped reconstitute the Committee for One Million as the Committee of One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the UN. The organization then launched a broad campaign to rally public opinion against not only admission of China to the UN but also diplomatic recognition or trade relations with the Communist Chinese. In 1957, the committee organized a nationwide postcard mailing that helped kill proposed Senate hearings on trade with mainland China. In 1959, it issued a rebuttal to the Colon Report, a widely publicized private study urging closer U.S.-China relations.

Judd delivered the keynote address at the Republican National Convention in 1960. During the campaign, the committee of One Million supported the congressman as a possible secretary of state, but the effort died with JOHN F. KENNEDY’s election.

During the Kennedy administration, Judd supported the president on several important foreign policy measures, including the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, but he opposed such programs as Medicare. Although he described himself as a “progressive conservative,” Judd became associated with the Far Right during the early-1960s. He participated in the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade but was critical of the John Birch Society. In 1962, Judd narrowly lost his bid for an 11th term. Upon leaving Congress, he became a contributing editor to Reader’s Digest in 1963, a position he held until his retirement in 1976. He continued to speak frequently on issues he engaged as a member of Congress and was a daily radio commentator on international relations for “Washington Report,” sponsored by the American Security Council, from 1964 to 1969. Perhaps above all, Judd continued to oppose recognition of Communist China, even after President RICHARD M. NIXON initiated closer ties with the mainland in the early 1970s. In 1971, he bitterly assailed the decision by the United Nations General Assembly to admit mainland China as a member and to expel Taiwan. He held his peace, however, when Nixon visited China in February 1972. Judd resided in Mitchellville, Md., until his death there on February 13, 1994.

K

Keating, Kenneth B(arnard)

(1900–1975) U.S. congressman and senator

Born in Lima, N.Y., on May 18, 1900, Keating graduated from Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in 1915 and from the University of Rochester in 1919. Keating taught Latin in a high school for a year and then entered Harvard Law School. After earning his LL.B. from that institution in 1923 and gaining admission to the bar the same year, he established a successful law practice in Rochester. He had served as a sergeant in the U.S. Army during World War I and was commissioned a major in the army in 1942. From 1943 to 1946, he served in the China-Burma-India theater of operations and was promoted to full colonel in 1944. Keating returned to Rochester and won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946 as a moderate Republican. He won reelection to the House five times before winning a seat in the Senate.

In the House, Keating established a record as a strong anticommunist and a supporter of many social welfare proposals and civil rights measures. He sponsored a bill in 1956 to limit judicial appeals by aliens sentenced to deportation. Two years later, he introduced a bill that would have given the president authority to deny passports to communists and others deemed dangerous to national security. In 1955, he introduced bills that would have granted 18-year-olds the right to vote and given the president the line-item veto (the power to veto specific items in appropriations bills). Keating also led efforts in the House to reform the immigration quota system. In 1956, he cosponsored a successful bill that limited bank mergers.

A consistent and strong supporter of civil rights, Keating defended the Supreme Court's ruling in the school desegregation cases at a time when many of his colleagues declined to take a stand. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, Keating played an important role in gaining passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which established the Civil Rights Commission, created a Civil Rights Division in the Justice Department, and granted the government authority to seek injunctions against deprivation of voting rights.

An ardent supporter of the state of Israel, Keating opposed the Eisenhower administration's decision not to sell arms to Israel in 1956. He headed a committee of five that represented 50 Republican members of Congress who united in an unsuccessful attempt to exert pressure on the administration to reverse its decision.

Keating ran for a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1958 and defeated FRANK HOGAN, the district attorney of Manhattan. Before actually taking his seat, he joined an unsuccessful attempt by liberal Republicans in the Senate to unseat the party's conservative leaders, STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.) and EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.). In the Senate, Keating continued his strong support of civil rights. He played an important role in mustering support from moderate and conservative Republicans for the Voting Rights Act of 1960. During the course of that legislation, he unsuccessfully attempted to strengthen the bill by adding an amendment that would have provided technical assistance to areas desegregating their schools. In addition, he sponsored legislation attempting to deal with segregationist violence in the South.

In other matters, he introduced and fought for the bill that became the Twenty-third Amendment to the Constitution, which granted voters in the District of Columbia the right to vote in presidential elections and gave the capital as many votes in the electoral college as a state with the same population. Keating also supported legislation that attempted to control organized crime. He joined four other Republican senators voting with the Democratic majority in an unsuccessful attempt to override Eisenhower's veto of a bill to provide aid to depressed areas.

Keating and seven other Republican senators proposed a voluntary federal-state health insurance program for all Americans over the age of 65. Under the plan, the states would have contracted with private firms for the coverage and subscribers would have made payments based on income; federal and state governments would have shared the remaining costs. This proposal went further than the administration's plan, which limited aid to single elderly persons with adjusted gross incomes of up to $2,500 a year and married couples with incomes of up to $3,800. The plan finally adopted in August contained most of the features of Keating's proposal but required a means test and permitted each state to determine the type and extent of medical coverage provided.

Keating gained national attention in 1962, when he warned that the Soviet Union was building intercontinental ballistic missiles in Cuba. From the end of August through early October, he gave, by his own count, over 25 speeches on the subject, in which he criticized the Kennedy administration for failing to take action. President JOHN F. KENNEDY rejected the charge and demanded that Keating reveal his sources. After the U-2 overflights confirmed the presence of Soviet missiles and Kennedy announced the "quarantine" of Cuba, Keating supported the president's action.

Keating lost his bid for reelection in 1964 to ROBERT F. KENNEDY. His campaign suffered from the poor showing by the party's presidential nominee, BARRY GOLDWATER, in New York and, on the other hand, from Keating's refusal to support his own party's nominee. After his defeat, Keating joined a leading New York law firm, Royall, Keogel & Rogers. He won election as associate judge of the New York State Court of Appeals in 1965 and served there until President RICHARD M. NIXON appointed him ambassador to India in 1969. Keating held that post until 1972, when he resigned to return to the United States and campaign for Nixon's reelection. Nixon appointed him ambassador to Israel in August 1973, and he served in that position until his death in New York City on May 5, 1975.

Kefauver, C(arey) Estes

(1903–1963) U.S. senator; chairman, Judiciary

Committee, Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly

The scion of a socially prominent Tennessee family, Estes Kefauver was born in Madisonville, Tenn., on July 26, 1903. He attended the University of Tennessee, where he excelled in athletics, edited the campus newspaper, served as president of the student body, and graduated in 1924. After earning a law degree from Yale University in 1927, he returned to Tennessee and, for the next 12 years, practiced law in Chattanooga. He served as president of the Chattanooga Jaycees and helped organize the Volunteers, a political reform group. Kefauver ran unsuccessfully for the state senate in 1938. The following year, Gov. Prentice Cooper appointed him commissioner of finance and taxation. In a special election for a vacant House seat in the summer of 1939, he won the Democratic primary with organizational backing and defeated his isolationist Republican opponent in the general election.

In his nine-year career in the House, Kefauver established a generally liberal, pro-labor voting record unusual for a southern member of Congress. He stood out as a strong proponent of public power and a defender of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), an advocate of internal congressional reform, and a critic of monopoly power. Most strikingly, however, Kefauver defected from the southern consensus on civil rights for African Americans. In 1942, he spoke on the floor in support of a bill that would have abolished the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting. This prompted the outspoken white supremacist,

John Rankin (D-Miss.), to rise on the floor of the House, point a finger at his colleague from Tennessee, and say, "Shame on you, Estes Kefauver."

Kefauver ran for the U.S. Senate in 1948. A poor speaker, he stumbled over words and spoke in sentences punctuated with awkward pauses. He also had a penchant for verbal gaffes. In addition, he had to face two candidates in the Democratic primary, one of whom, Tom Stewart, was the incumbent and the other had the support of the powerful statewide political machine headed by Edward Hull Crump, the mayor of Memphis. Kefauver's campaign emphasized personal contact with voters, and, with the two more conservative candidates vying for the same votes, he managed to win the primary. Kefauver went on to defeat his Republican opponent, B. Carroll Reece, in the general election.

In the Senate, Kefauver's generally liberal voting record and his moderation on civil rights marked him as a maverick among southern senators. As he had in the House, Kefauver consistently backed the Truman administration's foreign policy. The most significant legislative accomplishment of his early career was the Kefauver-Celler Act of 1950, which attempted to close a loophole in the Clayton Anti-Trust Act of 1914 by prohibiting one firm from acquiring the assets of another "if the effect would be substantially to lessen competition or to create monopoly."

Kefauver catapulted to national attention in 1950–51 with his sensational investigation of organized crime. The Kefauver committee conducted hearings in cities around the country and received extensive press coverage. The hearings established the pervasive influence of organized crime and its links to Democratic political machines. The climax of the investigation came with the hearings in New York, where a parade of gangsters, who very much looked and talked the part, testified before the committee. The dramatic hearings were carried live on national television and made Kefauver a national figure.

The hearings on organized crime thrust Kefauver to the forefront of Democratic politics but at the same time earned him the enmity of the leadership of his own party, because the hearings had sullied the reputations of many Democratic mayors. Capitalizing on his new national prominence and the widespread dissatisfaction with the Truman administration, Kefauver sought the Democratic nomination in 1952. Few gave him any chance of defeating President Truman, but Kefauver won a stunning upset in the New Hampshire primary, defeating the sitting president by 3,873 votes. Two weeks later, Truman announced that he would not run for reelection. Kefauver's campaign focused on bringing the candidate into personal contact with as many voters as possible. He traveled from town to town, shaking hands with countless people. Although he refrained from directly attacking the Truman administration, his strongest talking point was his ability to clean up corruption in government. Kefauver won most of the subsequent primaries, losing only in Florida to Sen. RICHARD RUSSELL of Georgia and in the District of Columbia to AVERELL HARRIMAN, and went into the convention in July with a majority of the popular votes cast in the primaries and a plurality of delegates.

At the convention in Chicago, Kefauver encountered strong opposition from the party's leadership. His investigation of organized crime, which had caused problems for some Democratic machines, alienated party professionals and urban bosses. Largely because of Kefauver's position on civil rights, all southern delegations except Tennessee's opposed his candidacy. Moreover, Truman remained hostile to him. Truman and other party leaders threw their support to the governor of Illinois, ADLAI STEVENSON. Kefauver led on the first two ballots, but Stevenson won on the third. The circumstances of his defeat convinced Kefauver and many of his followers that the will of the people had been thwarted and that the party bosses had stolen the nomination from him.

Kefauver frequently opposed the new Eisenhower administration. In April 1953, for example, he participated in an unsuccessful filibuster by liberals to block a bill, backed by the administration, to return offshore oil deposits to the states. Nevertheless, he supported the administration's efforts to defeat the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president's power to enter into treaties.

An outspoken critic of Sen. JOSEPH MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), Kefauver also resisted Democratic efforts to outdo the anticommunism of the Republican right. A group of liberal Democrats sponsored a bill that became the Communist Control Act of 1954, which included provisions outlawing the Communist Party and providing for detention of subversives in time of emergency. It passed the Senate by a vote of 81-1, with Kefauver casting the lone dissenting vote. Speaking against the bill, he argued that "a grievous wrong inflicted on us by the Republicans does not justify our inflicting an even greater wrong upon the protections given our people by the Bill of Rights."

Many believed that Kefauver's independent positions, particularly on civil rights, jeopardized his chances for reelection in 1954. His conservative challenger in the Democratic primary, Rep. Pat Sutton (D-Tenn.), called him a "coddler" of communists, a "left winger," and an integrationist. Sutton also attacked Kefauver's support for foreign aid and his opposition to the House Un-American Activities Committee. Although political observers predicted a close race, Kefauver overwhelmed Sutton in the primary and went on to defeat his Republican opponent easily in the general election.

After winning reelection, Kefauver became one of the leaders of the Democratic attack on the controversial Dixon-Yates contract. When the TVA proposed building a new steam plant at Fulton, Tenn., to supply power to the city of Memphis because the consumption of TVA power by the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) installations at Paducah would leave Memphis facing a shortage of electricity within four years, Eisenhower, who preferred private development of power, could not see the justification for the federal government to pay for a plant to supply power to a particular city. He ordered JOSEPH DODGE, director of the Bureau of the Budget, and LEWIS L. STRAUSS, chairman of the AEC, to explore the possibility of having private industry build the plant. EDGAR H. DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company, organized the Mississippi Valley Generating Company to build a plant that would supply power to the TVA to replace the power the TVA sold the AEC. The Dixon-Yates proposal was considered acceptable by the AEC, TVA, and the Bureau of the Budget, and, upon the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, Eisenhower approved it.

Democratic senators lost no time denouncing the agreement as an attempt to undermine the TVA. Kefauver repeatedly spoke against what he characterized as the secrecy and conflict of interest surrounding the plan's inception, the alleged windfall for its private beneficiaries, and the harm he believed the plan would do to public power. He headed a special panel of the Judiciary Committee's Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee chosen to investigate the affair. During those hearings, Kefauver played a key role in the questioning of the director of the Bureau of the Budget that brought to light an apparent conflict of interest. A consultant to the Bureau of the Budget had simultaneously advised the Dixon-Yates company. Later that month, after the city of Memphis decided to build its own plant, Eisenhower cancelled the Dixon-Yates contract.

Kefauver made a second run for the presidency in 1956. As in 1952, political pundits gave him little chance. Most assumed that Stevenson would again be the Democratic nominee. Nevertheless, Kefauver won again in New Hampshire and then pulled a major upset over Stevenson in Minnesota. With the support of the Democratic establishment, Stevenson edged past Kefauver in the Florida primary. When Stevenson defeated him in California, effectively ending Kefauver's hopes, the Tennessean withdrew from the race and endorsed Stevenson.

At the Democratic convention in August, Stevenson unexpectedly threw the choice of a vice presidential running mate to the convention at large. Kefauver's supporters organized hastily on his behalf, and he won a dramatic victory over Sen. JOHN KENNEDY (D-Mass.). During the race that fall, Kefauver campaigned vigorously in the regions of his greatest popularity: the Middle West and the West. In his characteristic populist rhetoric, he attacked the Eisenhower administration for being dominated by special interests and "readers of the Wall Street Journal." He repeatedly denounced the farm policies of Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON, whose department, he believed, injured the family farmer to favor "the food processors and meat packers and grain traders and big bankers and miscellaneous other millionaires." However, the Stevenson-Kefauver ticket could not overcome the great popularity of President Eisenhower and the widespread satisfaction with the conditions of peace and prosperity. The president won reelection in a landslide victory.

His defeat in 1956 effectively ended Kefauver's presidential ambitions. Thereafter, he devoted himself to his Senate duties and made his mark as Congress's most dedicated foe of monopoly in a generation. In the six years following his ascendancy to the chairmanship of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee in 1957, he conducted a series of well-publicized investigations into economic concentration. Kefauver focused on the problem of "administered prices," that is, prices of major products set artificially high, insensitive to market fluctuations. The subcommittee's hearings concerning administered prices in the steel, automobile, bread, drug, and electrical equipment industries, among others, filled 26 volumes and kept the issue before the public for six years. Kefauver frequently criticized the role of administered prices in inflation. He warned that growing corporate concentration hurt consumers and small businessmen and that the loss of economic freedom on their part ultimately could lead to the loss of political freedom.

Kefauver's voting record on civil rights questions was generally moderate. He supported attempts by liberals to modify the Senate's filibuster rule. In 1956, he was one of only three southern senators who refused to sign the "Southern Manifesto" denouncing the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools. He voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Yet in the legislative struggle over the measure, Kefauver helped win Senate passage of the controversial jury trial amendment, mandating that individuals accused of violating a federal court injunction not to interfere with the voting rights of African Americans would be given a trial by jury. Opponents of the amendment charged that it intended to weaken federal protection of black voting rights, but Kefauver maintained that "any miscarriage of justice will not be remedied by eliminating the right to trial by jury." The final version of the bill permitted judges to try minor violations of the law but assured defendants another trial, by jury, if severe penalties were imposed. In spite of his positions on civil rights, which put him at odds with his southern colleagues in the Senate and with many of his constituents, Kefauver later admitted that he found it difficult to adjust to the idea of integration. Moreover, his record on civil rights grew more conservative as he approached his bid for reelection in 1960. In 1959 he criticized the Civil Rights Commission's recommendations for specific legislation to ensure equal rights in voting, education, and housing. The following year, he voted with the southern bloc on a variety of amendments to weaken the Civil Rights Act of 1960, but he backed the final bill.

As in 1954, Kefauver entered his battle for reelection amid pessimistic speculation and again surprised observers with an overwhelming victory in the Democratic primary. His most significant achievement during the Kennedy administration was the passage of the Kefauver-Harris Drug Control Act (1962), which greatly strengthened federal regulations to ensure that drugs be proven safe and effective before being marketed. Due in large part to opposition from the Kennedy administration, however, the final version of the measure did not include provisions against excessive pricing of prescription drugs, which Kefauver had placed in the original bill. Another milestone was the passage of the Twenty-fourth Amendment outlawing the poll tax. A career-long opponent of the poll tax, Kefauver initiated the measure and guided it through the Senate. The requisite number of states ratified the amendment after his death. Kefauver collapsed on the floor of the Senate and died in Bethesda, Md., of an aortic aneurysm on August 10, 1963.

Kennan, George F(rost)

(1904–2005) foreign policy critic

The descendant of a pre-Revolutionary Scotch-Irish family, Kennan was born in Milwaukee on February 16, 1904. He attended Saint John's Military Academy, graduated from Princeton University in 1925, and entered the Foreign Service the following year. From 1927 to 1931, he served in Central and Eastern Europe. Kennan was a member of the first American embassy to the USSR in 1933 and served there as third secretary until 1936. The young diplomat was then stationed in Prague and Berlin, where he remained until World War II began. From December 1941 to May 1942, he was interned by the Nazis. During the early years of the war, Kennan served at the American embassy in Portugal and in 1943 joined the European Advisory Commission in London, where he worked on plans for postwar Germany.

In 1944, Kennan was again posted to the USSR. While serving in Moscow, he sent Washington dispatches predicting that the Russians would seek military, economic, and ideological expansion in Western Europe and urged the United States to develop a firm policy to counteract it. As relations with the Soviets deteriorated, Kennan sent his famous "Long Telegram" to Washington. It explained to American policy makers, baffled by the course of Soviet policy, the origins of that policy, and it proposed a course of action. According to Kennan, Soviet foreign policy derived from internal factors, such as the "traditional and instinctive Russian sense of insecurity" and Marxist dogma, which provided the "justification for their instinctive fear of [the] outside world, for the dictatorship without which they did not know how to rule, . . . for sacrifices they felt bound to demand." Thus, he concluded, Soviet power was "impervious to the logic of reason" but "highly sensitive to the logic of force." As a result of Kennan's work, Secretary of State George C. Marshall appointed him head of the State Department's policy planning staff in 1947. That year he wrote an article for Foreign Affairs magazine, under the name of Mr. X, that expanded the case made in his Long Telegram and served as an outline for the Truman administration's Soviet policy. "Soviet pressure against the free institutions of the Western world," he wrote, could "be contained by the adroit and vigorous application of counterforce." That force, he elaborated, should primarily take the form of diplomatic and economic pressure as well as covert action. In his memoirs, Kennan wrote that he did not mean containment by military means but acknowledged that the language he used in the article "was at best ambiguous and lent itself to misinterpretation." When DEAN ACHESON became secretary of state in 1949, he appointed Kennan counselor of the department. However, the two quickly broke over the implementation of containment, and in 1955, Kennan took a leave of absence to carry on research at the Institute of Advanced Study in Princeton.

Kennan was appointed ambassador to the Soviet Union in the fall of 1951. His stay in Moscow was short; the Soviets declared him persona non grata for his statements criticizing the Russian treatment of Western diplomats. Kennan returned to the United States in October 1952 during the presidential campaign in which the Republican Party condemned containment as "negative, futile, and immoral." Instead, the Republicans, most prominently JOHN FOSTER DULLES, promised to extend the hope of liberation to Eastern Europe. In January 1953, while awaiting reassignment, Kennan delivered a speech in which he warned against any "government action that was designed to interfere with the internal affairs of another country" and spoke out in favor of containment rather than liberation. Kennan's public dissent from the policy of the incoming administration added to Dulles's discomfort at having the author of containment in a Republican administration. The new secretary of state took advantage of a rule requiring the reassignment of chiefs of missions within 90 days to force Kennan's retirement. Kennan then returned to the Institute at Princeton to write Russian history.

During the 1950s, Kennan was one of the foremost critics of the Eisenhower administration. Pointing out that communist expansion was ideological and economic, not military, he opposed reliance on military alliances such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He also objected to Dulles's defining the struggle against the USSR in terms of a moral crusade.

At the end of 1957, Kennan delivered a series of lectures over the British Broadcasting Corp. that called for a reassessment of American policy toward the USSR. He suggested that, since Stalin's death in 1953, a liberalizing trend had appeared in Russia that made the Kremlin leaders more inclined to diplomatic negotiation than military conquest. Kennan dismissed the administration's idea of giving Germany nuclear arms to prevent Russian expansion. Instead, he called for a unified, disarmed, and neutral Germany and recommended that the United States use the threat of that possibility to negotiate with the Russians on the neutralization of Central and Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union and the United States could then withdraw or "disengage" their forces from the area.

Kennan's call for disengagement generated a debate among foreign policy officials. Dean Acheson and HENRY KISSINGER were among his most forceful critics. Acheson wrote that Kennan "has never, in my judgment, grasped the realities of power relationships, but takes a rather mystical attitude toward them." Disengagement, the former secretary of state claimed, would be the "new isolationism." Professor Kissinger argued that the Russians should still be considered a military threat to Western Europe and American troops should remain there as a major deterrent. WALTER LIPPMANN, who had advocated disengagement in the late-1940s, praised Kennan's change of position.

In 1959, Kennan questioned the Eisenhower administration's reliance on nuclear weapons of indiscriminate mass destruction for America's defense. He proposed, instead, that the United States and Russia abolish them and that this country rely on conventional forces to defend itself.

During the Kennedy administration, Kennan served as ambassador to Yugoslavia. Long an advocate of policies designed to undermine the unity of the Soviet bloc, Kennan sought to strengthen Yugoslavia's ties to the West. When Congress rejected his appeals and passed legislation restricting trade with Yugoslavia, Kennan resigned his ambassadorship in May 1963. Two months later, he returned to the Institute for Advanced Study, where he continued to analyze and write about foreign policy until the end of his life. Kennan once again entered the public debate over foreign policy in the mid-1960s as a critic of American policy in Vietnam. He maintained that Vietnam was not vital to American strategic or diplomatic interests and that escalation of the war would inhibit the possibility of a negotiated settlement. In addition, he argued that the war would lead to a rapprochement between the Soviet Union and China. When, in 1966, Sen. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.) held nationally televised hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the war, he asked Kennan to testify. For all his opposition to the war in Vietnam, Kennan was scathingly critical of the student left of the 1960s, both for its methods of protest and its failure to present a coherent program.

Kennan was a leading expert on Russian history as well as an analyst of foreign policy. An elegant and prolific writer, Kennan produced 17 books. He won a Pulitzer Prize in 1956 for Russia Leaves the War. Its sequel, The Decision to Intervene (1957), also received a warm reception from critics. American Diplomacy: 1900–1951 (1952), based on a series of lectures he gave at the University of Chicago in 1951, briefly and gracefully presented a realist critique of American foreign policy. The book found a large popular audience, and generations of college students cut their teeth on it. Kennan won a second Pulitzer Prize for Memoirs: 1925–1950, published in 1967; the second volume of his memoirs came out in 1972. Over the next three decades, he continued to produce essays, articles, and books. He published a volume of personal reflections, Around the Cragged Hill, in 1993. He wrote an opinion piece for the New York Times in 1997 criticizing the Clinton administration's support for the expansion of NATO and warning that such a step "would be the most fateful error of American policy in the entire post-cold war era." As the administration of George W. Bush prepared for a war with Iraq in September 2002, Kennan gave an interview in which he criticized that policy. Kennan died at home in Princeton, N.J., on March 17, 2005.

Kennedy, John F(itzgerald) (1917–1963) U.S. senator

The son of Joseph P. Kennedy, a millionaire stock market speculator and investment banker, John Kennedy was born in Brookline, Mass., on May 29, 1917. His maternal grandfather had been mayor of Boston, and his paternal grandfather had served in the Massachusetts State Senate. Kennedy graduated from Choate School and in 1935 began attending Princeton. He switched to Harvard one year later and graduated in 1940 with a degree in political science. While a student, Kennedy spent several summers in England, where his father was ambassador. Out of this experience, he conceived the topic for his senior thesis, "Appeasement in Europe," which warned against Great Britain's policy of appeasement. In 1940, with the assistance of ARTHUR KROCK, he published the work as Why England Slept, and it became a best seller.

President Eisenhower and President-elect John F. Kennedy, December 6, 1960 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

After a brief stint at Stanford business school, Kennedy joined the navy in 1941. In 1943, a Japanese destroyer sunk the PT boat under Kennedy's command. Following the war, he briefly worked as a reporter for International News Services but decided to pursue a political career. In 1946, he won the Democratic primary in Boston's 11th district against the machine candidate. Labeling himself as "fighting conservative," an anticommunist who supported the New Deal, he easily won the general election. He was reelected in 1948 and in 1950.

As a member of the House, Kennedy compiled an undistinguished record. Colleagues regarded him as a playboy and the lightweight son of a wealthy man. Assorted physical ailments, the most serious of which was Addison's disease (an adrenal insufficiency), contributed to his lack of attention to his official duties.

Kennedy usually voted with other Northern liberals in support of Fair Deal legislation. He supported federally funded housing and voted against the Taft-Hartley Act. However, he maintained a more conservative position on foreign policy and the issue of domestic communism. Kennedy created a minor incident in 1949, when he attacked President HARRY S. TRUMAN for what he considered the unnecessary loss of mainland China to the Communists. A year before Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) gave his famous speech in Wheeling, W.Va., Kennedy denounced the advice given by "the Lattimores and the Fairbanks." Owen Lattimore of Johns Hopkins, an expert on the Far East, and John King Fairbanks of Harvard, a leading authority on China, would become two of McCarthy's favorite targets. "What our young men have saved," Kennedy charged, "our diplomats and president have frittered away." In the same speech, he attacked the Yalta Accords and George Marshall. In 1950, he contributed to Rep. RICHARD M. NIXON's (R-Calif.) reelection campaign against Helen Gahagan Douglas. That November, he made a speech in which he praised McCarthy and supported the McCarran Internal Security Act.

In 1952, Kennedy ran for the U.S. Senate seat held by HENRY CABOT LODGE. Very little distinguished the two men on the issues, and the race became a conflict of personalities and campaign styles. Kennedy's campaign exhibited many of the characteristics of his later races. A staff of loyal workers headed by the candidate's family ran a well-financed and carefully planned effort. The Kennedy women gave teas attended by hundreds of women eager to meet the candidate. The candidate's father was able to enlist the support of several Taft Republicans who bitterly resented Lodge's role in persuading DWIGHT EISENHOWER to oppose Sen. ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) for the Republican nomination. T. Walter Taylor, a banker from Boston, and Basil Brewer, the publisher of the New Bedford Standard-Times, threw their support to Kennedy in an effort to defeat Lodge. Joe Fox, publisher of the isolationist Boston Post, also endorsed Kennedy, in his case after receiving a loan of $500,000 from Joseph Kennedy.

John Kennedy nonetheless had problems. Jewish voters distrusted him because of his own views on Israel and his father's opinions about Nazi Germany and reputed anti-Semitism. JOHN MCCORMACK (D-Mass.), the majority leader in the House and a popular figure with Jewish voters in the state, helped with that. Kennedy's relationship with Joe McCarthy proved more tricky. McCarthy had both supporters and detractors among voters likely to support Kennedy. The candidate, aided by family money, managed to walk a tightrope on the issue. Joseph Kennedy had contributed money to McCarthy, who offered to campaign for Lodge on the condition that he would not attack Kennedy. Lodge, who detested McCarthy, declined the offer. When some of Kennedy's aides urged him to sign an anti-McCarthy manifesto during the campaign, his father objected and furiously charged that the aides were "trying to ruin Jack." Kennedy did not sign the document. In November, Kennedy defeated Lodge by 70,000 votes.

By the time he entered the Senate, Kennedy's health had improved. Cortisone controlled the Addison's disease, and two surgeries improved the condition of his back. In his early years as a senator, he focused primarily on the needs of his section, then in the midst of economic depression. Kennedy introduced several bills to aid Massachusetts's fishing, textile, building, and watch industries through tariff protection and increased federal aid. He also supported higher minimum-wage laws to force southern textile industries to maintain comparable labor costs with their competitors in New England. Despite his support for his section, he backed construction of the Saint Lawrence Seaway, which many in New England opposed because they feared it would reduce the role of the port of Boston. The only senator from New England to vote for the measure, he justified his stand by insisting that Canada was prepared to go on with the project alone. He also maintained that national economic and security interests should take precedence over sectionalism.

By 1954, Kennedy had become disillusioned with McCarthy's investigations, although he muted his criticism. In fact, Kennedy tried to find the middle of the road on issues relating to McCarthy and anticommunism. A member of the Senate Government Operations Committee, chaired by McCarthy, he voted against the witness immunity bill in August 1954 that would have given the Justice Department authority to grant immunity to witnesses testifying before Congress and in court. Critics of the measure claimed that it would have the effect of compelling witnesses to testify or go to jail. On the other hand, Kennedy was a cosponsor of the Communist Control Act of 1954. He was in the hospital for back surgery when the vote to condemn McCarthy came to the floor. Kennedy's aide, Theodore Sorensen, had prepared a speech for Kennedy in which the senator supported censure but only because McCarthy had supported ROY COHN in his confrontation with the army. The speech carefully asserted Kennedy's past support for McCarthy and declined to support censure based on past misconduct. When the Senate voted to condemn McCarthy, Kennedy did not go on record through the parliamentary device of "pairing," when two members on opposite sides of an issue agree not to vote on the matter. He was the only Democrat not to vote for condemnation or to pair with the majority.

In April 1954, while the besieged French garrison at Dien Bien Phu desperately tried to hold off the Viet Minh, Kennedy gave a speech in the Senate criticizing French colonialism and calling on the French to grant independence to the Associated States. He argued strongly against giving American military aid to the French. At the same time, he attacked the "New Look" defense policy for failing to provide the means to act in such situations.

Kennedy was absent from the Senate from November 1954 until May 1955 while recuperating from several spinal operations. During that period, he worked on a book, Profiles In Courage. Written largely by his staff, in particular Sorensen, the book presented seven studies of politicians who demonstrated fidelity to political principle in difficult circumstances. Published in early 1956, the book won a Pulitzer Prize and was a best seller.

In 1956, Kennedy waged a vigorous battle against John McCormack for the leadership of the Democratic Party in Massachusetts. Hoping to control the state delegation to the Democratic National Convention and thus influence the convention's choice for president, McCormack won the state's nonbinding presidential primary in 1956. Kennedy, on the other hand, supported the nomination of ADLAI STEVENSON. The Massachusetts state chairman, William H. Burke, Jr., a McCormack supporter, made a speech hinting that Stevenson backers were communists, to which Kennedy responded by campaigning against Burke's reelection. Kennedy's candidate, John M. Lynch, won the office by a large margin, solidifying Kennedy's leadership of the state party.

Kennedy nominated Stevenson for president at the Democratic National Convention in 1956. When Stevenson threw the vice presidential nomination open to the convention, Kennedy and a few aides organized a spirited campaign for the second place on the ticket. He lost to Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) on the third ballot.

Over the next three years, Kennedy laid the groundwork for a presidential campaign in 1960. He made some 1,000 speeches in all parts of the nation, demonstrated his popularity by winning reelection to the Senate by almost a million votes in 1958, and carefully built a legislative record that would appeal to liberals and moderates in the Democratic Party.

Kennedy adopted a carefully crafted moderate position on civil rights. He voted for the final version of the Eisenhower administration's civil rights bill in 1957 and against eliminating the bill's most far-reaching provision, Title III, which authorized the attorney general to seek injunctions for a variety of violations of civil rights. Ultimately, southerners managed to remove Title III from the final bill. On the other hand, Kennedy voted for a successful amendment, backed by southern senators, that gave violators of injunctions enforcing voting rights the right to a jury trial.

Similarly, Kennedy sought to establish a balanced record on labor issues. While not wanting to appear too close to organized labor, he had no intention of alienating that base of support so important to any Democrat's presidential aspirations. The AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education announced that he had voted "right" on 15 out of 16 important labor issues during the period. From 1957 to 1959, however, he played an active role in the McClellan committee's investigations of improper activities in labor unions, which earned him the opposition of a number of labor leaders. In 1959, Kennedy cosponsored a bill designed to correct some of the most blatant abuses uncovered by the McClellan committee. It also intended to head off calls for more stringent regulation of unions. Kennedy's measure called for unions to make full disclosure of their financial records and to file annual financial reports with the secretary of labor. The bill provided criminal penalties for bribery, extortion, and misappropriation of union funds. To pacify organized labor, it also modified certain provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act. Over Kennedy's opposition, the Senate added a requirement that union officers file an affidavit declaring that they were not communists. The Kennedy-Ives bill passed the Senate, but the House passed the Landrum-Griffin bill, which defined as an unfair labor practice a labor-management contract under which the employer agreed not to do business with another firm, prohibited secondary boycotts, restricted picketing, and expanded federal regulation of internal union affairs. The conference committee essentially adopted the Landrum-Griffin version, which won approval in both houses.

Kennedy took an increasing interest in foreign affairs. In 1957, he edged out Kefauver to win a coveted seat on the Foreign Relations Committee. He was particularly prominent in urging a reorientation of U.S. policies toward underdeveloped nations. Keenly aware of the force of anticolonialism in emerging nations, he published in 1957 an article in Foreign Affairs arguing that American leaders underrated the strength of nationalism in Asia and Africa and that the administration lacked a definable Middle Eastern policy.

Kennedy caused a controversy in July 1957, when he brought the Algerian question to the Senate floor and urged that the civil war there be ended with Algerian independence. He offered a resolution proposing that the United States negotiate the conflict. Members of both parties as well as representatives of the Eisenhower administration, which at the time was attempting to bring France within a Western European Union, criticized the speech for antagonizing France.

Kennedy was a cold warrior who saw communist expansion as a major threat to the United States. In 1957, he supported the Eisenhower Doctrine, which gave the president authority to use U.S. troops to protect Middle Eastern nations threatened by communist takeover. In August 1957, he introduced legislation providing funds for "educational materials" to inform the public of the nature of the communist threat. He urged Americans to support increased military expenditures for defense against the Soviet Union. Beginning in 1958, he alleged that a "missile gap" existed between the United States and the USSR and predicted it would grow more serious in the 1960s. He claimed that Sputnik and other technological advances gave the USSR the advantage in the world balance of power and warned of a Russian attack that would destroy the world. Kennedy questioned the value of trying to appease the Soviet Union and urged a strong military to prevent a "second Munich."

Kennedy began running for the Democratic nomination in 1960 almost as soon as the election of 1956 was over. He formally announced his candidacy in January 1960. The beneficiary of yet another well organized and lavishly funded campaign, Kennedy defeated Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), the leader of the party's liberal wing, in the West Virginia and Wisconsin primaries, proving that a Roman Catholic could win in heavily Protestant states. He then brushed aside a challenge from Sen. Lyndon Johnson (D-Tex.) at the convention. Kennedy captured the nomination on the first ballot and selected Johnson as his running mate. In the general election, he faced Vice President Richard M. Nixon. Kennedy made his attack on the Eisenhower administration's defense policies a focal point of his campaign. He called for larger defense budgets, an increase in conventional forces, and spending to close the "missile gap." During the campaign, Kennedy and Nixon engaged in the first televised debates between presidential candidates. In the end, Kennedy defeated Nixon in one of the closest popular votes in American history; he had a more comfortable margin of victory in the electoral college.

As president, Kennedy left a meager record in domestic affairs. The slimness of his margin in the popular vote and his own lack of legislative skill limited Kennedy's success in gaining passage of legislation relating to domestic matters. He made proposals for increased federal aid to education, medical care for the elderly, and urban renewal, most of which never got through Congress while he was president. The few measures Congress enacted during his term were not terribly significant. He did achieve legislation to increase the minimum wage, tax cuts, and the Trade Act of 1962.

On one of the most momentous domestic issues confronting his administration, civil rights, Kennedy took a cautious approach, not least because of the narrow margin of his electoral victory and the importance of the South in his coalition. He held off issuing an executive order banning discrimination in housing built with federal funds, which he had promised during the campaign, until after the congressional elections in 1962. Even then, the order was something less than he had promised. Kennedy resisted pressure from Freedom Riders and other activists to use the power of the federal government to end racial segregation and protect black voting rights. He acted reluctantly when Gov. Ross Barnett defied a court order to admit James Meredith to the University of Mississippi. Only after massive demonstrations in Birmingham, Ala., led by MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., did Kennedy call for civil rights legislation. That legislation remained stalled in Congress at the time of his assassination. Perhaps most significantly, he appointed a number of segregationists to federal judgeships in the South.

In foreign affairs, Kennedy pursued an aggressively anticommunist foreign policy. Not long after assuming the presidency, he approved a disastrous invasion at the Bay of Pigs in an attempt to overthrow Cuba's communist dictator, Fidel Castro. After a harrowing meeting with the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, in Vienna, Kennedy faced off with Khrushchev over Berlin. The United States and Soviet Union engaged in another showdown when the Soviets placed missiles in Cuba. Kennedy declared a quarantine, and ultimately Khrushchev backed down. Kennedy honored his campaign promise to increase military spending and America's conventional forces. He used that capability to increase the American commitment to South Vietnam.

Kennedy was assassinated on November 22, 1963, in Dallas, Tex. The romantic image of Kennedy that emerged after his death has not withstood the scrutiny of historians.

Kennedy, Robert F(rancis)

(1925–1968) assistant counsel, Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Government Operations Committee; minority counsel; chief counsel, Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field

The seventh of nine children of Joseph P. and Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy, Robert F. Kennedy was born in Brookline, Mass., on November 20, 1925, into one of the wealthiest families in the United States. He attended Portsmouth Priory and Milton Academy, from which he graduated in 1943. In his senior year at Milton, he joined the V-12 program, which trained naval officers. Kennedy reported for duty at Harvard University in March 1944. He was transferred to the campus of Bates College for further training in November of that year. In June 1945, with the war in Europe over, he was transferred back to Harvard for more training. World War II had ended when, through the intercession of his father, Robert received permission to leave his officer training unit in February 1946 and enlisted in the Navy as a seaman aboard a destroyer named for his brother, Joseph Kennedy, Jr., who had been killed in the crash of a navy plane in August 1944. After the navy discharged him in May 1946, Kennedy returned to Harvard, graduated in 1948, and then went on to law school at the University of Virginia. Upon earning his law degree in 1951, he worked for the Department of Justice prosecuting graft and income-tax evasion cases. He resigned in mid-1952 to manage his brother JOHN F. KENNEDY's successful campaign for the U.S. Senate.

In 1953, Kennedy secured, through his father's friendship with Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), an appointment as assistant counsel to the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, of which McCarthy was chairman. Kennedy's badgering tone with witnesses, while perhaps not so abusive as that of McCarthy or the committee's chief counsel, ROY COHN, nevertheless earned him the enmity of many liberals, intellectuals, and civil libertarians. Kennedy agreed with McCarthy about the nature of the communist threat and, at least to a degree, agreed with him with respect to tactics. Cohn and Kennedy, however, soon clashed. The two ambitious and ruthless young men took an immediate dislike to each other. Kennedy had wanted the job that went to Cohn; moreover, several biographers of Kennedy have suggested that he was offended by Cohn's homosexuality. Assigned to investigate Western trade with Communist China, Kennedy's work led to an announcement by McCarthy that he had personally negotiated an agreement with a group of Greek shipowners, who had promised that their vessels would no longer stop at ports in China or the Soviet bloc. Kennedy increasingly took issue with the way Cohn ran the operations of the subcommittee. When Cohn and G. DAVID SCHINE went on a highly publicized and much-ridiculed inspection tour of American embassies in Europe searching for subversives and subversive literature in U.S. Information Agency libraries, Kennedy warned McCarthy that Cohn's behavior would lead to disaster. Kennedy quit the committee's staff.

Kennedy went to work for the Hoover Commission, of which his father was a member. About the time Kennedy resigned in July 1953, the three Democrats on the subcommittee, JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), HENRY JACKSON (D-Wash.), and STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.), began a boycott of the subcommittee. In January 1954, they agreed to return, and in February hired Kennedy as minority counsel. Kennedy returned to the subcommittee in time to become involved in the dispute between the army and McCarthy that began when Cohn allegedly attempted to obtain preferential treatment for Schine, who had been drafted. The army revealed what it maintained were Cohn's efforts to exert pressure on behalf of Schine, and McCarthy charged that the army was heavily infiltrated by communists.

The subcommittee held televised hearings on the dispute in April, May, and June. Kennedy used his position as minority counsel to go after Cohn, rather than McCarthy. At one point in the hearings, Kennedy fed questions to Sen. Jackson that indirectly attacked Cohn by mocking a grandiose plan, drawn up by Schine, to counter communism around the world through "psychological warfare." A furious Cohn confronted Kennedy, the two engaged in a shouting match, and only the intervention of other aides prevented a fistfight. When the hearings ended on June 17, Kennedy, working with James M. Landis, dean of Harvard Law School, wrote the minority report, which accused McCarthy of "gross misconduct." Later that year, Kennedy compiled evidence for Democrats to use in the debate over a resolution to censure McCarthy. Nevertheless, through it all, Kennedy's personal affection for McCarthy never wavered. When McCarthy died in May 1957, funeral services were held at Saint Matthew's Cathedral in Washington, D.C., in the Senate Chamber, and at Saint Mary's Roman Catholic Church in Appleton, Wis. Robert Kennedy attended all three.

Kennedy became chief counsel when the Democrats regained control of Congress in 1955 and continued to work for the subcommittee until late 1956. His work focused on conflict-of-interest cases involving figures in the Eisenhower administration. One investigation led to the resignation of HAROLD TALBOTT as secretary of the air force. During this period, a reporter, Clark Mollenhoff, brought Kennedy evidence of corruption in the Teamsters Union. Kennedy then began his own investigation, accumulating evidence of Teamsters president DAVE BECK's blatant misuse of funds. His findings led the Senate to create the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field in January 1957. Kennedy immediately became the committee's chief counsel.

The investigations of the Senate "rackets committee," as the select committee soon came to be called, uncovered glaring evidence of dishonesty and extortion in the Teamsters Union. Though Kennedy's initial target was Dave Beck, the hearings soon focused upon JAMES HOFFA, vice president of the Teamsters who succeeded Beck as president in 1957, when the latter refused to run for reelection because of charges of misuse of union funds. Kennedy's investigation revealed a complicated story of conflict of interest and collusion with underworld figures to further Hoffa's interests in the union. Repeated clashes between the union leader and the committee counsel provided the highlights of Hoffa's many appearances before the committee. The hearings ground on inconclusively, and Kennedy encountered criticism from Republicans on the committee who believed that, by focusing on Hoffa, he was deliberately deflecting attention from WALTER REUTHER of the United Auto Workers, who regularly supported Democratic candidates. Kennedy reluctantly began an investigation of the UAW that uncovered no wrongdoing. The hearings on the Teamsters brought the committee's chief counsel and his brother, who sat on the committee, national attention, not all of it favorable. Some constitutional scholars criticized Robert Kennedy's methods of questioning and maintained that he attempted to transform a claim of privilege under the Fifth Amendment into an admission of guilt.

Kennedy resigned as counsel to the rackets committee in September 1959 to manage his brother's race for the presidency. In early 1960, he published a book about his investigations, The Enemy Within. John Kennedy defeated HUBERT HUMPHREY in the primaries and turned aside a challenge from the majority leader in the Senate, LYNDON JOHNSON (D-Tex.) at the convention. In the general election, he won a narrow victory over Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON.

After winning the presidency, John Kennedy named his brother attorney general. In that office, Robert Kennedy continued his campaign against organized crime. He also resumed his war on Jimmy Hoffa. During his brother's presidency, the Justice Department dealt with matters relating to civil rights, organized crime, labor, economic monopoly, and juvenile delinquency. The attorney general and his brother responded cautiously as civil rights activists tried to involve the federal government in their struggle. Robert Kennedy served as his brother's closest adviser and participated in virtually all major decisions of the administration, including the response to the Cuban missile crisis.

The assassination of John Kennedy on November 22, 1963, devastated Robert. He briefly continued as attorney general under Johnson, but resigned in 1964 to run for a senate seat from New York. Kennedy defeated the Republican incumbent, KENNETH KEATING, by slightly over 700,000 votes. In that election, Kennedy benefited from the Johnson landslide; the president carried New York by 2.7 million votes. Although an early supporter of the American involvement in Vietnam, Kennedy came to question the efficacy of the American military effort. At the same time, he hesitated to break with the administration and make his doubts public. Kennedy declined entreaties from antiwar activists to challenge Johnson for the nomination. Not until Sen. EUGENE McCARTHY (D-Minn.) made a strong showing in the New Hampshire primary did Kennedy enter the race. On June 5, 1968, the night he won the California primary, he was fatally shot by Sirhan Sirhan in Los Angeles.

Kennon, Robert F(loyd)

(1902–1988) governor of Louisiana

Born in Minden, La., on August 21, 1902, Robert F. Kennon graduated from Minden High School in 1919. He earned a B.A. from Louisiana State University in 1923 and a law degree from the same institution in 1925. He was admitted to the Louisiana bar that same year and set up a law practice in Minden. Kennon defeated the incumbent mayor of Minden in 1925, but did not stand for reelection when his term expired. He returned to the private practice of law until 1930, when he won election as district attorney for the 26th Judicial District in Louisiana. In addition to holding elective office, he organized a local company of the National Guard in 1925 and served as its captain. In 1940, he ran first in the primary for a position as a judge on the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, finishing ahead of the incumbent and another candidate. He defeated the incumbent in the runoff. The seat he won would not become vacant until January 1, 1942, however, and Kennon continued to serve as district attorney until he was called to active duty on January 5, 1941. He served in Europe during World War II and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. Upon his discharge from the service in May 1945, he returned to Louisiana, and, upon the death of Associate Justice Archibald T. Higgins, Kennon was appointed to Louisiana's Supreme Court to fill the unexpired term. Kennon served from October 1945 to January 1947. In 1948, he ran as an anti-Long candidate in the Democratic gubernatorial primary and lost to EARL K. LONG, brother of the late Huey Long. The anti-Long faction was composed primarily of oil and gas businessmen opposed to the pension plans and other share-the-wealth measures of the Long brothers. A few months after losing to Earl, in a special election to fill a vacant seat in the U.S. Senate, Kennon lost the Democratic nomination to Huey's 27-year-old son, RUSSELL LONG.

Kennon succeeded on his third try for governor. He defeated Carlos G. Spaht, who had the backing of the Long machine, in the Democratic primary of January 1952 and in the subsequent runoff. Campaigning on a platform that called for lowering the gasoline tax, economizing in government, and reducing the governor's power, Kennon won election over the Republican candidate, Harrison Bagwell, in April. He supported Sen. RICHARD B. RUSSELL (D-Ga.) for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952. At the National Democratic Convention in July, Gov. Kennon led his delegation in refusing to sign an oath pledging to support the party's presidential and vice presidential nominees. Following the convention, he remarked there was “considerable uncertainty” in the South regarding the Democratic presidential nominee, ADLAI E. STEVENSON.

Louisiana was second only to Texas in oil lands claimed on the continental shelf. The Democratic platform supported federal ownership of these lands. When, in September, the Republican presidential candidate, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, promised to back state claims to the offshore oil, Kennon endorsed him. Later that month, the governor organized Louisiana “Democrats for Eisenhower” but refused to work with the state GOP. Eisenhower narrowly lost Louisiana in November.

Following the Republican president’s inauguration in January 1953, Kennon testified for state claims to submerged oil lands before the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. When, in February, the panel pondered whether maritime or state law should apply to the tidelands oil areas, Kennon spoke up for the latter. Eisenhower signed the long-disputed bill turning offshore oil over to the states into law in May 1953. Kennon continued to dissociate himself from the national Democratic Party. He joined fellow southern Democratic GOVS. ALLAN SHIVERS of Texas and JAMES F. BYRNES of South Carolina, who had also supported Eisenhower, in refusing to attend a national Democratic conference in September 1953.

When the U.S. Supreme Court declared public school segregation unconstitutional in May 1954, Kennon avoided rabble-rousing demagoguery and did not ask for new segregation laws. Hoping for an appointment to a federal judgeship, Kennon thought it unwise publicly to oppose the highest federal court. He did, however, sign those bills that came out of the legislature, including a measure to cut off state funds to schools that desegregated and a pupil placement law. Moreover, Kennon promised that segregation would be maintained within existing statutes and that the legislature would provide a school system “which will include segregation in fact.” After the Supreme Court handed down its decision on the implementation of school desegregation (Brown II) in 1955, Kennon declared, “I am convinced the majority of the people of this state want their schools segregated. So long as I am governor, I will try to follow the wishes of the people.” In 1956, Kennon defied an order by the Interstate Commerce Commission requiring integration of railroad and bus waiting rooms. The governor instructed all state and municipal officials to enforce state segregation laws.

In July 1954, Kennon was elected chairman of the U.S. Governors Conference. He conferred with his fellow executives on the president’s proposed $50-billion interstate highway program. In December, Kennon presented Eisenhower with the governors’ report calling for highway expenditures of $101 billion over the next 10 years. As the national elections approached in 1956, it became evident that Kennon and Shivers would again support Eisenhower. Prohibited by law from succeeding himself, Kennon endorsed anti-Long candidate Fred Preaus, who lost to Earl K. Long in the Democratic gubernatorial primary of 1956. Kennon joined Shivers in endorsing and campaigning for Eisenhower during his last year in office. Upon completing his term, Kennon returned to the private practice of law in Baton Rouge. When a judgeship on the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit became vacant, Kennon made clear his desire for the appointment, but it went instead to JOHN MINOR WISDOM. Eisenhower’s attorney general, HERBERT BROWNELL, later recalled that Kennon did not get the nomination because he was a segregationist. Kennon attempted to return to public life with an unsuccessful run for governor in 1963. He died in Baton Rouge on January 11, 1988.

Kerouac, Jack (1922–1969) writer

The son of French-Canadian parents, Kerouac was born Jean-Louis Lebris de Kerouac in the small town of Lowell, Mass., on March 12, 1922. English was his second language; as a boy, he first spoke joul, a dialect of French Canadians. At Lowell High School, he achieved success both as an athlete and as a student. After graduating, he spent a year at the Horace Mann School in Riverdale, N.Y., before taking up a scholarship at Columbia University in the fall of 1940. A star running back on the freshman football team until he suffered a broken leg, he was less successful as a student at Columbia. He left Columbia in the fall of 1941 and joined the merchant marine and later the navy, which discharged him after a brief stint for unspecified psychiatric reasons. After his discharge from the navy, he served in the merchant marine again before going back to Columbia in 1944. Although his return to college and to football proved fleeting, at Columbia he met a group of aspiring writers, including ALLEN GINSBERG and William Burroughs. Kerouac had already written an unpublished book of short stories and an unpublished novel.

Sometime after his father's death from stomach cancer in 1946, Kerouac began work on what became his first published book, The Town and the City (1950). Powerfully influenced by the novels of Thomas Wolfe, this thinly veiled autobiographical recounting of his boyhood in Lowell revealed both the excesses of Kerouac's style and its powerful lyricism. The reviews were modest and the sales virtually nonexistent. In that novel, he used the word "beat" for the first time in his writing. Kerouac sometimes claimed that the word "beat" came from "beatific or beatitude." On other occasions, he maintained that it referred to being beaten down or in a state of despair. Kerouac coined the term "Beat Generation" to refer to the spiritual exhaustion of his companions. The term came to be used to describe a movement that gained a degree of popularity in the mid-1950s and opposed contemporary values, which its adherents believed were materialistic and patriotic. Kerouac objected to that use of the term, maintaining that it destroyed his meaning.

His next work, On the Road (1957), broke dramatically from traditional literary style. Originally composed at a typewriter on a long roll of Teletype paper, the novel attempted to capture in prose the spontaneous, improvisational style of bebop, a form of jazz pioneered by Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. Kerouac based the book on several trips across the country he made in the late 1940s with Neal Cassady, a young drifter from Denver. From its Beat opening ("I first met Dean not long after my wife and I split up. I had just gotten over a serious illness that I won't bother to talk about, except that it had something to do with the miserably weary split-up and my feeling that everything was dead"), the book offered an alternative vision of American life and an alternative lifestyle. Some found in it an expression of their own alienation and yearning for the freedom symbolized by the open road. On the Road became, at least for some, a blueprint for a joyriding, drug-taking rebellion against the values of American society in the 1950s. Between 1951 and 1956, Kerouac composed many unpublished poems and novels, including a version of "On the Road" that would later be published as Visions of Cody in 1973. Some critics consider this to be the finest example of Kerouac's attempts at "spontaneous prose."

The publication of On the Road made Kerouac a literary celebrity, a status to which he reacted uncomfortably. In various public appearances, including on the Tonight Show, he was cast as a Beat icon. Many literary critics regarded the Beat phenomenon as a passing fad and refused to take Kerouac's work seriously. One night on the David Susskind Show, Truman Capote, after listening to Norman Mailer describe Kerouac's method of composition, famously remarked, "That's not writing, it's just . . . typing." The rejection by many critics and the association of his work with what he regarded as a fad deeply hurt him. Moreover, trying to live up to the image he presented in On the Road contributed to an already severe drinking problem. He continued to travel around the country and spent some time in San Francisco, where he established a close friendship with Gary Snyder, who interested Kerouac in Buddhism. His next book, The Dharma Bums (1958), described his experiences with Snyder and his steps, along with those of his friends, toward spiritual enlightenment. For all his enthusiasm for Buddhism, however, Kerouac remained a serious Catholic.

Through their lifestyle and their art, the Beats spawned a hoard of imitators. First in the San Francisco Bay area and Greenwich Village and then elsewhere, coffee shops sprang up where young women attired in black turtlenecks and black leotards joined young men in beards, khaki slacks, and sweaters to listen to cool jazz and hear readings of usually dreadful poetry. Similarly, would-be writers spewed out streams of undisciplined, often incoherent, prose in an effort to mimic Kerouac's style. Despite his belief that he produced more valid work when he wrote "without consciousness," Kerouac's best prose differed markedly from that of his imitators. Although his output was uneven in quality, an attention to detail, a grounding in European and American literature, and an intense lyrical quality distinguished his best work.

Kerouac may be best remembered for his influence on the generation of the 1960s. In fact, however, his political ideas often differed considerably from those of the young people he influenced. In many respects a political conservative, his politics were libertarian rather than radical. Deeply influenced by his Catholic upbringing, Kerouac was anti-Semitic and anticommunist. He denounced the New Left, became friendly with WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, and, throughout the Vietnam War, which he supported, insisted that he was “still a Marine” and ready to serve. In addition, he did not advocate the licentious sexuality often associated with the Beat lifestyle or the hippies of the 1960s. Indeed, this icon of the counterculture lived at his mother’s house throughout much of his adult life.

Kerouac continued to write autobiographical novels in the 1960s. Big Sur (1962) depicted his attempt to break his drinking habit and reconnect with his talent as a writer by embarking on a solitary retreat to commune with nature in Bixby Canyon in the Big Sur region. The experiment failed, and he returned to San Francisco and to the bottle. The several novels that followed in the mid-1960s did not measure up to his earlier work. Beset by alcoholism and stung by both criticism of his political views and by what he regarded as the deliberate distortion of those views to the purposes of others, he withdrew from public life. He died of an abdominal hemorrhage in Saint Petersburg, Fla., on October 21, 1969.

Kerr, Clark

(1911–2003) president, University of California

The son of an apple farmer, Clark Kerr was born in Reading, Pa., on May 17, 1911. He received a B.A. from Swarthmore College in 1932 and earned an M.A. from Stanford University the following year. He studied at the London School of Economics, taught economics at Antioch, and earned a Ph.D. from the University of California at Berkeley in 1939.

From 1939 to 1940, Kerr taught labor economics at Stanford University. In 1942, he undertook his first assignment arbitrating between unions and management in a wage dispute. Over the next 20 years, he became the most highly paid labor-management negotiator on the West Coast. After teaching for five years at the University of Washington, Kerr returned to the University of California in 1945. He established the Institute of Industrial Relations at Berkeley while teaching a full schedule. In 1950, the university’s regents required that faculty members sign a loyalty oath. Although he signed it, Kerr was one of the most outspoken of faculty leaders in opposition to the oath. In 1952, with strong backing from the faculty, Kerr was named the first chancellor of the Berkeley campus. In the six years he held that position, he spurred the physical expansion of the campus and, partially in response to the circumstances of the cold war, encouraged scientific research. Kerr also continued to serve as a labor mediator. In April 1958, United Auto Workers president WALTER REUTHER chose Kerr to sit on an independent ethics panel to which union members could appeal disputes with their leaders.

Kerr became president of the University of California in September 1958. His tenure as chancellor and president coincided with the enormous expansion of higher education in the United States spurred by the G.I. Bill, widespread affluence, and, later in the decade, the response to Sputnik. Kerr developed California’s Master Plan, which created a three-tier system of higher education. At the top were the University of California campuses, which drew students from the top 12.5 percent of the state’s high school students and had responsibility for most graduate programs, professional schools, and research. The state college system focused on undergraduate education. Community colleges offered two-year programs for entering students (some of whom would transfer to four-year institutions) as well as vocational programs, and were open to every graduate of California’s high schools. Kerr also oversaw the building of new campuses at Irvine, San Diego, and Santa Cruz.

The model of a modern educator, Kerr was appointed to President Eisenhower’s Commission on National Goals in February 1960. Issued the following November, the commission’s report stressed the need for Americans to make great sacrifices in the 1960s to defend freedom against anticipated communist expansion. In an individual report, Kerr said the nation should seek to eliminate racial discrimination by 1970.

Kerr coined the term “multiversity” for a series of lectures he gave at Harvard. He expanded upon the concept in a book, The Uses of the University (1963), which posited that “the knowledge industry” might do for the second half of the 20th century what railroads did for the second half of the 19th century. In response to new conditions and new demands, the multiversity, a vast complex of research, technology, and education, had emerged to replace the teaching colleges of the 19th century and the pure research university. Kerr held that the development of giant multiversities was inevitable. He nevertheless pointed out dangers he saw as attendant to the creation of “knowledge factories.” Among those, he focused on the neglect of students in the form of large classes, the extension of the use of teaching assistants, and the selection and promotion of faculty on the basis of research alone.

Whatever reservations he may have held about the emerging multiversity, Kerr made the University of California into the largest research and doctorate-awarding institution in the country. It was ironic that, given his own warnings about such trends, Kerr’s university became the object of increasing criticism for becoming impersonal, oblivious to students needs, and obsessed with funding and growth.

Those developments, coupled with increasing student activism, had catastrophic consequences for Kerr, his presidency, and the university. When Kerr became president, Berkeley was experiencing a growth of student activism. In addition to agitating about campus issues, students protested the execution of CARYL CHESSMAN and hearings held by the House Un-American Activities Committee in San Francisco. In the early 1960s, students were drawn increasingly to the civil rights movement. Several dozen students from Berkeley worked for the Mississippi Freedom Summer project in the summer of 1964. That fall, a concerned administration enforced a prohibition against soliciting on campus for noncampus political activity. In response, students organized the Free Speech Movement, which Kerr initially dismissed as “a ritual of hackneyed complaints.” Large-scale demonstrations and the occupation of Sproul Hall led Gov. EDMUND G.

BROWN to call in the police, who arrested almost 800 demonstrators. Faced with mounting protests and an overwhelming vote by the faculty in opposition to the prohibition of political activity on campus, Kerr rescinded the ban. Although he often disagreed with the students’ causes and disapproved of their actions, he refused to comply with an order from the regents in 1965 to take punitive measures against them and tendered his resignation. The regents backed down. Nevertheless, the continuing student activism at Berkeley generated resentment in some quarters and undermined Kerr’s relationship with the regents and the state government.

Campaigning for governor in 1966, Ronald Reagan pledged to “clean up the mess in Berkeley.” In January 1967, at the regents’ first meeting after Reagan was sworn in as governor, the regents voted, 14 to 8, to fire Kerr. Kerr joked that he left the presidency of the University of California the same way he entered it, “fired with enthusiasm.” In spite of the quip, he later called his dismissal the “most painful event” of his life. Kerr retained his position in Berkeley’s School of Business Administration and later served on the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education and the Carnegie Council on Policy Studies. He championed the cause of economically disadvantaged students and advocated that federal aid to higher education be given to students rather than only to institutions. Kerr published a two-volume memoir of his years at the University of California, The Gold and the Blue, in 2001 and 2003. He died, following complications from a fall, in El Cerrito, Calif., on December 1, 2003.

Kerr, Robert S(amuel) (1896–1963) U.S. senator

The son of an ardent Progressive Democrat, Robert Kerr was born in a log cabin in Indian Territory, later the state of Oklahoma, on September 11, 1896. After graduating from high school, he taught school while he earned a two-year degree from East Central State Normal School in Ada, Okla. He studied law briefly at the University of Oklahoma, but financial exigencies forced him to drop out in 1916. He clerked in a law office until the United States entered World War I and he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the army. Although he never saw combat, Kerr served overseas in the field artillery. At end of the war, he returned to Oklahoma, where he struggled to make a living. After a business venture failed, Kerr passed the state bar examination in 1922 and began to practice law in Ada. After a few years, he entered the oil business with his brother-in-law, James L. Anderson. The firm had become so successful by 1929 that Kerr abandoned his law practice to devote his efforts to the Anderson-Kerr Drilling Company. Anderson-Kerr struck it rich in 1932 by drilling within Oklahoma City, where other oil firms feared possible property damage. Anderson retired in 1936, and Dean A. McGee, a former chief geologist with Phillips Petroleum, joined the firm. That same year, Kerr conducted a successful campaign to persuade the voters of Oklahoma City to extend the drilling area. Lucrative contracts with the Continental Oil Company and the Phillips Petroleum Company made Kerr a millionaire by the end of the Great Depression. In 1946, the company changed its name to Kerr-McGee Oil Industries, Inc., and expanded into all areas of the oil business except distribution. The company also established substantial interests in other natural resources, including gas, helium, potash, and beryllium. By the 1950s, Kerr-McGee controlled 25 percent of the known uranium reserves in the United States.

During the 1930s, Kerr became a leading spokesperson for the oil and gas industry in Oklahoma. He was also active in the Oklahoma National Guard and in the American Legion. Those activities provided a springboard into public life. In 1942, Kerr ran for the Democratic nomination for governor as a supporter of the New Deal and the war effort. He won both the primary and the general election by narrow margins. Kerr made his debut in national politics as the keynote speaker at the Democratic National Convention in 1944. At that convention, he also played a role in the selection of HARRY S. TRUMAN as the vice-presidential nominee.

Kerr won election to the Senate in 1948. As a member of that body, he generally endorsed the policies of the Truman administration and emerged as a leading advocate for the oil and gas industry. In 1950, he tried unsuccessfully to exempt natural gas from federal regulation. Although he aspired to national office, he focused primarily on the parochial interests of his state. He won assignment to the Public Works and Finance Committees, which placed him in a good position to further Oklahoma's interests. A keen mind, a forceful personality, and a mastery of detail enabled Kerr to rise rapidly in the Senate. An effective debater, his command of policy, combined with sarcasm, vituperation, and personal attacks, made opponents reluctant to take him on. Behind closed doors, where the real business of the Senate took place, Kerr was equally effective as a bargainer. While effective, his style did not endear him to his colleagues. Sen. PAUL DOUGLAS (D-Ill.) observed that Kerr was "more feared than liked."

Kerr made an unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952. After that, he committed himself entirely to his work in the Senate. He won reelection in 1954 and 1960. His close relationship with LYNDON JOHNSON, his party's leader in the Senate, and alliances with the powerful southern and western senators who dominated that body placed him at the center of power.

For all his national influence, he remained, above all, a voice for state and regional interests. He devoted himself to promoting federal projects to develop Oklahoma's natural resources. As chair of the Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee of the Public Works Committee, he pushed through a vast program of regional development projects, including hydroelectric plants, irrigation projects, an improved inland waterway system, pollution control, and recreational facilities. Indeed, the Arkansas River Navigation System, a $1.3-billion federal project in northeastern Oklahoma, defined his three terms in the Senate. His position on the Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee not only enabled him to serve Oklahoma's interests, but it gave him control over the fate of other senators' water projects. With the political IOUs thus accumulated, he wielded substantial power in other matters that concerned him, such as taxes and trade. For example, as the Senate's leading champion of the oil and gas industry, Kerr managed to rebuff any attempts to eliminate or reduce the 27.5 percent oil depletion allowance.

Kerr also used his considerable power to achieve enactment of special tax benefits for individuals. In 1955, the U.S. tax court ruled that Leo Sanders, a contractor from Oklahoma City, owed the government $955,000 in back taxes. The Supreme Court rejected Sanders's appeal in February 1956. Two months later, Kerr inserted in a tax measure a section that applied only to Sanders. The provision specified that, in Sanders's unique situation, the maximum tax rate was 33 percent, instead of 91 percent, and it further excused him from the large penalties he would have had to pay for failing to file proper returns. The measure passed, effectively relieving Sanders of most of the $955,000 he owed. Such power led Douglas to comment that Kerr was the "uncrowned king of the Senate."

Kerr opposed the Eisenhower administration on a number of issues involving the interests of his state. A strong protectionist, he fought to restrict foreign imports that injured Oklahoma's lead, zinc, and oil industries. This position led him to oppose the administration's proposals for freer trade. He voted against a three-year extension of the reciprocal trade bill sponsored by the administration in 1955 and in 1958 unsuccessfully sought to limit the president's authority to override decisions by the tariff commission. A supporter of high farm price supports, Kerr constantly criticized Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON's policy of flexible price supports. In October 1953, he charged that Benson's failure to support cattle prices at 90 percent of parity had reduced farmers' share of the national income to the lowest level in 15 years. With typical vituperation, he said that Eisenhower "knew far too little about farm problems" and called for Benson's removal.

Kerr's desire for higher federal spending in such areas as public works and agriculture clashed with the administration's desire to cut budgets. In 1957, he launched a broad attack on the economic performance of the Eisenhower administration. In June, armed with a battery of statistics, he subjected Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY and chairman of the Federal Reserve Board WILLIAM MCCHESENEY MARTIN to intensive critical interrogation during Senate hearings. Kerr assailed the Eisenhower administration for allowing "big business to reinforce its position and its share of the economy; while the farm industry has been almost bankrupted, small business had been penalized and jeopardized and those in the lending business have increased their share by 40 percent." Kerr's invective reached its peak during a debate in the Senate on July 15, when he said that if the country's fiscal experts were "marched . . . by Eisenhower for months" he would remain "uninformed" on fiscal matters because it took "brains" to understand them and "he doesn't have them."

Kerr played a central role in the enactment of legislation to provide medical care for the aged in 1960. He won passage in the Senate Finance Committee of a conservative substitute for a more sweeping proposal for medical care (Medicare) for the elderly sponsored by presidential candidate Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and favored by most Democratic senators. Kennedy's bill proposed to provide medical care to all people over the age of 65 and to pay for the program with an increase in Social Security taxes. The administration offered a plan that included 180 days of hospitalization and covered most other medical expenses, paid for through the Social Security system but administered by the states and private companies and limited to elderly people who could not afford to pay for their medical expenses. Kerr's plan provided for matching federal funds to the states to pay for medical care only for the elderly indigent, and it paid for the program out of general revenues. In August, the Senate voted down the administration plan on a party-line vote; it then defeated Medicare by a vote of 51-44, after which it passed Kerr's version by 91-2. After a conference committee reconciled the Kerr bill with a similar measure, sponsored by WILBUR MILLS (D-Ark.) and passed by the House, both houses passed the legislation. Upon receiving Eisenhower's signature, the Kerr-Mills Act became law.

Kerr supported Johnson's bid for the Democratic nomination in 1960. After losing the nomination to Kennedy, Johnson accepted Kennedy's offer of the vice presidential nomination. When the Democratic ticket won, Kerr replaced Johnson as chair of the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee. With that assignment and his position as ranking Democrat on the Finance and Public Works Committees, Kerr reached the peak of his power in the Senate. For the most part, he worked to support the administration's domestic program. Following Kennedy's request for an increase in spending for the space program, Kerr's committee doubled the appropriations for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). As always, Kerr pursued his personal agenda as well; he engineered the appointment of James Webb, an employee of Kerr-McGee, as head of NASA. In return for his support of selected elements of Kennedy's legislative program, Kerr exacted from the administration a free hand with respect to water resources. In spite of this arrangement, the administration could not always count on Kerr's support; he managed the defeat of Medicare in 1962.

Kerr suffered a heart attack and died at Bethesda Naval Hospital on January 1, 1963.

Keyserling, Leon H(yman)

(1908–1987) economist

Born in Charleston, S.C., on January 22, 1908, Keyserling attended Columbia University, where he was influenced by Rexford Tugwell, an institutional economist and later a prominent adviser to Franklin D. Roosevelt. Upon graduating in 1928 with a B.A. in economics, Keyserling enrolled in Harvard Law School, from which he graduated in 1931. He then enrolled as a doctoral student in economics at Columbia but did not complete his dissertation. As the New Deal got under way, he went to Washington and joined the Department of Agriculture in 1933. Later that year, he became administrative assistant to Sen. ROBERT F. WAGNER (D-N.Y.) and in that capacity helped draft several important New Deal measures. Keyserling was the primary drafter of Section 7A of the National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA), which provided government support for collective bargaining. After the Supreme Court declared the NIRA unconstitutional, Congress reenacted Section 7A as part of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (the Wagner Act). Keyserling also played a significant role in crafting the Social Security Act of 1935 and the Housing Act of 1937. Wagner chaired the Democratic Platform Committee, and he had Keyserling draft the party platforms in 1936, 1940, and 1944. In addition, Keyserling occasionally wrote speeches for Roosevelt.

Keyserling worked in federal housing agencies from 1937 to 1946. He was general counsel to the U.S. Housing Authority from 1937 to 1938 and then deputy administrator and general counsel from 1938 to 1942. From 1941 to 1942, he was acting administrator. After the American entry into World War II, he became acting commissioner of the Federal Public Housing Authority. He served as general counsel to the National Housing Agency from 1942 to 1946. After the war, he played a role in the creation of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and drafted the National Housing Act of 1949.

At the end of the war, Keyserling played a role in drafting the Full Employment Act of 1946. The act established that full employment should be a focus of economic policy. It also created the Council of Economic Advisers. President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him vice chairman of the new Council of Economic Advisers (CEA) in 1946. When the Democrats lost the congressional elections of 1946, Keyserling became part of Clark Clifford's Monday night supper group, which attempted to influence the Truman administration to take a more liberal course. The group also developed strategy for the presidential campaign in 1948. In 1949, Keyserling became chair of the CEA. He held the position until the end of the Truman administration, but he exercised his greatest influence from the time he assumed the chair until the outbreak of the Korean War.

Keyserling's approach to the economy focused on growth. He repeated many of Tugwell's ideas about the need for balance in the economy, the danger of monopolies, and the benefits of planning, but Keyserling believed that growth could solve major economic problems, including depression and inflation. Above all, however, he believed that growth could solve social problems and do so without raising the question of redistribution of wealth. In other words, Keyserling maintained that if the economic pie could be expanded, even those with the smallest slices would still have enough to live decently, and the pie need not be re-sliced. Although he advocated increased government spending to stimulate demand, Keyserling always denied that he was a Keynesian economist.

With the advent of a Republican administration in 1953, Keyserling returned to his law practice and became a consulting economist. His clients included nearly all the public employee unions in New York City. He founded the Conference on Economic Progress, a tax-exempt nonprofit foundation dedicated to the study of public policy, and served as its director until 1972. After leaving Washington, Keyserling wrote profusely and lobbied for a variety of liberal causes, but he exercised little influence on policy. He was a low-tech economist, and high-tech economics began to dominate the field even while Keyserling was in office. Professional economists found Keyserling's economic analysis unsophisticated, and he was poorly equipped to engage the macroeconomists of the postwar era.

During the 1960s, he criticized the Kennedy administration for being too timid and for failing to pursue full employment. He continued to advocate liberal positions during the Johnson and Nixon administrations and helped to draft the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978 (the Humphrey-Hawkins Act). He died in Washington, D.C., on August 9, 1987.

Killian, James R(hyne)

(1904–1988) president, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; member, Office for Defense Mobilization Science Advisory Committee; president's special assistant for science and technology; chairman, President's Science Advisory Committee; member, President's Science Advisory Committee

Born in Blacksburg, S.C., on July 24, 1904, Killian attended Trinity College (now Duke University) before graduating from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in 1926 with a degree in engineering and business administration. He went to work for MIT's scientific journal, Technology Review, and became its editor in 1930. While serving in that post, he also helped found what became MIT Press. Killian left his position as editor in 1939 to become executive assistant to MIT's president, a position he held until 1943. He served as executive vice president from 1943 to 1948 and president-designate in 1948 before becoming president in 1949. Although he spent part of the next decade on leave to work for the government, he remained president until 1959.

As president, Killian promoted the school's ties with private business and its research in weapons technology. At the same time, he stressed broader training for scientists. During his presidency, MIT established a School of Humanities, a School of Industrial Management, and a Center for International Studies.

Killian also became an adviser to the federal government on matters pertaining to science. From 1951 to 1959, he served as chair of the Army Scientific Panel. He joined the Office of Defense Mobilization's Science Advisory Committee in 1951. Killian continued to work for the government under Eisenhower. In 1954 and 1955, he headed a panel of the Science Advisory Committee to study the problem of defending the United States against a surprise thermonuclear attack. After studying the matter for almost a year, the panel issued its report in February 1955. The report stressed the need for better delivery of nuclear warheads. It deemed progress on an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) "satisfactory" but warned that there would not be enough ICBMs to have military significance until 1965. To prevent the Soviet Union from deploying ballistic missiles first, the report urged the development of intermediate range ballistic missiles (IRBM). Eisenhower ordered the National Security Council to give programs for both intermediate and intercontinental missiles "highest national priority" status. On December 15, 1955, however, Eisenhower instructed the secretary of defense to continue both programs but to give priority to the ballistic missile that could be developed first, and that was the intermediate range missile. Eisenhower came to trust and rely on Killian and gave him a number of assignments. He appointed Killian to chair the eight-member Board of Consultants, a committee with responsibility to oversee the Central Intelligence Agency. He also named Killian to a committee, headed by H. ROWAN GAITHER, JR., created to study civil defense.

The launching of the Soviet satellite, Sputnik, in October 1957 created a public outcry for an increased emphasis on science in education and an increase in defense spending. To coordinate an accelerated science program, Eisenhower appointed Killian to the newly created post of special assistant for science and technology. In that capacity, Killian's task was to improve scientific education at all levels, to expand basic research programs, to coordinate scientific activities with allied nations, and to expedite the development of missiles.

At the same time, Eisenhower ordered the removal of the Science Advisory Committee from the Office of Defense Mobilization to the White House and appointed Killian to chair the expanded and reorganized President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC). Killian took leave from MIT to assume his new responsibilities. He shared the president's view that the launch of Sputnik probably indicated that the Soviets were ahead in the development of an ICBM, but that this did not mean that the Soviets had surpassed the United States in science. Moreover, like Eisenhower, he worried that the reaction to Sputnik would lead to panic-driven spending that would damage the economy and result in little scientific achievement. Killian was involved in a wide range of studies and decisions involving issues relating to science and defense. He played a major role in shaping the American ballistic missile program. At the president's request in February 1958, Killian oversaw a study of the organization of the American space program. In commissioning the study, Killian acknowledged the necessity for military space programs to continue within the Defense Department, but he warned against limiting American efforts in space "to narrowly concerned military objectives." Completed in March 1958, the study recommended the creation of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), which Congress enacted in July 1958. The committee also reported the possibility of a manned flight to the Moon before the end of the next decade.

Killian played a significant role in the Eisenhower administration's decision to pursue a nuclear test ban agreement with the Soviet Union. In March 1958, he appointed a committee of scientists, headed by HANS BETHE, to study the possible effects of such a ban and the adequacy of methods for detecting nuclear tests. The committee reported that the United States could benefit from a test ban monitored by a good detection system, a finding that helped allay the fears and refute the objections of many who had opposed the ban.

In July 1959, Killian resigned as Eisenhower's special assistant and as chair of the PSAC. He remained, however, a member of the PSAC until 1961. At the same time he resigned his major positions in government, he stepped down as president of MIT to become chair of the MIT Corporation. Even then, Eisenhower continued to call on him for national service. In February 1960, the president appointed Killian to the Commission on National Goals.

Killian continued to serve as a presidential adviser during subsequent presidential administrations. He chaired the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television from 1965 to 1967, which issued a report advocating the creation of a nationwide network of TV stations supported by the government. When Congress passed the Public Television Act of 1967, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Killian to the board of trustees of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, a position he held from 1968 to 1975. Killian served as chair of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting in 1973 and 1974. Upon retiring as chair of the MIT Corporation in 1971, he was given the title of honorary chairman. His books included Sputnik, Scientists and Eisenhower (1977) and The Education of a College President (1985). He died in Cambridge, Mass., on January 29, 1988.

King, Martin Luther, Jr.

(1929–1968) minister; president, Montgomery Improvement Association; president, Southern Christian Leadership Conference

The son of a Baptist minister, King was born Michael King, Jr., on January 15, 1929, in Atlanta. In 1934, Michael King, Sr., upon the dying request of his own father, changed both his name and that of his son to Martin Luther King. Martin Luther King, Jr., attended Morehouse College from 1944 to 1948. Although he found the emotionalism of his father's religion embarrassing and questioned some tenets of Baptist doctrine, the minister teachers at Morehouse and the example of his father led King to decide to enter the ministry. He was ordained during his senior year. Upon graduating from Morehouse, he enrolled at Crozer Theological Seminary in Pennsylvania. There, he began to move away from liberal Christian theology and toward the neoorthodoxy of REINHOLD NIEBUHR, which stressed original sin, the inherently sinful nature of humans, and the imperfectability of human society. King received his divinity degree from Crozer in 1951 and enrolled in the doctoral program in systematic theology at Boston University's School of Theology. He received his Ph.D. in 1955. Many years later, while conducting research for the publication of King's papers (the first volume of which appeared in 1992), scholars discovered that King had plagiarized substantial portions of his doctoral dissertation and some of his papers in graduate school.

While working on his dissertation, King contemplated an academic career but ultimately accepted an offer to become pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Ala. Upon moving to Montgomery in 1954, he spent much of his first year there completing his dissertation and tending to his new duties as pastor. Then came an event that would change his life. On December 1, 1955, ROSA PARKS, a black seamstress, an activist, and an officer in the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was arrested for refusing to surrender her seat to a white man as required by Montgomery's segregation ordinance. Black leaders of Montgomery organized to protest Parks's arrest and formed the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA). They planned a boycott of the city's buses and demanded that white passengers be seated from front to back and black passengers be seated from back to front on a first come, first serve basis. In addition, they demanded courteous treatment of black passengers and the hiring of some black drivers. Although new to Montgomery and not a primary force behind the protest, King emerged as its leader. The organizers of the protest turned to him because of his education, his ability as a speaker, and, perhaps most important, because he was not identified with any faction of Montgomery's divided black leadership and therefore could serve as a unifying force.

The boycott had an immediate impact. On December 5, the scheduled beginning of the boycott, only a handful of black riders, who normally accounted for 70 percent of the Montgomery City Line's passengers, took the buses. The MIA established a car pool consisting of some 300 vehicles to transport African Americans who depended on bus service and held twice-weekly meetings to communicate the latest developments, raise funds, and sustain morale. Encouraged by BAYARD RUSTIN and other veteran pacifists, King became an advocate of Mohandas Gandhi's precepts of nonviolence, which he expressed in Christian terms. He taught that the nonviolent resister refused to hate and quoted Booker T. Washington: "Let no man pull you so low as to make you hate him."

As the protest continued, white resistance increased. Negotiations between the MIA, city officials, and the bus company, which was losing large sums of money, broke down at the end of December. King was arrested for speeding on January 26, 1956. Four days later, a bomb tore apart the front of King's home. An angry mob gathered, and only an impassioned speech by King prevented violence. On February 1, a bomb exploded at the home of E. D. Nixon, one of the founders and leaders of the MIA. In late February, King and 88 other leaders of the boycott were indicted on a charge of conspiring to organize an illegal boycott. He was convicted on March 22, but his $500 fine was suspended pending appeal.

In the face of stiffening white resistance, the MIA expanded its demands to include an end of segregation on the city's buses. The MIA, with support from the NAACP, filed suit in federal court on February 1, 1956, challenging the constitutionality of the city ordinances and state laws that required segregation on local buses. On June 4, a three-judge federal court decided, by a two-to-one vote, that the segregation laws violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The city appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. With its appeal pending, city officials moved to enjoin operation of the MIA's car pool. During a hearing on that issue on November 13, word arrived that the Supreme Court had held the laws requiring segregated buses unconstitutional. Nevertheless, a local judge issued an injunction against the car pool, and the MIA disbanded it. The black community of Montgomery continued the boycott until the Supreme Court's order arrived on December 20. The next day, at 5:55 A.M., King and several associates boarded a bus and began the integration of Montgomery's public transportation.

For the next month, elements of the white community engaged in a campaign of violence. A shotgun blast tore through the front of King's house in the early morning hours of December 23; a group of white men beat a 15-year-old black girl at a bus stop; snipers fired on an integrated bus. Four black churches and the homes of two ministers (including RALPH ABERNATHY's) were bombed on January 10, 1957. More bombings followed at the end of the month, including an unsuccessful attempt to dynamite King's home. The wave of violence finally aroused city officials, and police arrested seven white men for the bombing. The arrests, however, exhausted the resolve of the city's white leadership. An all-white jury failed to convict in the first two cases brought, despite signed confessions.

The bus boycott lasted 382 days. It almost bankrupted the Montgomery City Line, and it unified Montgomery's black community, but it did not end segregation on Montgomery's buses; it took a legal challenge, backed by the NAACP, to do that. The boycott also attracted national attention and thrust King into national prominence. Further, the experience helped establish nonviolence as King's basic philosophy. The young minister had shown interest in Gandhian techniques of nonviolent resistance since his student days, and from its start, the boycott was nonviolent. Moreover, from the beginning of the protest, King preached the doctrine of Christian love and forgiveness to his followers. Only gradually, however, did King develop a sophisticated comprehension of the connections between Christian love, Gandhian nonviolence, and the struggle to end segregation and discrimination in America. As the boycott unfolded and as his ideas coalesced, King made nonviolent direct action the explicit ideological framework of the protest. Moreover, the boycott provided evidence of the effectiveness of nonviolent direct action and established the technique as a major tactic of the Civil Rights movement.

Seeking to expand the use of nonviolent direct action, King and approximately 60 other black leaders from 10 southern states met in Atlanta on January 10–11, 1957, and formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). At a meeting in New Orleans the following month, King became the founding president of SCLC.

In March 1957, King traveled to Ghana at the invitation of Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah to attend the ceremonies celebrating that country's independence. There, he met Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, with whom he established a cordial relationship. Nixon invited King to visit him in Washington.

Upon his return from Ghana, King and other civil rights leaders organized a Prayer Pilgrimage to Washington, D.C., to demand federal action on school desegregation and voting rights for African Americans. Held on May 17, 1957, the third anniversary of the Brown decision, the Prayer Pilgrimage turned out a much smaller crowd than organizers had expected. Nevertheless, it was the largest civil rights gathering to that time and provided a forum for King's first truly national address. Even though King was still very young and new to national leadership, and despite the presence of established civil rights leaders, such as ROY WILKINS of the NAACP, A. PHILIP RANDOLPH of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and James Farmer of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), as well as black celebrities, including Jackie Robinson, Sammy Davis, Jr., and Harry Belafonte, King's address dominated the event. Speaking to the crowd of between 15,000 and 25,000 demonstrators, King urged the federal government, northern white liberals, and southern moderates to take stronger action on behalf of civil rights. He stressed, first and foremost, the importance of the right to vote. His repeated call to "Give us the ballot" elicited enthusiastic responses from the audience. Ebony magazine proclaimed that King "emerged from the Pilgrimage as the No. 1 Negro leader of men."

Following up on the invitation Nixon had extended in Ghana, King, accompanied by Ralph Abernathy, met with the vice president and Secretary of Labor JAMES P. MITCHELL on June 13, 1957. King asked that Eisenhower make a speech in the South calling for compliance with the Supreme Court's ruling on school segregation and enforcement of black voting rights. If Eisenhower did not give such a speech, King urged Nixon to do so. Nixon replied that he might convene a meeting of the President's Committee on Government Contracts in the South. Nixon became so involved in a discussion of the administration's pending civil rights bill that he lost track of the time. The meeting lasted over two hours.

A year later, King was one of a group of black leaders who met with Eisenhower. The meeting, held on June 23, 1958, also included Randolph, Wilkins, and Lester Granger of the National Urban League. Randolph began by reading a prepared statement that included nine recommendations. King spoke next; he emphasized the power of moral leadership and specifically argued for a presidential pronouncement and a White House conference on race, both of which were included in Randolph's nine points. While the meeting produced little in the way of concrete gains, it further established King's place among civil rights leaders.

In September 1958, the publication of King's book, Stride toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story, contributed still further to King's prominence as a national civil rights leader. On September 20, while autographing copies of the book at a department store in Harlem, an apparently insane woman stabbed him in the chest. He recovered from the injury and was released from the hospital on October 3.

Following the Prayer Pilgrimage, King and SCLC undertook a voter registration campaign, but, unlike the NAACP, SCLC did not have the resources to mount effective campaigns at the local level. In addition, King was not an especially gifted organizer or administrator. Before 1960, SCLC lacked a clearly defined strategy. Perhaps King's most significant activity in the last years of the 1950s was his deepening study of nonviolence. In February 1959, he traveled to India at the invitation of the Gandhian National Memorial Fund. King met with Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru as well as students and followers of Gandhian nonviolent resistance. The trip solidified King's commitment to nonviolence, which for him became the one valid method of social change.

In January 1960, King and his family moved to Atlanta, where the SCLC had established its headquarters, and became co-pastor, with his father, of the Ebenezer Baptist Church. Soon after his arrival in Atlanta, the student-led lunch counter sit-ins spread throughout the South and gave new impetus to the southern Civil Rights movement. The SCLC sponsored a meeting of leaders of the sit-ins at Shaw University in Raleigh, N.C., in April 1960.

That meeting led to the formation of a new group, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

In October 1960, King was arrested in DeKalb County, Ga., for allegedly violating his probation by driving without a valid license, and he received a sentence of four months in a rural penal camp. On October 26, the Democratic candidate for the presidency, Sen. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), called King's wife to express his concern. A call from the candidate's brother, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, helped persuade the judge to grant bail. Although many historians have credited the incident with increasing the black vote for Kennedy in November, some recent research has questioned the incident's actual impact on black voting.

By 1960, King had emerged as a national symbol of the southern struggle for civil rights and the leading exponent of nonviolent direct action, which became the primary tactic of black protest in the early 1960s. Beginning with the sit-ins and the formation of SNCC, King often functioned as a mediator between increasingly militant student activists and more cautious national civil rights leaders. He also served as perhaps the primary channel of communication between black and white Americans.

King's tactical differences with SNCC surfaced in the course of a protest campaign, originally organized by SNCC, in Albany, Ga., during 1961 and 1962. Police Chief Laurie Pritchett reined in his police force, and they arrested demonstrators without the public exhibitions of violence that had spurred national outrage in other instances. At the request of the local movement, King came to Albany. After being arrested at demonstrations organized by the Albany Movement, King left jail and ultimately left Albany without achieving a victory. Some activists within the Civil Rights movement began to question his militancy and to challenge the dominant position he held in the movement.

In response to the defeat at Albany, King undertook a campaign in Birmingham, Ala. The demonstrations, organized by SCLC, began in January 1963 and constituted the largest civil rights protest to that time. King's arrest for leading a demonstration on April 12 helped push the Kennedy administration toward intervention in the conflict. While in jail, King wrote a public letter in response to a group of clergymen who had questioned the timing and wisdom of the protests. The "Letter from a Birmingham Jail" became one of King's most widely known statements.

King's leadership of the Civil Rights movement reached its peak in 1963. After the successful campaign in Birmingham, he gave his famous "I Have a Dream" speech in August at the March on Washington. At the end of 1963, Time magazine named him its man of the year. Such recognition helped establish King as the preeminent civil rights leader of his day, but it also provoked a hostile response from J. EDGAR HOOVER, the director of the FBI. With the approval of Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and President John F. Kennedy, Hoover established extensive electronic surveillance of King's activities. That surveillance recorded a number of King's numerous extramarital affairs. Although Hoover regarded him as a dangerous radical, King was, in fact, a moderating force in a movement splintering under pressure from more militant black separatists and black nationalists. By this time, King had become an international figure, and he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in December 1964.

In early 1965, King and SCLC chose Selma, Ala., as the stage for protests designed to dramatize the need for federal enforcement of black voting rights. Several demonstrations encountered violent reactions from Sheriff Jim Clark's police force. On Sunday, March 7, John Lewis and Hosea Williams led a march from Selma to Montgomery, the state capital. After the marchers crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge at the edge of the city, state troopers and mounted sheriff's deputies attacked them. Television cameras recorded the savage attack on the peaceful protestors. King, who was in Atlanta at the time of the march, returned to Selma and called for another demonstration on March 9, but a federal district judge issued an order prohibiting it. Officials from the Community Relations Service, after negotiating with King and local authorities, brokered a compromise whereby the marchers would cross the bridge, stop when met by police, and return to Selma. King led the march to the appointed point, stopped and prayed, and ordered the marchers to return to Selma. That decision, made without consulting SNCC's staff members, served further to alienate SNCC from King and SCLC. The Civil Rights movement had begun to splinter, and King no longer served as a unifying figure.

After the events at Selma helped to spur enactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, King turned his attention to the problems of the ghettos in the North. In 1966, he led a campaign in Chicago to protest job discrimination, poor schools, and poor housing. The protests encountered opposition from Mayor RICHARD J. DALEY's powerful political machine and violence from white ethnic communities. In addition, the campaign was marred by violence from black youth gangs.

King came out publicly against the war in Vietnam in 1967, which caused the FBI to intensify its attempts to undermine him. The following year, King called for a Poor People's Campaign in Washington, but before it got under way, he was assassinated on April 4, 1968, in Memphis, Tenn., where he had come to support a strike by black sanitation workers.

Kinsey, Alfred C(harles) (1894–1956) scientist

Alfred Kinsey was born in Hoboken, N.J., on June 23, 1894. After taking a B.S. (magna cum laude) from Bowdoin College in 1916, Kinsey entered the graduate program in applied biology at Harvard, where he served as an instructor in zoology in 1917 and 1918 and an instructor in botany in 1918 and 1919. He was a Sheldon traveling fellow in 1919 and 1920, during which time he worked on a study of gall wasps for his doctoral dissertation. Upon completing his Sc.D. in entomology in 1920, he accepted an appointment as an assistant professor at Indiana University. Over the next 18 years, the zoology professor earned a reputation as a leading authority on the gall wasp and a successful author of high school biology textbooks (his Introduction to Biology and its subsequent editions sold half a million copies). He became an associate professor in 1922 and a full professor in 1929.

After students objected to the "health and hygiene" course taught at Indiana University, Kinsey volunteered in 1938 to develop a sex-education course based on a scientific approach. When teaching the course, he maintained a clinical attitude but nonetheless issued thundering denunciations of sexually repressive laws and attitudes. He also became increasingly concerned with the lack of scientific knowledge regarding human sexual behavior. Kinsey later recalled that he “was struck by the fact that a large area of living had not been studied on a broad objective basis,” and he “started out to do so.” He developed a fluidly structured questionnaire covering a variety of topics. (The final version consisted of between 300 and 521 separate items, depending on the number and variety of the respondent’s sexual experiences.) In July 1938, Kinsey administered the first survey to students. In an effort to expand his statistical base, he went to big cities, especially Chicago, where he interviewed large numbers of prostitutes, homosexuals, and other people. Kinsey’s work generated powerful opposition, and, under growing pressure from various sources, Kinsey stopped teaching the course, but he continued his interviews.

Up to this point, he financed his investigations with his own resources. In 1940, he received a grant from the National Research Council. Later, through the NRC, Kinsey received a grant of $40,000 a year for at least three years by the Rockefeller Foundation for his new Institute for Sex Research, which was affiliated with Indiana University. The grant enabled the Institute for Sex Research to expand its interviewing of volunteer subjects and to compile the data from those interviews into a variety of statistical categories. The information was recorded in a code devised by Kinsey and known only to him and his top assistants.

In 1948, Kinsey published Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, an 804-page report published by W. B. Saunders Company, a publisher of medical books. Based on interviews with 5,300 white males of different cultural, occupational, and economic groups, the study recorded physical, social, and economic data relating to the subjects; in addition, it documented their marital histories, sex education, nocturnal dreams, masturbation, animal contacts, heterosexual experiences, and homosexual experiences. Many of the report’s conclusions contradicted popularly believed, or at least tacitly accepted, ideas about human sexuality. The study observed a correspondence between the sex habits of individuals and the social, educational, and religious groups to which the individual belonged. For instance, Kinsey found that lower classes preferred more direct, genital sexuality.

The fundamental conclusion of the study was that American males found numerous and varied “outlets” for their sexuality and that the sexual practices of American males conflicted with existing laws, conventions, and moral codes. The report estimated that 90 percent of the male population practiced masturbation, even though many religious leaders, educators, and parents denounced it as immoral. The study further indicated that 85 percent of males had engaged in premarital intercourse, between 30 percent and 45 percent had engaged in extramarital intercourse, and that 70 percent had patronized prostitutes. According to Kinsey’s statistics, 37 percent of males had engaged in homosexual contact to the point of orgasm at least once and that 17 percent of farm boys had sexual relations with animals. These figures varied according to age group and social class. Kinsey passed no judgment on these practices; he regarded sexual expression as biologically normal in whatever form it took.

The Kinsey Report, as it became known, became a best seller. The heavy tome sold 200,000 hardback copies in two months. Kinsey used the royalties to help fund the Institute, which also received increased funding from the Rockefeller Foundation. The new resources enabled Kinsey to hire and train a team of researchers to conduct more interviews.

Sexual Behavior in the Human Male created something of a furor. Some readers attacked Kinsey’s efforts to avoid the social and moral implications of sexual behavior. Margaret Mead wrote, in the New York Times, that Kinsey’s impersonal handling of the subject was “extraordinarily destructive of interpsychic and interpersonal relationships.” Others criticized the soundness of his sampling methods. For instance, critics argued that Kinsey’s use of prisoners distorted his sample.

The controversy surrounding the publication of the first study, however, paled beside the firestorm that erupted following the publication of the second study, Sexual Behavior in the Human Female, in 1953. Based on interviews with 5,940 white female volunteers dating back to 1938, the 842-page study found that the range of variation among females exceeded the range of variation among males. It further found that the sexual behavior of women was not so conditioned by the attitudes of the social groups to which they belonged as that of males. Kinsey's team found no basic differences in the physiological nature of male and female orgasms, but they did perceive differences in responsiveness to psychosexual stimuli. The report also found that "frigidity" occurred less frequently in females than previously supposed, and it concluded that an absence of orgasm in females generally resulted from insensitivity on the part of the woman's partner and not from physical malfunction. Kinsey found a somewhat lower incidence of masturbation, homosexuality, and extramarital intercourse in females than in males; still, he found that 62 percent had masturbated, 90 percent had petted before marriage, nearly half had engaged in sexual intercourse before marriage (apparently most with their future husbands), 26 percent had engaged in extramarital intercourse, and 13 percent had at least one homosexual experience that resulted in orgasm. He argued that such activities should be viewed as common and normal in a biological sense.

America's most famed theologian, REINHOLD NIEBUHR, denounced Kinsey's "naturalism" and his "moral anarchism." Representative Louis B. Heller (D-N.Y.) accused Kinsey of "hurling the insult of the century against our mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters." The House Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations, created in 1953, opened hearings in May 1954 on alleged improper awarding of funds by American foundations. One focus of the investigation was the Rockefeller Foundation.

Dating back to the publication of Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, Kinsey also faced criticism from within the scientific community. Many challenged Kinsey's assumption that his sample constituted a representative one. The Rockefeller Foundation named a team of prominent statisticians in 1951 to review Kinsey's data and sampling technique. While the final report generally supported Kinsey's work, it did insist that he improve his sampling methodology. An infuriated Kinsey rejected their recommendations, and, soon after Sexual Behavior in the Human Female was published, the Rockefeller Foundation ended its funding for the institute.

James H. Jones, a historian who has also written about the notorious Tuskegee experiment, published an exhaustive biography of Kinsey in 1997. Drawing on the Kinsey Institute archives and interviews with Kinsey's friends, former students, and colleagues, Jones found that Kinsey had engaged in extreme acts of sadomasochism and other unusual sexual practices from his teens until nearly the time he died. Kinsey also organized, participated in, and in some instances filmed various sexual activities involving interview subjects, colleagues (and their spouses), and prostitutes. The Kinsey who emerged from Jones's study was less an objective scientist than an impassioned advocate of more liberated sexuality, who set out to slay his own sexual dragons as well as what he regarded as the repressive norms of society.

Although plagued by heart trouble, Kinsey continued to work at a frantic pace after the publication of Sexual Behavior in the Human Female. His plans included a volume on homosexuality and one comparing the sex laws of the various states. He conducted his 7,985th interview on May 24, 1956; it turned out to be his last. Kinsey suffered a heart attack on June 1, 1956, which impaired even his legendary capacity for work. Ill with pneumonia that made his heart condition worse, he died of an embolism on August 25, 1956, in Bloomington, Ind.

Kirk, Russell (Amos)

(1918–1994) political writer

The son of a railroad engineer, Kirk was born in Plymouth, Mich., on October 19, 1918. He grew up in a small town in Michigan's "stump country," a depressed agricultural area that timber companies had stripped of trees at the turn of the 20th century. As a youth, he embraced his parents' fear that the "assembly-line civilization" represented by Henry Ford would destroy his region's traditional family-oriented way of life. He entered Michigan State College (later University) on a scholarship in 1936. His experience in college confirmed his conservative tendencies. Brought up to revere traditional literary disciplines, he found the emphasis on technical skills at Michigan State completely unsatisfying, and he described the school as “an institution where humane learning was barely tolerated.” Years later, he recalled that he refused to get a job while in college, a decision that forced him to subsist on peanut butter and crackers, so that he had time to read the classics that could not be found in the curriculum. He received his B.A. in 1940 and earned an M.A. from Duke University in 1941.

Kirk was drafted into the army in 1942 and stationed in Utah as a sergeant in the Chemical Warfare Service. His assignment left him with considerable free time to pursue his reading. Moreover, his observation of military inefficiency and governmental bureaucracy reinforced his conservative leanings. He also developed the Catholic sacramental vision that so profoundly influenced his political ideas.

In 1946, while still serving in the army, Kirk wrote an article attacking peacetime conscription. He feared that the New Dealers would seek to perpetuate a wartime economy by provoking a conflict with the Soviet Union. He also wrote articles on education, the humanities, and the conservative tradition. After leaving the army in 1946, Kirk taught at Michigan State. He took his doctorate at Saint Andrews University in Scotland in 1952. During his travels in Europe, he observed the disruption of deep traditions by the policies of liberal governments and the destruction of beautiful ancient buildings to make way for uniform, concrete housing projects, all of which influenced his dissertation on the Anglo-American conservative intellectual tradition.

In 1953, his dissertation was published as The Conservative Mind: From Burke to Santayana. Arguing against the then-common contention that the liberal tradition defined the American experience, Kirk identified within American political thought a conservative intellectual tradition, which traced its roots to Edmund Burke and in America was personified by John Adams, James Fenimore Cooper, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Herman Melville, John C. Calhoun, Henry Adams, and George Santayana. The book defended the values of tradition, authority, and community against the liberal faith in reason, equality, and individualism. Kirk defined conservatism as a body of belief that accepted social hierarchy as essential to the proper ordering of society and embraced traditional morality. Conservatives, he wrote, believed “that a divine intent rules society as well as conscience, forging an eternal chain of right and duty which links great and obscure, living and dead.” In addition, he elaborated, “Civilized society requires orders and classes. The only true equality is moral equality.” Also essential to conservative thought was the “persuasion that property and freedom are inseparably connected, and that economic levelling is not economic progress.” The book was widely and favorably reviewed; it drew praise even from liberals. By identifying a conservative intellectual tradition in America, Kirk provided a basis around which conservatives could build a movement. Along with FRIEDRICH HAYEK’s The Road to Serfdom, WHITTAKER CHAMBERS’s Witness, and WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY’s God and Man at Yale, The Conservative Mind became one of the founding documents of modern conservatism.

As a consequence of the book’s reception, Kirk found himself in the unexpected position of founder of a movement. The so-called new conservatives, many of whom were academics, distinguished themselves from other conservatives by their emphasis on tradition and community rather than on untrammelled economic freedom. Kirk’s political philosophy rejected the elevation of humans to a status “only a little lower than the angels” with the “power to become godlike,” which he traced back to the Renaissance and the Enlightenment. Kirk disdained “the strutting Rationalism of the Enlightenment,” with its emphasis on “the doctrines of progress, rationality, secularism, and political reform.” In contrast to pride and preoccupation with the self, Kirk posited “culture,” which he defined as “the elevation of character which distinguishes the civilized man from the brute.” Specifically, he found an alternative to the pride of the Renaissance and Enlightenment in awe, humility, and reverence for classical and biblical ideas, which led to a quest for “the well-ordered commonwealth” of Plato through the “moral imagination” of Edmund Burke. According to Kirk, Plato taught “men how to bring their souls into harmony with divine order.”

In 1954, Kirk published A Program for Conservatives, which focused on the role of conservatives in the contemporary world. By arguing that conservatism embraced family, church, and community rather than free enterprise and unfettered individualism, the book sparked a debate among conservatives between traditionalists and libertarians and led to a series of confrontations between Kirk and AYN RAND. Kirk rejected Rand's philosophy of "objectivism," which held that altruism was an illusion and that people should be concerned with their self-interest. In contrast, he maintained that "we human beings were made for brotherhood, and if we live only for our own petty little selves, our souls shrivel." His disagreement with libertarians led him to request the removal of his name from the masthead of William F. Buckley's magazine, the National Review, for which he had written since its founding in 1955. Kirk nevertheless continued to contribute his monthly column, "From the Academy," to the magazine until 1980.

In a number of books and articles he wrote throughout the 1950s, Kirk expressed his opposition to the tumult and spiritual vacuity of a mechanized age. He idealized small family businesses over corporate enterprises, dismissed the proposal to develop a project for landing on the Moon as both useless and impossible to carry out, and insisted that poverty was not a bad thing unless combined with the ugliness of modern urban slums and the degradation of modern social welfare programs. At the same time, Kirk rejected the radical right of the 1950s. He once called Robert Welch, the founder of the John Birch Society, a "likable, honest, courageous, energetic man," who was the "kiss of death" for conservatism because of his "silliness and injustice of utterance."

Kirk accepted a part-time position as research professor of politics at Long Island University in 1956. Limited to two months a year, the job effectively released him from those duties in the university he had always found distasteful. Thereafter, he spent most of his time carrying out his functions as justice of the peace in Mecosta, Mich. (population 200), delivering lectures throughout the country, and writing. He served as founding editor of a critical journal, Modern Age: A Conservative Review, from 1957 to 1959. In 1960, he founded The University Bookman, an educational quarterly, and edited the journal from its inception until his death in 1994. Above all, Kirk wrote prodigiously. For 13 years, he wrote a newspaper column for the Los Angeles Times syndicate. His books include Randolph of Roanoke (1951), Confessions of a Bohemian Tory (1963), Enemies of Permanent Things (1969), Eliot and His Age (1971), The Roots of American Order (1974), and Reclaiming a Patrimony (1982).

Kirk died of congestive heart failure in Mecosta on April 29, 1994.

Kissinger, Henry A(Ifred)

(1923–) foreign and military policy adviser

The son of middle-class Jews, Heinz Kissinger was born in Fürth, Germany, on May 27, 1923. His family left Germany in 1938 to escape Nazi persecution and settled in New York City. Upon his arrival in New York, Kissinger adopted the name Henry; he took evening courses in accounting at the City College of New York and became a citizen of the United States in 1943. Kissinger served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1946 as an infantryman, intelligence specialist, and military administrator in occupied Germany. After leaving the military, he attended Harvard University, where he earned a B.A. summa cum laude in 1950, his M.A. in 1952, and his Ph.D. in 1954. Upon completing his doctorate, he became a member of the faculty at Harvard. Kissinger's first major article on national security appeared in the April 1955 issue of Foreign Affairs, a publication of the Council on Foreign Relations. In it, he criticized the Eisenhower administration's "New Look," which emphasized air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent over conventional forces. The policy intended in part to avoid another Korean War and in part to reduce defense expenditures. Kissinger, however, contended that the threat of nuclear retaliation no longer provided a credible deterrent to Soviet aggression, particularly in areas peripheral to U.S. interests. "As Soviet nuclear strength increases," he wrote, "the number of areas that will seem worth the destruction of New York, Detroit, or Chicago will steadily diminish." The article led to an offer to be staff director of a study, sponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations, on the consequences of nuclear weapons for American foreign policy. The job included writing a book after the study was completed. Kissinger took leave from Harvard and began his work for the Council on Foreign Relations in 1955.

In 1957, Kissinger published his dissertation, a study of European diplomacy after the Napoleonic wars, as A World Restored: Metternich, Castlereagh, and the Problems of Peace, 1812–1822. The work focused on the structure of peace created by Castlereagh and Metternich in an era when the forces of revolution and nationalism threatened to disrupt the status quo. Kissinger respected Metternich's ability to establish "stability." "Whenever peace—conceived as the avoidance of war—has been the primary objective of a power or a group of powers," wrote Kissinger, "the international system has been at the mercy of the most ruthless member of the international community." Kissinger maintained that stability, rather than peace, should be the primary goal of diplomacy. "Stability," he argued, "reflects, not the absence of unsatisfied claims, but the absence of a grievance of such magnitude that redress will be sought in overturning the settlement rather than through an adjustment within its framework." However, maintaining stability, Kissinger contended, required not only balancing the claims of various states but "arrang[ing] the balance of forces as to deter aggression produced by causes other than the conditions of the settlement." The diplomacy of Metternich and Castlereagh "may not have fulfilled all the hopes of an idealistic generation," concluded Kissinger, "but it gave this generation something perhaps more precious: a period of stability which permitted their hopes to be realized without a major war or a permanent revolution."

The same year as A World Restored came out, Kissinger published Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy, the product of his work for the Council on Foreign Relations. The book began with the premise that the Soviet Union was an expansionist power dedicated to worldwide revolution and subverting American interests. From there, it considered the various approaches to containing Soviet aggression. Kissinger again criticized the Eisenhower administration's New Look defense policy that relied on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent to prevent a Soviet attack and to contain Soviet expansionism. As Kissinger saw it, the United States, since World War II, responded to the cold war with a "flight into technology," devising "ever more fearful weapons." But technology did not solve the problem, according to Kissinger; rather, it presented a dilemma: "The more powerful the weapons, . . . the greater becomes the reluctance to use them." Kissinger argued that a heavy reliance on nuclear weapons would not deter the Soviet Union, since no one believed that the United States would launch a nuclear strike, thereby risking retaliation on its own cities, to achieve a minor objective. Not only did such a defense posture fail to deter the Soviets, but it alarmed America's allies, who worried that the United States had become an undependable ally. Setting aside threats to minor interests, they questioned whether the United States would launch a nuclear strike and risk retaliation on its own cities to save even Bonn or Paris. The New Look derived, in part, according to Kissinger, out of an outmoded notion of unconditional surrender. Given the horrible destructive power of nuclear weapons and the Soviet possession of such weapons, nuclear war became unthinkable. Therefore, the only plausible wars would be those fought for limited, essentially political, objectives. To fight such wars, the United States needed a "spectrum of capabilities," ranging from conventional forces to the capacity to wage total nuclear war to provide the maximum credible threat to aggression. The ultimate purpose was to prevent all-out nuclear war, and therefore, in addition to strategic nuclear weapons, the United States needed adequate conventional forces, the capability to fight a limited nuclear war, and a doctrine to govern American responses to various forms of aggression. The book had enormous impact.

In 1956, midway through his book for the Council on Foreign Relations, Kissinger accepted an offer from NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER to direct a Special Studies Project of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund. The Special Studies Project gathered prominent Americans to examine America's future foreign and domestic problems. Kissinger participated in all the panels and personally wrote the project's final report on international security, issued in 1958 as "International Security: The Military Aspect." The report warned that the Soviets had dramatically improved their technological capacity and were approaching military parity with the United States. The panel members urged a national effort to develop a civil defense system and a $3-billion increase in defense spending. They also advocated developing a capability for covert operations. In 1960 Rockefeller based his presidential campaign's approach to security issues on the report.

Kissinger returned to Harvard in 1957; he received tenure in 1959 and became a full professor in the government department in 1962. As associate director of Harvard's Center for International Affairs from 1958 to 1960 and as director of the Defense Studies Program from 1958 to 1959, he established a wide range of contacts with influential policy makers, academics, military officials, and business leaders. He also strengthened his connections with the government. He served as a consultant to the Weapons Systems Evaluation Group of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1955 to 1960.

Kissinger published The Necessity for Choice: Prospects of American Foreign Policy in 1961. He restated his belief that the United States needed to respond to limited challenges with appropriate force levels. At the same time, he backed away from his advocacy of tactical nuclear weapons and emphasized conventional forces. He questioned the prospects for détente with the Soviet Union and recommended increased aid to important noncommunist nations "on the comparative scale of the Marshall Plan."

Kissinger served as an adviser to the Kennedy administration's National Security Council in 1961 and 1962. He was consultant to the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency from 1961 to 1968 and to the State Department from 1965 to 1969. In the latter capacity, he toured South Vietnam.

Kissinger served as assistant for national security affairs for Presidents RICHARD M. NIXON and GERALD FORD from 1969 to 1976 and secretary of state from 1973 to 1977. During the Nixon administration, he helped shape American policy in Vietnam, open contacts with Communist China, establish détente with the Soviet Union, and initiate peace talks in the Middle East. Kissinger developed a policy of warmer relations with the Soviet Union and began negotiations for the limitation of strategic arms (Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, or SALT). Those talks resulted in the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty in 1972. He engineered a rapprochement between the United States and the Peoples Republic of China that led to the first official contacts between the two countries since the Communists took power in 1949. Kissinger negotiated a cease-fire agreement providing for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam in January 1973, for which he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1973 jointly with the chief North Vietnamese negotiator, Le Duc Tho. After the Arab-Israeli War of 1973, Kissinger engaged in shuttle diplomacy to bring about a disengagement of forces. Ultimately, his efforts led to a historic agreement between Israel and Egypt in 1975.

After leaving government service, he founded Kissinger Associates, an international consulting firm, of which he is chairman. He has continued to write and speak, particularly on matters relating to foreign policy. President Ronald W. Reagan appointed him to head a national commission on Central America. Kissinger's books include The Troubled Partnership: A Reappraisal of the Atlantic Alliance (1965), American Foreign Policy (1969), The White House Years (1979), For the Record (1981), Years of Upheaval (1982), and Years of Renewal (1999).

Kistiakowsky, George B(ogdan)

(1900–1982) president's special assistant for science and technology

Born in Kiev, Ukraine (then part of Russia), on November 18, 1900, Kistiakowsky grew up in the Ukraine, where his father was a professor of law at the University of Kiev. Kistiakowsky attended private schools in Kiev and Moscow until the Russian Revolution of 1917, after which he joined the White Army and fought against the Bolsheviks. In 1919, Kistiakowsky fled to Yugoslavia and spent a year in the Balkans and Turkey. Ultimately, he made his way to Germany, where he entered the University of Berlin in 1920. After quickly completing his undergraduate work, he earned a doctorate in chemistry in 1925. The following year, he came to the United States to take up a two-year fellowship at Princeton University. He published a monograph, "Photochemical Processes," in 1927, and became an assistant professor at Princeton in 1928. At the invitation of JAMES B. CONANT, then chair of the chemistry department at Harvard University, Kistiakowsky took up a position as an assistant professor in 1930. Concentrating in the field of physical chemistry, in particular chemical kinetics, he published prolifically. He became a U.S. citizen in 1933 and advanced to associate professor that same year. In 1937, he became Abbott and James Lawrence professor of chemistry. He remained at Harvard for the rest of his career, during which he produced over 150 articles.

After World War II broke out in Europe, President Franklin D. Roosevelt established the National Defense Research Committee to provide scientific information to military leaders. Conant, by then president of Harvard, headed the chemistry division, and he appointed Kistiakowsky to lead its explosives unit. In 1944, Kistiakowsky became leader of the explosives division of the Manhattan Project. In that capacity, he oversaw the development of the conventional explosive device that triggered the first atomic bomb. When the war ended, Kistiakowsky returned to Harvard and served as chair of the chemistry department from 1947 to 1950.

In 1953, Kistiakowsky became a member of the Defense Department's ballistic missiles advisory committee, a position he held until 1958. In 1954, he urged that priority be given to the development of an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM). Eisenhower appointed him to the President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC) in 1957. The following year, he participated in a conference with representatives of the USSR, held in Geneva, Switzerland, the purpose of which was to reduce the danger of a surprise attack. When JAMES R. KILLIAN, JR. resigned as the special assistant to the president for science and technology in 1959, Eisenhower appointed Kistiakowsky to replace him. Kistiakowsky took leave from Harvard to accept the appointment. As the president's science adviser, he chaired meetings of the PSAC, participated in the National Aeronautics and Space Council (NASC) and the National Security Council, and coordinated scientific matters of interest to the government. He advised the president on new weapons programs, on nuclear arms control, and on proposals to stop the testing of nuclear weapons.

A fiscal and political conservative, Kistiakowsky opposed the high defense budgets submitted by the Defense Department and NASC but urged spending for basic research. He was in accord with the Eisenhower administration's position that space exploration was less a matter of national prestige than of scientific progress. Consequently, he played down the importance of spectacular manned space missions and emphasized instead the development of unmanned probes.

Kistiakowsky supported Eisenhower's emphasis on the nuclear deterrent as America's first line of defense but also backed the administration's efforts to achieve a limited test ban treaty with the USSR. While he maintained that the United States needed to continue a limited degree of testing in order to develop a "clean bomb" (one that would produce lower levels of radioactive fallout), he did not believe it necessary to create a more destructive nuclear arsenal. To critics who argued that the Soviets would violate a test ban, Kistiakowsky replied that scientific research was close to producing seismic indicators sensitive enough to detect any possible violations by the Soviet Union. When the ongoing talks with the Soviets in Geneva broke down, Eisenhower announced that the United States would not resume testing and would provide notification of any intention to resume testing.

Although the government focused primarily on the physical sciences throughout the 1950s, under Kistiakowsky's leadership, the PSAC organized a life sciences panel in January 1960. Kistiakowsky added a panel on carcinogenic chemical additives in food after the disclosure that the cranberry crop in 1959 had been contaminated by an herbicide that likely had carcinogenic effects. As a result of the crisis, the powers of the Food and Drug Administration were expanded.

After JOHN F. KENNEDY's inauguration in 1961, Kistiakowsky handed over his duties as science adviser to Jerome Wiesner. After 1960, he devoted himself principally to his work at Harvard. Nevertheless, Kistiakowsky continued to serve on the PSAC through 1963. He also served on the advisory board of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency from 1962 to 1969. In 1968, he severed his connections with the Pentagon to protest the U.S. involvement in Vietnam. Kistiakowsky served as vice president of the National Academy of Sciences from 1965 to 1972. He became professor emeritus in 1971. Even after his retirement, Kistiakowsky continued to play an active role in debates over nuclear policy. In 1977, he became chair of the Council for a Livable World, an organization dedicated to reducing nuclear armaments and preventing nuclear war. He publicly criticized the allocation of federal resources to defense and to the space program instead of to civilian technology programs. When he worked at the White House, he kept a diary, which he published in 1976 as A Scientist at the White House. He died in Cambridge, Mass., on December 7, 1982.

Knight, Goodwin (Jess)

(1896–1970) governor of California

The descendent of early Western settlers, Knight was born in Provo, Utah, on December 9, 1896. He moved with his family to Los Angeles at the age of eight. He attended public schools. During his youth, he wrote a collection of boys' stories published in 1910. Knight worked as a grocery clerk, miner, and newspaper reporter before entering Stanford University. He withdrew from Stanford to serve in the navy during World War I, after which he returned to Stanford and graduated in 1919. He studied political science at Cornell University from 1919 to 1920. After gaining admission to the California bar in 1921, Knight commenced the practice of law in Los Angeles. He became active in Republican politics and took part in Hiram Johnson's campaign for the presidential nomination in 1920 and 1924. Knight was appointed to fill an unexpired term as judge of the superior court of Los Angeles Co. in 1935; he won election to the bench in 1936, where he served until 1946. He gained publicity for his handling of weddings and divorces for Hollywood actors. Knight garnered more publicity by hosting radio talk shows in Los Angeles and San Francisco. Possessed of an affable personality, Knight made effective use of radio, and later television, to further his political career.

In 1944, he sought the Republican nomination to the U.S. Senate but withdrew early and backed Fred Houser. Running with Gov. EARL WARREN at the top of the ticket, Knight won election as lieutenant governor in 1946. Despite his earlier support for Hiram Johnson, Knight had strong ties to the state Republican party's right wing and often disagreed with Warren's more progressive policies. He opposed the governor's advocacy of prepaid health insurance and a fair-employment practices bill. Unlike Warren, he supported a loyalty oath for professors in the University of California system. Nevertheless, he ran with Warren again in 1950 and won reelection.

In September 1953, Warren announced that he would not seek a fourth term, and Knight immediately declared his candidacy. The next month, Knight succeeded to the governorship when Warren resigned upon being appointed chief justice of the United States. Conservatives in California welcomed Knight's accession, and the new governor promised to "conduct a business-like administration with emphasis on reducing spending." However, he proved a more liberal governor than most observers had predicted and conservatives had hoped. Indeed, his policies proved very similar to those of Warren. To cope with California's rapidly growing population, Knight supported highway programs, rapid transit systems for metropolitan areas, and development of water resources. He increased state aid for the disabled, higher education, mental health, and unemployment compensation. In October 1954, he announced the allocation of $100,000 to study health problems caused by smog. Knight also announced that he would veto any "right-to-work" legislation. At the same time, he maintained his position as a fervent anticommunist. The governor's attempts to placate both sides of the political spectrum proved effective; in particular, his gestures toward organized labor reaped rewards. With the strong backing of the American Federation of Labor, he won election to a full term in 1954 by more than 550,000 votes over the Democratic candidate, Richard Graves.

Although the titular head of the California Republican Party, Knight struggled for control with Vice President RICHARD NIXON and the archconservative Sen. WILLIAM KNOWLAND. In 1954 Knight and Knowland joined forces to gain control of the California Republican Party. The battle heated up in 1955, as the factions struggled for leadership positions going into the elections of 1956. Nixon suffered a resounding defeat when the faction led by Knight and Knowland not only won the chairmanship of the state party but the vice-chairmanship (the vice-chairman automatically became chairman the following year, which, in this case, was an election year). In October 1955, Knight announced that he would enter the 1956 Republican National Convention as a "favorite son" candidate should President Eisenhower decide not to run. In effect, this challenged Nixon's claim as Eisenhower's successor. Throughout early 1956, Knight withheld his endorsement of Nixon for a second term as vice president, and at the convention in August, he was one of the principal opponents of Nixon's renomination. With Knowland's help, Nixon fought off the challenge.

In January 1957, Knowland announced that he planned to give up his seat in the Senate; before long, it became clear that he planned to run against Knight for the gubernatorial nomination in 1958. Knight and Knowland engaged in a bitter campaign, marked by their disagreement over right-to-work laws, which Knowland supported. By November 1957, Knight, who was trailing badly in the polls and short of money, met with Eisenhower and Nixon. After the meeting, Knight announced that he was withdrawing from the race for governor and would instead seek the seat in the Senate vacated by Knowland. The aura of a backroom deal plagued both Knowland and Knight until election day.

Knight then encountered stiff opposition in the Republican primary from George Christopher, the mayor of San Francisco. Knight and Knowland won their primaries, but Knight once again stirred up internecine warfare when he refused to endorse Knowland. The bitter divisions in the party led to a disaster at the polls in 1958. Although some labor leaders supported him, Knight lost to Rep. CLAIR ENGLE (D-Calif.) by almost three-quarters of a million votes. Knowland lost to the Democratic attorney general, EDMUND (PAT) BROWN.

After his tenure as governor, Knight became a television news commentator in Los Angeles. He planned to run for governor again in 1962, but a case of hepatitis forced him to withdraw from the race for the Republican nomination in January. Subsequently, Knight became chairman of the board of the Imperial Bank of Los Angeles. He endorsed NELSON ROCKEFELLER for the presidential nomination in 1964 and briefly considered seeking the governorship in 1966. He died of pneumonia on May 22, 1970, in Inglewood, Calif.

Knowland, William F(ife)

(1908–1974) U.S. senator, Senate majority leader, Senate minority leader

The son of a newspaper publisher and a six-term member of the House of Representatives, Knowland was born in Alameda, Calif., on June 26, 1908. At the age of 12, he made speeches for presidential candidate Warren G. Harding. Knowland graduated from the University of California in 1929, after which he joined the staff of his father's paper, the Oakland Tribune. He won election as a Republican to the state assembly in 1932. Two years later, he won a seat in the state senate. Already a rising star in California politics, he became a member of the Republican National Committee in 1938 and was elected to chair its executive committee in 1941.

Drafted into the army in 1942, Knowland went to Officer Candidate School and rose to the rank of major. He was serving in Europe when, in 1945, Gov. EARL WARREN appointed him to fill the unexpired term of the recently deceased Sen. Hiram Johnson (R-Calif.). The army discharged him so that he could take up the appointment, upon which Knowland returned to the United States and assumed his duties as a senator. He won election in his own right the following year and rapidly emerged as a leader of the conservative wing of the Republican party. From his arrival in the Senate, Knowland established a reputation for fervent anti-communism and for equally passionate support of Nationalist China.

Knowland frequently clashed with the Truman administration. In 1947, he supported the Taft-Hartley bill, which outlawed the closed shop and secondary boycotts, gave the president authority to impose an 80-day "cooling off" period to prevent strikes that threatened the national interest, forbade union contributions to political parties, and required unions to submit annual financial reports to the secretary of labor. Knowland helped mobilize the votes to override Truman's veto. He also supported the Tidelands Oil Bill of 1946, which would have vested in the states control of submerged lands off their coasts, including offshore oil deposits. Truman vetoed the measure.

On other issues, however, Knowland took less conservative positions. He voted for the Full Employment Act of 1945 and supported civil rights legislation. Moreover, in an era when southern senators frequently used the filibuster or the threat of a filibuster to thwart liberal legislation, Knowland in 1947 offered a bill to invoke cloture by a majority vote rather than the traditional two-thirds.

In foreign policy, Knowland became a leader of the so-called China Lobby, an informal group of people inside and outside of government who decried the “loss” of China to the Communists in 1949 and supported the return of Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) and the Nationalists from Taiwan (Formosa). Knowland criticized the State Department’s white paper on China, which placed blame for the fall of China to the Communists on the corruption and incompetence of the Nationalists, as a “whitewash” of a “do-nothing policy.” His preoccupation with China prompted some critics to dub him “the senator from Formosa.” He did, however, break with most of his colleagues on the Republican right to support Truman’s plan to provide aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947 in an effort to thwart communist insurgencies in those countries.

Knowland initially supported Truman's decision to intervene in Korea, but he soon joined Gen. Douglas MacArthur and other critics of the administration's policies, which, Knowland argued, prevented a military victory. Indeed, the senator became perhaps the most bellicose critic of the administration's handling of the war.

Anticommunism shaped Knowland's domestic policies as well. Even though he disliked Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) carelessness with facts, Knowland nonetheless supported McCarthy's charges that communists had infiltrated the American government. In particular, he backed McCarthy's contention that communist sympathizers in the State Department, such as JOHN PATTON DAVIES, JR., were responsible for the fall of China to the Communists. Even before McCarthy burst on the scene with his spectacular denunciations in February 1950, Knowland charged that Owen Lattimore, an academic expert on China and an adviser to the State Department, advocated "a policy of appeasement" in Asia and espoused the communist party line.

Knowland made the speech nominating Nixon for the vice presidency at the Republican convention in 1952 and won reelection to the Senate later that year. The elections also brought Eisenhower to the White House and gave Republicans control of both houses of Congress. Knowland became chairman of the Republican Policy Committee in 1953 and frequently stood in for the ailing majority leader, ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio. When Taft died in July 1953, Knowland took over as majority leader. Although Knowland adopted liberal positions on some issues, in particular civil rights, his conservative politics often brought him into conflict with the president. Not long after the Californian replaced Taft, Eisenhower remarked that "Knowland is the biggest disappointment I have found since I have been in politics."

In particular, Knowland's strident and inflexible position on China resulted in friction with the administration. Knowland vigorously opposed the admission of mainland China to the United Nations and exerted pressure on the Eisenhower administration to take a firm stand against membership for China. He repeatedly offered a resolution supporting American withdrawal from the United Nations if Communist China were admitted. In April 1954, the Chinese premier, Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai), announced that his country desired peaceful relations with the United States and asked for negotiations on outstanding issues. Knowland warned against "another Munich." Pressure from Knowland and other members of the China Lobby led Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES to announce that the administration opposed the admission of Communist China to the UN. Unappeased, Knowland threatened to resign as majority leader if mainland China gained admission. China was also the focus of Knowland's concern over the Geneva Conference on Indochina and Korea in April 1954. As the administration prepared for the conference, Knowland argued that any negotiation with the Communist Chinese government would be tantamount to recognition. All of this led a frustrated Eisenhower to write to ALFRED M. GRUENTHER, then supreme Allied commander in Europe, that "Knowland has no foreign policy except to develop high blood pressure whenever he mentions the word 'Red China.'" Knowland's persistent pressure, along with that of other members of the China Lobby, nevertheless influenced the administration's policy. Dulles attended the conference only briefly and at one session refused to shake hands with Zhou Enlai. He downgraded the U.S. delegation to the status of observer, and instructed Undersecretary of State WALTER BEDELL SMITH not to take part in the negotiations.

When the Communist Chinese began shelling the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu during the fall of 1954, Knowland advocated a blockade of the Chinese coast. Eisenhower resisted the pressure from the China Lobby and took no military action.

Knowland's support of McCarthy further alienated him from the Eisenhower administration. He opposed a resolution, introduced by Sen. RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.), to strip McCarthy of his committee chairmanships. When Flanders later introduced a motion to censure McCarthy, Knowland successfully moved to have a special committee examine the charges. Contrary to Knowland's intentions, however, the committee unanimously recommended censure. When the majority of the Senate voted in favor of the resolution in December 1954, Knowland voted against it.

Knowland's leadership proved a frequent source of irritation to Eisenhower, and not only because of differences over policy. In fact, despite his frequent disagreements with Eisenhower, as his party's leader Knowland generally supported the administration's domestic policy. However, Knowland demonstrated no particular skill as majority leader. Moreover, after the Democrats won control of both houses of Congress in the elections of 1954, Knowland became minority leader. Never an effective party leader, he proved even less so when leading the minority.

In addition to disagreements over policy, Knowland's ambition led to clashes with Eisenhower, who remarked of Knowland: "It is a pity that his wisdom, his judgment, his tact, and his sense of humor lag so far behind his ambition." In 1956, Knowland announced that he would seek the Republican nomination if Eisenhower decided to retire. Immediately, the senator from California began jockeying for position with his long-time rival, Nixon. When Eisenhower decided to run for a second term, Knowland withdrew from the race.

In January 1957, Knowland announced that he planned to give up his seat in the Senate; before long, it became clear that he planned to run against California's incumbent Republican governor, GOODWIN KNIGHT, for the gubernatorial nomination in 1958. Knight and Knowland engaged in a bitter campaign, marked by their disagreement over right-to-work laws, which Knowland supported. By November 1957, Knight, who was trailing badly in the polls and short of money, met with Eisenhower and Nixon. After the meeting, Knight announced that he was withdrawing from the race for governor and would instead seek the seat in the Senate vacated by Knowland. The aura of a backroom deal plagued both Knowland and Knight until election day.

Knowland and Knight won their primaries, but Knight once again stirred up internecine warfare when he refused to endorse Knowland. The internal divisions led to a disaster for the Republican party at the polls in 1958. Knight lost to Rep. CLAIR ENGLE (D-Calif.), and Knowland lost to the state's Democratic attorney general, EDMUND (PAT) BROWN.

After his defeat at the polls, Knowland returned to the Oakland Tribune in 1958. He became president and publisher of the paper when his father died in 1966. Although he never ran for elective office again, Knowland remained active in politics. He served on BARRY GOLDWATER's campaign staff in 1964 and supported fellow Californian Ronald Reagan for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968. Knowland died, an apparent suicide, at his summer home in Monte Rio, Calif., on February 23, 1974. The cause of death was a single gunshot to his head.

Kohlberg, Alfred

(1887–1960) China policy lobbyist

The son of a dry-goods shopkeeper, Kohlberg was born in San Francisco, Calif., on January 27, 1887. He enrolled at the University of California in 1904 but never graduated. At first, he tried his hand at the printing business but soon joined his family's business. After being impressed by textiles from China at the Panama Pacific Expo in 1915, Kohlberg traveled frequently to the Far East and established a series of business contacts. He purchased linen kerchiefs from Ireland, exported them to China (where pieceworkers embroidered them), and then sold them in the United States. Critics would later charge that Kohlberg paid the Chinese workers extremely low wages. By the 1930s, Kohlberg ran a thriving business based in Manhattan that would make him a wealthy man.

Given his international connections, Kohlberg was acutely aware of the political crises brewing in Europe and Asia during the 1930s and became active in various causes. The descendant of German Jewish immigrants, he worked as a fund-raiser for the United Jewish Appeal beginning in 1939. His most passionate commitment, however, was to China. He served as chairman of the Executive Committee of the American Bureau for Medical Aid to China (ABMAC) and traveled repeatedly to China to report on operations for the United China Relief (UCR) during World War II. Under the auspices of ABMAC, he went to China to determine the merit of reports that Chiang Kai-shek's (Jiang Jieshi's) Nationalist government was beset with graft and corruption. At least to his own satisfaction, Kohlberg determined that such reports were grossly exaggerated. Kohlberg also came to resent the attitude he perceived among American diplomats with respect to the Nationalist cause. As he saw it, these diplomats calmly accepted that Chiang would inevitably lose to the Communists. Even more, he concluded that the predictions of Chiang's downfall were inspired by sympathy for Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-Tung) and his Communists. After expressing his concerns within the UCR and failing to convince the leadership of the organization, he resigned in 1943. He then joined the Institute of Pacific Relations (IPR), a private think tank with ties to the State Department, but he found what he considered sympathy for the Chinese Communists there too. In the meantime, Kohlberg became a highly engaged student of communism. He read resolutions of the Comintern and the Daily Worker; he met with ex-Communists, many of whom became friends. Kohlberg compared IPR reports of Nationalist abuses to those in the Daily Worker, and wrote a report to the IPR charging that "your employees have been putting over on you a not-too-well camouflaged Communist line." When the leaders of the IPR rejected his charges, Kohlberg resigned and took his case to the Senate Subcommittee on Internal Security.

During the years after World War II, Kohlberg emerged as the leader of the "China Lobby," an informal group of individuals who criticized American policy in the years leading up to the Communist victory in China. The China Lobby sought American support for the Chinese government in exile in Taiwan and demanded that those it held responsible for the fall of China to the Communists be held accountable. In 1946, Kohlberg helped to found and became the first vice president of the America China Policy Association (ACPA), which lobbied for increased aid to Nationalist China and for the removal of communist sympathizers from the U.S. government. Later, Kohlberg served as chairman of the board of ACPA. Finding his true calling as a lobbyist and propagandist, he generated press releases, wrote letters to Congress, and compiled reports exposing the pro-communist sympathies of officers in the Far East Bureau of the State Department. He also contributed articles to China Monthly, perhaps the most pro-Nationalist journal of that time. In those articles, he maintained that Chiang was being "sold out by pro-communist U.S. Foreign Service officers." The officers he attacked included JOHN PATTON DAVIES, JR., JOHN CARTER VINCENT, and JOHN STEWART SERVICE. Another of Kohlberg's favorite targets was Owen Lattimore, an academic expert on the Far East and a sometime adviser to the State Department. Kohlberg also published Plain Talk, a journal devoted to criticizing U.S. policy toward China.

The release of the State Department's White Paper on China in 1949 and Kohlberg's response brought him to national prominence. He denounced the White Paper, "the real purpose" of which, he declared, seemed "to be to reveal to the chancellories of the world the story of the American betrayal of the Republic of China. What could be of greater aid to the Soviet Union than this?" He further alleged a "great conspiracy" that was responsible for the fall of China to the Communists. A group of conservative Republican members of Congress, "known as the China Bloc," shared similar sentiments and demanded an investigation of alleged communist sympathizers in the government.

Kohlberg found an ally in Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), who in 1950 charged that he knew of communists and communist sympathizers in the State Department. The ACPA and Kohlberg supplied files to support McCarthy's charges. Investigations by the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, led by Sen. PAT McCARRAN (D-Nev.), resulted in a purge of the Far East Branch of the State Department. Those whose careers were cut short included Vincent, Service, Davies, and O. Edmund Clubb.

Kohlberg's fervent anticommunism extended to domestic issues, as well. He supported not only McCarthy's charges but his methods. Kohlberg served as a member of the Special Committee on Radio and Television of the Joint Committee against Communism in New York. In 1950, the organization published a pamphlet titled Red Channels, which resulted in the blacklisting of many actors, directors, and writers in radio and television. Kohlberg was a founding member of the American Jewish League against Communism, which he chaired, and became its honorary president in 1955.

Kohlberg supported ROBERT TAFT, the conservative senator from Ohio, for the Republican nomination in 1952. Once Eisenhower gained the nomination, however, Kohlberg endorsed him. After Eisenhower entered the White House, Kohlberg became increasingly dissatisfied with the president's foreign policy. By 1954, Kohlberg concluded that Eisenhower was insufficiently aggressive in combating communism and charged that the president had largely followed the policies of the Truman administration.

Although he suffered a heart attack in 1954 that forced him to restrict his activities, Kohlberg remained active in his political causes. In 1955, Kohlberg set up a Committee of Endorsers, which took out newspaper advertisements demanding a more aggressive policy to combat communism. At congressional hearings, Kohlberg presented the Committee of Endorsers' program, which called on the United States to use economic, political, psychological, and military means to defeat communism. He continued actively to espouse anticommunism and the cause of Nationalist China until he died of a heart attack in Manhattan on April 7, 1960.

Kohler, Herbert (Vollrath)

(1891–1968) businessman

Kohler was born in Sheboygan, Wis., on October 21, 1891. His father, John M. Kohler, founded the Kohler Company, a manufacturer of plumbing ware, in 1873. Herbert Kohler received a Ph.B. from Yale University's Sheffield Scientific School in 1914 and went to work for the family business. He became president of the company in 1937 and succeeded his half-brother, Walter J. Kohler, Sr., a former governor of Wisconsin (1929–30), as the company's chairman of the board in 1940. Under Herbert Kohler's leadership, the company became the nation's largest manufacturer of plumbing fixtures.

In 1953, Local 833 of the United Auto Workers (UAW) won an election to represent Kohler employees at the enterprise's plant in Sheboygan, Wis., replacing a company union. On April 5, 1954, the employees went on strike, demanding a closed shop, dues check-offs, a grievance arbitration procedure, and a 10-cent-an-hour wage increase. The company rejected the first three demands and offered a three-cent increase. For two months, the factory was closed by sometimes-violent mass picketing by the approximately 3,600 striking workers (out of 4,000 company employees). However, the company obtained an injunction from a state circuit court halting the mass picketing. In June the company reopened the plant and hired replacements for the employees who did not return to work. In 1955 a near-riot developed when a group of strikers prevented a shipment of clay from reaching the factory.

Although Kohler delegated responsibility for strike negotiations to others, the company's position reflected his views. As the strike wore on year after year, he gained a reputation among businessmen and conservatives as an heroic, beleaguered, old-fashioned individualist. He denounced WALTER REUTHER, president of the UAW, as "a Moscow-trained socialist" and charged that the union was trying to tell him how to run his company. He also accused the union of resorting to violence against non-strikers. After mass picketing ended and the strikers were fired and replaced, Kohler said the union no longer represented his company's employees. The Wisconsin judge who issued the anti-mass picketing injunction subsequently stated that, after the company won the injunction, Kohler lost interest in negotiating because he thought that he had won the strike. The union offered to submit the disputed issues to arbitration, and WALTER J. KOHLER, JR., governor of Wisconsin and nephew of the company's president, appealed unsuccessfully to Herbert Kohler to agree to arbitration. In 1958, the Old Timers Council of the National Association of Manufacturers (composed of former directors of the NAM) named Herbert Kohler "Man of the Year."

To liberals and labor union spokesmen, Kohler's position on the strike represented a throwback to the aggressive antiunion attitudes of 19th-century businessmen. Reuther denounced him as "the most reactionary, anti-labor, immoral employer in America." The UAW charged the Kohler Co. with, among other things, stockpiling weapons in anticipation of the strike, instigating violence, and attempting to intimidate the strikers by hiring detectives to spy on them and on union officials. The union ultimately spent $12 million on strike benefits alone during the walkout.

In February and March 1958, the strike received national attention when the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), investigated the strife in Sheboygan. Appearing as a witness, Kohler accused the union of “mob rule” and “night-riding vandalism” and asserted that his company was performing a public service by resisting such tactics. Reuther testified that the Kohler Co. was not negotiating in good faith, but he conceded that some of the union’s tactics were “reprehensible.” Sen. BARRY M. GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), a member of the panel, denounced the UAW’s methods, particularly its efforts to organize a boycott of Kohler products. Sen. PAT McNAMARA (D-Mich.) resigned from the committee, charging that some of its Republican members were using the probe to attack the UAW.

In August 1960, the five-man National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) ruled that the Kohler Co. had engaged in unfair labor practices during the strike. The board stressed particularly the granting of a wage increase to non-striking employees in 1954, describing it as an attempt to undermine the union’s bargaining effectiveness. The NLRB ordered the reinstatement of most of the strikers who had been fired. The strike officially ended when the board filed its ruling on September 2, 1960.

In January 1962, the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., upheld the NLRB ruling. Six months later, the Supreme Court refused to hear the company’s appeal. The following month, Kohler resigned his post as president but continued as chairman and executive director. In December 1962, the Kohler Co. and the UAW agreed on a contract. The pact provided for expanded fringe benefits, a major medical plan, an improved pension plan, and an additional paid holiday, but not for a closed shop or a wage increase. Three years later, all issues relating to the strike were settled when the company and the union agreed on the amount of back pay and pensions to be granted to employees who had been fired during the walkout.

Kohler died of cerebral thrombosis and pneumonia in Sheboygan, Wis., on July 28, 1968.

Kohler, Walter J(odok), Jr.

(1904–1976) governor of Wisconsin

The son of Walter Jodok Kohler, Sr., a businessman and one-term Republican governor of Wisconsin (1929–30), Walter J. Kohler, Jr., was born in Sheboygan, Wis., on April 4, 1904. His grandfather, John M. Kohler, founded a company that made enamel bathroom and kitchen fixtures. Walter J. Kohler, Sr., became president of the family business in 1905. Under his leadership, the company expanded its range of produces and became known as a manufacturer of premium bathroom and kitchen fixtures and plumbing supplies. Walter J. Kohler, Jr., graduated from Yale University in 1925 and went to work for the Kohler Co. During World War II, he volunteered for the navy and served in the Pacific for four years. Kohler was discharged as lieutenant commander in 1945. He went to work at another of the family’s companies, the Vollrath Co., but soon became involved in politics. He considered challenging JOSEPH R. McCARTHY for the Republican nomination for a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1946 but ultimately decided against it. In 1948, he chaired the Wisconsin delegation to the Republican National Convention. Kohler ran for governor in 1950 and won.

Kohler disliked McCarthy and seriously considered challenging him in the Republican primary in 1952. Instead, under pressure from party regulars, he sought reelection as governor, put aside his reservations about McCarthy, and campaigned for the senator’s reelection in 1952. Kohler said: “You can’t write McCarthy off. You can like him or dislike him but the fact remains that all of the things he has said about the communists in government stack up to the point where there is too much smoke to repudiate McCarthy.”

Kohler also supported the candidacy of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Republican nomination and campaigned for Eisenhower in the Wisconsin primary. He also helped to organize support for Eisenhower among the nation’s governors. During the general election in 1952, Eisenhower had several scheduled stops in Wisconsin. The candidate asked speechwriter EMMET JOHN HUGHES to insert a tribute to George C. Marshall, whom McCarthy had accused of disloyalty, into one of the speeches. News of the planned statement reached Republican leaders in Wisconsin. On October 2, McCarthy, Kohler, and Henry Ringling, a Republican national committeeman from Wisconsin, flew to Peoria, Ill., to meet with Eisenhower before the campaign train traveled North. McCarthy made it clear that he did not want the reference to Marshall made in Wisconsin. The meeting became heated, and Eisenhower told McCarthy in no uncertain terms what he thought of the senator's anticommunist crusade. The presidential candidate also defended Marshall and stated his intent to retain the passage. The next day, as the train headed for Green Bay, Eisenhower again met with the Republicans from Wisconsin. He lectured them about "un-American methods in combating communism." On the way to Appleton, McCarthy's hometown, McCarthy and Kohler had another tense meeting with Eisenhower and SHERMAN ADAMS. As the train headed toward Milwaukee, Kohler pleaded with Adams to delete the statement about Marshall. The governor argued that it threatened to divide the party in Wisconsin and might jeopardize Republican chances in local and national elections. Adams agreed and brought Kohler to see Eisenhower. They were joined by Maj. Gen. WILTON B. ("Jerry") PERSONS, who sympathized with Kohler's position. Ike finally relented, although an adviser later described him as "purple with rage."

Kohler won reelection in 1952 and again in 1954, running both times against WILLIAM PROXMIRE. He supported a substantial expansion of Wisconsin's highway system and signed into law the largest tax cut, in terms of percentage, at any level of government between the presidencies of Calvin Coolidge and JOHN F. KENNEDY.

During his third term, Kohler was asked to help seek a resolution to the strike against his family's company, and he offered his services as a peacemaker. WALTER REUTHER, president of the United Automobile Workers, said that he would accept the governor's decision as "final and binding." However, Kohler's uncle, HERBERT V. KOHLER, flatly rejected the offer and denounced his nephew.

In 1957, Kohler ran for the seat in the U.S. Senate vacated by the death of McCarthy. Once again, Proxmire was his opponent. This time, however, Proxmire prevailed. Kohler returned to his position as president of the Vollrath Co. He remained interested in public affairs and was a member of the Council of Foreign Relations and chairman of the American Cancer Society. He died in Sheboygan on March 21, 1976.

Krock, Arthur

(1886–1974) journalist

The son of a bookkeeper, Krock was born in Glasgow, Ky., a small market town, on November 16, 1886. After attending schools in Glasgow and Chicago, he enrolled at Princeton University but was forced to leave after one semester because of financial difficulties. He earned an A.A. degree at Lewis Institute in Chicago in 1906. Soon after completing his work at Lewis Institute, he began a career in journalism as a cub reporter for the Louisville Herald. When the paper had to retrench in 1908, Krock lost his job but quickly found another as night editor in Louisville for the Associated Press. He became the Washington correspondent for the Louisville Times in 1910. Within a year, he also represented the Louisville Courier-Journal. In 1915 he returned to Louisville as editorial manager for the two papers. Krock served as editor in chief of the Louisville Times from 1919 to 1923, during which time he covered the Versailles Conference. His reporting on the peace conference earned him the French Legion of Honor. Following an editorial dispute with the paper's owner in 1923, Krock left the Louisville Times and moved to New York, where he took up a position as assistant to Will Hays, head of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America. Before long, he joined the editorial staff of the New York World and in 1923 became assistant to its publisher, Ralph Pulitzer. Krock joined the New York Times as an editorial writer in 1927 and became head of the paper's Washington bureau in January 1932. In addition to his administrative duties, he remained a correspondent and in 1933 began a signed, editorial-page column titled "In the Nation." He stepped down as head of the Washington bureau in 1953 but continued to write his column until his retirement in 1966.

A political conservative, Krock often criticized the New Deal, which he regarded as a threat to states' rights and free enterprise. Krock quickly recognized the growing importance of fiscal and monetary policy; he set about mastering the economic theories and policies of the New Deal and quickly became an acknowledged expert. He won two Pulitzer Prizes during the Roosevelt administration. The first came in 1935 for general excellence in reporting; the second came in 1937 for an interview with Franklin D. Roosevelt, in which the president discussed his accomplishments and plans, including his determination to add new members to the Supreme Court.

Krock had a close personal relationship with President HARRY S. TRUMAN, which began when Truman was a senator. Their friendship did not, however, prevent Krock from frequently attacking the administration. He opposed much of Truman's Fair Deal legislation, which Krock characterized as "more federal paternalism and . . . centralization." The columnist also criticized Truman for giving federal positions to friends and allies rather than to people qualified for the jobs. On the other hand, Krock praised Truman's forceful opposition to the nationwide strikes of coal miners, railway workers, and steelworkers; he also supported the president's efforts to contain communism (although he sometimes criticized Truman for not being aggressive enough in doing so). In 1951, Krock revealed that Truman had approached Gen. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER with an offer to support the general for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952 (Truman had made a similar offer to Eisenhower in 1948). Although Truman denied that the incident took place and Eisenhower refused to confirm it, Krock stood behind his story and maintained that his source was a "Democrat in an eminent public position." Years later he revealed that it had been Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS.

Krock supported Eisenhower for the presidency in 1952 and looked forward to a conservative administration. After Eisenhower's election, however, Krock proved somewhat ambivalent about the Eisenhower administration. During the early years of Eisenhower's presidency, Krock vacillated between charges that the president was acting tentatively and anticipation of the exertion of strong presidential leadership. By 1956, he criticized Eisenhower for his inability to lead the nation. Two years later, Krock was again defending the president against charges that he was "merely serving out his term." In his memoirs, Krock expressed a generally favorable, although not uncritical, view of the Eisenhower administration. His greatest criticism of Eisenhower was his failure to rein in the federal budget, the "steady increase" of which, Krock argued, established Eisenhower as "another of the great spenders."

The southern-born Krock responded cautiously to the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools. He called it a "milestone in more ways than one" because political and ideological differences on the Court had been submerged by agreement on the basic proposition that segregation in public schools harmed those segregated and therefore violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Krock found wisdom in the Court's decision to withhold relief and to order reargument on implementation in the fall. Gradualism was necessary, he maintained, because the ruling struck at the established social and political systems of the South. Localities would require time "to survey the acute problem which the Supreme Court has imposed on them and to decide how to resolve it." Krock predicted that the "problem will not instantly disappear" and asked that those who had pressed for the decision "be foremost in cooperating with those who are confronted with its incalculable consequences at first-hand." After defiance of a federal court order relating to the desegregation of Central High School in Little Rock, Ark., led Eisenhower to send federal troops to enforce the order, Krock wrote that the incident marked the end of a period in which the South tried to oppose the Court's ruling by legal, or "positive," means. He predicted that "the negative period of state and local resistance will now begin" and that some states would shut down their school systems.

Throughout the 1960s, Krock was a conservative voice on an increasingly liberal paper. He remained skeptical of presidential power and liberal economics. In addition to his two Pulitzer prizes, Krock won a special Pulitzer commendation in 1950 and a special Pulitzer citation in 1955. Soon after his retirement in 1966, he published a selection of his columns. Krock published his Memoirs in 1968, followed by two other books, The Consent of the Governed and Other Deceits (1971) and Myself When Young: Growing Up in the 1890s (1974). He received the Medal of Freedom in 1970. Although he personally liked President RICHARD M. NIXON, Krock was shocked and offended by the Watergate scandal. In the last year of his life, Krock complained that Nixon had betrayed the conservative cause. Krock died in Washington, D.C., on April 12, 1974.

Kuchel, Thomas H(enry)

(1910–1994) U.S. senator

The product of a pioneer family that helped found the southern California town of Anaheim and owned and edited the Anaheim Gazette, Kuchel was born in Anaheim on August 15, 1910. He graduated from the University of Southern California in 1932 and from the university's law school in 1935. That same year, he was admitted to the bar and began to practice law in Anaheim. He represented Orange Co. as a Republican in the state assembly from 1936 to 1939 and served in the state senate from 1940 to 1945. While still serving as a state senator, Kuchel volunteered for the U.S. Naval Reserve and was called to active duty as a lieutenant (junior grade) in 1942. He remained in the service until 1945. Gov. EARL WARREN appointed Kuchel to an unfilled term as state controller in February 1946. In November of that year, he won election to a full term. In 1950, Kuchel not only won the nomination of his own party for controller, but he won the Democratic nomination as well (then a common practice under California's cross-filing primary system). He ran unopposed in the general election. When RICHARD NIXON assumed the vice presidency in 1953, Warren named Kuchel to fill Nixon's seat in the U.S. Senate until the elections of 1954. Kuchel defeated Rep. Sam Yorty (D-Calif.) in the election to fill the remainder of Nixon's term. Kuchel won election to a full term in 1956 and was reelected in 1962.

Although he described himself as a "middle-of-the-road Eisenhower Republican," Kuchel took conservative, antiadministration positions on a number of issues during his first years in the Senate. He was one of the cosponsors of the Bricker amendment, which sought to curb the president's power to make treaties and to impose greater congressional regulation over the conduct of foreign affairs. Strenuous opposition by the administration led to the defeat of the Bricker amendment on February 25, 1954. One day later, a milder version sponsored by Sen. WALTER F. GEORGE (D-Ga.) fell one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass a constitutional amendment. Kuchel also opposed the censure of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) in late 1954.

Kuchel soon moved away from his conservative positions and by the late 1950s became identified with the liberal Republican minority in the Senate. He supported the Air Pollution Control Act of 1955, which appropriated $5 million annually for five years for research by the Public Health Service. His political evolution reflected, in part, a recognition that California had a majority of registered Democrats and a large proportion of independent voters. Therefore, to be successful, a Republican candidate had to appeal to Democratic and independent voters. Kuchel's moderate course earned him the support not only of the business community, but also of some labor unions. In his bid for reelection in 1956, Kuchel followed the Warren tradition of personal, almost nonpartisan campaigning. He emphasized his independence from other Republican office seekers, formed his own campaign committee, and tapped independent sources of funds.

Although Kuchel's independence won him broad electoral support, it cost him influence within the state Republican party. When Warren's appointment as chief justice in 1953 removed him from California politics, it left the state's Republican party without a generally accepted leader. For several years, Sen. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Gov. GOODWIN J. KNIGHT, and Vice President Nixon struggled for control of the party. Kuchel remained aloof from the contending factions. Even after the elections of 1958, in which Knowland lost his bid for the governorship and Knight was defeated for Knowland's seat in the Senate, leaving Kuchel as the only Republican holding a major statewide office, Kuchel did not become involved in the struggle for control of the party. Moreover, after that electoral debacle, conservatives gradually took over the party's organizational apparatus, and Kuchel's position in the party deteriorated. Furthermore, the repeal of California's cross-filing system in 1958 meant that he could no longer count on Democratic votes to secure the Republican nomination.

Following heavy Republican losses in the congressional elections of 1958, Kuchel joined a group of Republican liberals in challenging the conservative leadership of the party in the Senate. In an effort to avoid an intraparty conflict, Sen. EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.), the conservative candidate for minority leader, offered the post of whip to Kuchel, but the insurgents, led by Sen. GEORGE AIKEN (R-Vt.), refused the compromise. By the time the party caucus met in January 1959, the conservatives had enough votes to win all the leadership posts. Dirksen, however, in an effort to maintain unity, backed Kuchel instead of the conservative candidate for whip, KARL MUNDT (R-S.Dak.). With Dirksen's support, Kuchel won election as whip, a position he held until he left the Senate in 1969. Dirksen also arranged Kuchel's assignment to the important Senate Appropriations Committee.

As the Republican whip, Kuchel helped promote legislation on which the party's position had been determined by the Republican Policy Committee. Occasionally, this meant supporting legislation favored by the Republicans' southern Democratic partners in the Senate's conservative coalition. In 1959, for example, Kuchel introduced an amendment to a labor anticorruption bill that weakened a provision permitting the secretary of labor to seek federal court injunctions blocking unions from depriving their members of voting and other rights. Southern Democrats feared that this provision would serve as a precedent for civil rights action on behalf of black members of southern unions. However, Kuchel often voted against the majority of his party.

Kuchel joined liberals in an unsuccessful attempt to strengthen the Civil Rights Act of 1960 by empowering the attorney general to enter private suits for school desegregation. In the same year, he voted to override the president's veto of salary increases for federal employees, a measure opposed by most Republicans as fiscally irresponsible. As a result of these stands, Kuchel exerted little influence with most of his Republican colleagues in the Senate.

During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, Kuchel continued to side with liberals on many domestic issues. In 1964, for example, he was one of only five Republicans to vote for Medicare, and he was influential in the passage of conservation measures. Kuchel also played a major role in obtaining passage of civil rights legislation in the mid-1960s. He was comanager on the floor for bills that became the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. His refusal to support Sen. BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), the Republican nominee in 1964, led to an unsuccessful attempt to oust Kuchel as whip the following year. Kuchel further alienated members of his party by refusing to support Nixon for governor of California in 1962, George Murphy for the Senate in 1964, and Ronald Reagan for governor in 1966. When Kuchel came up for reelection in 1968, conservatives in California backed Max Rafferty, who defeated him for the Republican nomination. Kuchel returned to legal practice with a firm in Beverly Hills and subsequently became a lobbyist for Colombian sugar interests. He resided in Beverly Hills until his death on November 21, 1994.

Ladejinsky, Wolf I(saac)
(1899–1975) agricultural expert

The son of a well-to-do Jewish miller and trader, Ladejinsky was born in Ekaterinopol, Ukraine, on March 15, 1899. He completed secondary studies at a local gymnasium, but the prospect of study at a university was disrupted by the outbreak of the Russian Revolution, during which his father's mill and property were confiscated and his brother killed. At the age of 21, Ladejinsky fled to Romania, where he found a clerical job with the Bucharest office of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS). With the assistance of HIAS, he came to the United States in 1922 and settled in New York City. He had no money and spoke no English; over the next four years, he supported himself by making mattresses, washing windows, and selling newspapers. During this time, he saved his money and learned English. He enrolled in Columbia University in 1926, and graduated with a B.S. in 1928. That same year, he became a naturalized citizen. In 1930, he took a position as an interpreter with the Soviet Union's Amtorg Trading Corporation. He was fired without explanation after one year. Ladejinsky then earned a master's degree in agricultural economics from Columbia University in 1934. The following year, Ladejinsky joined the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations in the U.S. Department of Agriculture. He published several articles on Soviet collective farms, denouncing Soviet agricultural policies under Stalin; he also published numerous articles on Asian agriculture. By the end of World War II, Ladejinsky had become one of the department's leading experts on Asian agriculture.

During the postwar period, Ladejinsky emerged as a major force behind land reform in Asia. In 1945, Gen. Douglas MacArthur called him to Japan as an adviser to the occupation government. Under Ladejinsky's direction, the old Japanese feudal system was abolished, and Japanese farmers were allowed to acquire land. Millions of acres were redistributed to peasants. He also went to China to help implement land reform there, but he was eventually forced out when the Communists took power. As an adviser to Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi), Ladejinsky also aided land redistribution in Taiwan (Formosa). In 1950, he became an agricultural attaché with the U.S. embassy in Tokyo, and, by 1954, he was in charge of the American agricultural program in the Far East.

As a result of bureaucratic reorganization, agricultural attachés were transferred to the Department of Agriculture in 1954. Ladejinsky, therefore, had to undergo a security clearance, despite the fact that he had been given clearance by the State Department only seven months earlier. Under the Eisenhower administration's security program, department heads held responsibility for clearance. In December 1954, the Department of Agriculture informed Ladejinsky that he would not be reappointed to his post because he did not meet "technical standards and security requirements." Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON based his decision in part on the different role agricultural attachés would play under the Department of Agriculture (as Benson put it, “It was agriculture we were interested in, not land reform”). With respect to “security requirements,” Benson cited Ladejinsky’s former employment with Amtorg, his connection with communist front organizations, an extended visit to the Soviet Union in 1939, and the fact that the attaché had family in the Ukraine. In particular, Benson maintained that Ladejinsky’s family in the Ukraine gave the Soviet government sway over him. Many officials, including Sen. HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) and Rep. WALTER JUDD (R-Minn.), came to Ladejinsky’s defense. They pointed out that Ladejinsky’s trip to the Soviet Union came at the request of the Agriculture Department and that his connection with communist front organizations amounted to nothing more than his name on their mailing lists. Prominent Japanese officials objected that the denial of Ladejinsky’s clearance damaged American prestige in the Far East. Even behind-the-scenes maneuvering by the White House failed to persuade Benson to reconsider.

On January 5, 1955, in what amounted to a slap in the face to Benson, Ladejinsky received full security clearance by the Foreign Operations Administration (FOA) and was hired to supervise land reform projects in South Vietnam. Finally, Benson reversed his decision and apologized to Ladejinsky. When the functions of FOA were transferred to the International Cooperation Administration in May 1955, Ladejinsky was assigned to that agency.

Ladejinsky was forced to resign his post in February 1956, when he violated a rule forbidding employees of the FOA from investing in companies that received aid from the United States. He remained in South Vietnam as an adviser to President Ngo Dinh Diem until 1961. For the next three years, he worked as a consultant and regional specialist for the Ford Foundation. In 1964, he participated in a study by the World Bank of economic development in India, and he remained with the World Bank for the next decade, most of which he spent as a member of the World Bank’s permanent resident mission in India. Ladejinsky died in Washington, D.C., on July 3, 1975.

Landrum, Phil(lip) M(itchell)

(1907–1990) U.S. congressman

Landrum was born in Martin, Ga., a small village in the northeastern part of the state, on September 10, 1907. He attended public schools and Mercer University in Macon, Ga. In the early and mid-1930s, he worked as a coach in local high schools. From 1937 to 1941, he was superintendent of Nelson (Ga.) High School. While teaching, Landrum attended Piedmont College in Demorest, Ga., from which he graduated in 1939, and earned his LL.B. from the Atlanta Law School in 1941. Upon his admission to the bar in 1941, he commenced the practice of law in Canton, Ga. In 1942, he ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic nomination for a congressional seat. After enlisting in the army air corps as a private in 1942, he served in Europe and was discharged in June 1945 as a first lieutenant. Upon returning to civilian life, Landrum worked briefly for the Veterans Administration before being appointed assistant attorney general of Georgia in 1946, a position he held until 1947. Between 1947 and 1949, he served as executive secretary to Gov. M. E. Thompson. He then practiced law in Jasper, Ga. In 1952, Landrum defeated five other Democrats to win the party’s nomination for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives. He ran unopposed in November. As a member of the House, he represented a poor agricultural area of the state with an economy based on poultry raising and low-wage textile manufacturing.

Landrum established a conservative record in Congress. He opposed the development of public power and large-scale public works projects, such as the Saint Lawrence Seaway. He was the only Democrat on the Education and Labor Committee in 1955 to vote against raising the minimum wage from 75 cents to $1. He did, however, vote for the bill on the floor of the House.

Landrum vigorously opposed civil rights legislation. In March 1956, he joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the “Southern Manifesto,” which denounced the Supreme Court’s ruling that segregated public schools were unconstitutional and pledged “all lawful means” to bring about its reversal. In July 1956, he voted against a bill to provide federal aid for school construction that contained the Powell amendment, which barred schools practicing segregation from receiving such funds. Landrum also voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 and opposed extending the life of the Civil Rights Commission. He voted against granting statehood to Alaska in 1958 and Hawaii in 1959 because the admission of the new states would reduce the South's influence in Congress.

As a member of the House Education and Labor Committee, Landrum became involved in developing measures to deal with corruption in labor unions. Investigations in 1957 by the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, led by Sen. JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), revealed extensive corruption and embezzlement in labor unions as well as collusion between management and labor leaders. In 1958, two members of the McClellan committee, JOHN KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and SAM ERVIN (D-N.C.), offered a bill that mandated secret ballots in union elections and full disclosure of financial transactions. The Senate passed the measure, but the House rejected it. Early in 1959, Eisenhower called for legislation to safeguard union contributions of workers, insure secret ballots in union elections, and protect the public interest during labor disputes. In July 1959, the House Education and Labor Committee reported out a bill, sponsored by Karl Elliot (D-Ala.), that focused on the prevention of financial and electoral misconduct by union leaders. Landrum, however, believed the bill "too weak" and demanded more extensive measures. Together with Rep. ROBERT P. GRIFFIN (R-Mich.), Landrum developed an alternative bill designed to strengthen the Taft-Hartley Act, which passed the House. In early August, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER made a special speech on radio and television supporting the Landrum-Griffin bill as "a good start toward a real labor reform law." Despite opposition from liberals and organized labor, the bill passed both houses of Congress, and Eisenhower signed it into law in September 1959. The new law contained a "bill of rights" for labor, set criminal penalties for the abuse of union offices, and guaranteed union members free elections. Its most controversial provisions amended the Taft-Hartley Act to: (1) expand the ban on secondary boycotts by prohibiting unions from using boycotts to coerce employers to stop doing business with other firms; (2) extend secondary boycott provisions to additional workers; and (3) permit state agencies and courts to take jurisdiction under state law of cases the National Labor Relations Board refused to accept.

In December, Landrum urged further amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act to deal with "national emergencies," such as the steel strike of that year. He declared the Landrum-Griffin Act "only the beginning of real reform."

Landrum was a forceful advocate for the southern textile industry during the 1960s. He supported restrictions on textile imports and opposed increases in the minimum wage. Although he continued his opposition to civil rights legislation, Landrum played a leading role in obtaining passage of President LYNDON JOHNSON's domestic legislation. He played a decisive role in gaining passage in the House of the Equal Opportunity Act of 1964. In addition, he sponsored legislation in the House to enact Johnson's War on Poverty and played an instrumental role in gaining the support of southern members to insure its passage. Landrum also voted for Medicare in 1965. He did not stand for reelection in 1976. He returned to Jasper, Ga., where he resided until his death on November 19, 1990.

Langer, William

(1886–1959) U.S. senator; chairman, Judiciary Committee

William Langer was born on his family's farm in Everest Township, near Casselton in the Dakota Territory on September 30, 1886. After graduating from Casselton High School as valedictorian in 1904, he received an LL.B. from the University of North Dakota in 1906, but, by statute, was too young to practice law. He then attended Columbia University, where he was valedictorian, and received a B.A. in 1910. After a failed venture in Mexico, he returned to North Dakota, where he was admitted to the bar in 1911, settled in Mandan, and served as assistant state's attorney for Morton Co. until 1914. He became state's attorney in 1914, and held that office until 1916, when he moved to Bismark, N.Dak., and set up a law practice there. Running as a Republican with backing from the Non-Partisan League (NPL), he won election as state attorney general in 1916 and reelection two years later. The NPL, a farmers' alliance that advocated state cooperatives, steadily gained influence in the state's Republican Party. As attorney general, Langer aggressively enforced Prohibition and Sunday closing laws; he also energetically enforced compulsory school attendance and prosecuted vice. He broke with the NPL in 1919, accusing its leadership of advocating "socialism and free love," and the next year ran unsuccessfully for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Langer returned to the practice of law in Bismark and, over the next decade, held a number of appointive offices. He served on the state parole board, the board of equalization, and the board of health (which he headed). After being defeated for the Republican nomination as attorney general in 1928, Langer made peace with the NPL.

In 1932, Langer captured the Republican nomination for governor. He endorsed Franklin D. Roosevelt for president, attacked the grain trade monopoly, unjust grain grading, and corruption in financial institutions and state government. In a difficult year for Republicans, Langer won in a landslide. Shortly after assuming office, he became embroiled in scandal and controversy. In 1934, he was found guilty in federal court of coercing state employees to buy subscriptions equal to 5 percent of their salaries to the NPL's newspaper, the Leader. Since a convicted felon was barred from holding state office, the lieutenant governor claimed the right to succeed Langer, who responded by declaring martial law and calling out the National Guard. Ultimately, on July 17th, 1934, the state's supreme court removed him from office. Langer appealed his conviction and won a new trial, which resulted in a hung jury. In 1935, yet another trial resulted in his acquittal.

Running as an independent with backing from the NPL, Langer won election as governor in 1936. Two years later, again endorsed by the NPL, Langer failed to unseat the incumbent, Sen. Gerald P. Nye (R-N.Dak.), in the Republican primary. Langer then filed as an independent in the general election and again lost to Nye. In 1940, this time running as a Republican with support from the NPL, Langer won a three-way race for a seat in the Senate. His opponents brought a series of charges to the Senate Committee on Elections and Privileges. Langer was allowed to take his seat "without prejudice" while the committee investigated the allegations. After reviewing the evidence in a voluminous report, the committee, in December 1941, recommended by a vote of 13 to 3 that Langer be denied his seat because he had demonstrated "continuous, contemptuous, and shameful disregard for public duty." In March 1942, however, the Senate as a whole voted to allow Langer to retain his seat.

In the Senate, Langer established a reputation as a maverick. A rigid isolationist both before and after World War II, he broke with other Republican isolationists on most social and economic issues. In foreign policy, Langer repeatedly opposed legislation, backed by Roosevelt, that moved the United States away from neutrality and prepared for war. In 1943, he accused the president of having led the country into war. He opposed the collective security proposals of Dumbarton Oaks in 1945 and was one of only two senators to vote against ratification of the United Nations charter. As relations with the Soviet Union deteriorated after the war, Langer opposed aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall Plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, and universal military training. His approach to the Korean conflict was somewhat schizophrenic. He asked for withdrawal of American ground forces in March 1951 but two years later attacked American allies for opposing action beyond the Yalu River.

In domestic politics, however, he voted against the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947 and supported high agricultural price supports, rural electrification, rural telephone service, as well as retirement benefits for postal workers. Langer consistently defended the interests of American Indians and civil service employees. He backed HARRY S. TRUMAN for the presidency in 1948.

Despite his eclectic positions, he remained popular with voters in North Dakota. He won reelection in 1946, 1952, and 1958. In the last of those elections, he carried every county in the state. Langer endorsed neither candidate in 1952 but appeared in North Dakota with Truman, who was campaigning for the Democratic nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON. Ironically, Eisenhower's victory helped Republicans capture both houses of Congress, which made Langer chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee when Congress convened in 1953.

In general, Langer opposed the Eisenhower administration's legislative program. He supported the president less frequently than any Republican in the Senate. During the 83rd Congress, for example, Congressional Quarterly reported that he backed legislation endorsed by the White House only 29 percent of the time. In 1955, 1956, and 1958, Langer was the Republican senator who most frequently voted against the administration.

As chair of the Judiciary Committee, he headed the panel's special investigation of juvenile delinquency in 1953 and 1954. The hearings focused on the effect of mass media on children and, in particular, the relationship of the media to deviancy and delinquency. In January 1954, Langer used his position as chair of the Judiciary Committee to delay the confirmation of EARL WARREN as chief justice of the United States. Langer was angered by what he perceived to be a lack of patronage for his state. Claiming that he had no bias against Warren, Langer held hearings in which he allowed the most scurrilous charges to be aired. Senator ARTHUR V. WATKINS (R-Utah) declared the accusations to be "the biggest lot of tommyrot ever brought before a Senate committee." Although he eventually supported Warren, Langer voted against the nomination of JOHN M. HARLAN of New York as associate justice of the Supreme Court a year later.

Langer's support of public power brought him once again into conflict with the administration. When the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) consumption of power generated by the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) threatened the city of Memphis with an eventual shortage of electricity, the TVA proposed building a new steam plant to meet the growing demand. Eisenhower, who favored private development of power, ordered the director of the Bureau of the Budget, JOSEPH DODGE and the chairman of the AEC, LEWIS L. STRAUSS, to explore the possibility of having private industry build the plant. EDGAR H. DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE A. YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company, formed the Mississippi Valley Generation Company to build the plant to supply power to the TVA. The TVA, AEC, and Bureau of the Budget found the Dixon-Yates proposal acceptable, and Eisenhower approved it. The decision infuriated advocates of public power.

In August 1954, Langer insisted on investigating charges that Dixon had been involved in questionable business practices. When the Republican leadership in the Senate blocked Langer, he paid for hearings himself. Senators defending the administration, including EVERETT M. DIRKSEN (R-Ill.) and JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER (R-Md.), argued that Langer's funding of the hearings was improper. Langer simply ignored them. As chair of the Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee, Langer took testimony in August and issued a report on Dixon's Mississippi Power and Light Company. The subcommittee's analysis cited "monopolistic trends and abuses" in Dixon's operations and attacked the administration's support of private power development. Dirksen, a member of the subcommittee, refused to sign the report. In July 1955, Langer accused Dixon of committing perjury when testifying on his role in the negotiation of the contract.

Langer's opposition to the Dixon-Yates contract resulted in his refusal to back Strauss's nomination as secretary of commerce in 1959. The nomination ultimately went down to defeat in the full Senate. Only two Republicans, Langer and MARGARET CHASE SMITH (R-Maine), voted against Strauss.

In December 1954, Langer voted against the condemnation of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). The North Dakotan frequently disagreed with McCarthy on the rights of those accused of communist sympathies, but he felt a personal obligation to McCarthy for his help during Langer's campaign for the Republican nomination in 1952. McCarthy recorded a message defending the North Dakotan against charges from the right wing of the state's party that Langer was insufficiently anticommunist.

Langer joined Sen. HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) in sponsoring a constitutional amendment that would have abolished the electoral college and provided for the direct popular election of the president. Langer also supported a national presidential primary. The Senate refused to act on Langer's proposal in 1955 and again in 1956.

Not only did Langer often disagree with Eisenhower on domestic matters, he also split with the administration over foreign policy. In February 1954, he voted for the Bricker amendment, designed to limit the treaty-making power of the president. When the Communist Chinese began shelling the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu in 1954 and Eisenhower sought a congressional resolution committing the United States to the defense of Taiwan (Formosa), Langer unsuccessfully offered an amendment that would have prohibited the use of American forces on the Chinese mainland, Quemoy, or Matsu. Langer, who had long opposed mutual security treaties, was the only senator to vote against ratification of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization in February 1955. That same month, he was one of only six senators to vote against the China Mutual Defense Treaty. Langer later supported initiatives that would have restricted America's commitments to defend Taiwan.

In spite of his disagreements with the president and the administration, when the NPL filed in the Democratic column in 1956, Langer, who was not up for reelection that year, endorsed Eisenhower. By the late 1950s, Langer's health was failing, but he refused to relinquish his seat in the Senate. Angry over his independence, the state Republican party officially opposed his renomination in 1958 and backed another candidate. Langer nonetheless won the primary by a two-to-one majority and carried every county. Even though he did not make a single campaign appearance, he easily won the general election that fall. During the contest for the Republican nomination, Dirksen, contrary to his normal practice, had endorsed Langer, who returned the favor in January 1959 by supporting Dirksen for minority leader in the Senate. By 1959, Langer, who had suffered from diabetes for years, was blind. He died of a heart attack in Washington, D.C., on November 8, 1959.

Lansdale, Edward G(eary)

(1908–1987) air force officer

The son of an automotive executive, Lansdale was born in Detroit on February 6, 1908. He attended the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA) and obtained a commission in the army through the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. After leaving UCLA without graduating in 1931, he went to New York to find work as a journalist. He moved back to California in 1935 and began a career in advertising. When World War II broke out, he was working in San Francisco. He had resigned his commission and applied to have it reinstated. While he was waiting, a business acquaintance helped him get him a position in the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). Called to active duty in 1943, he was assigned to military intelligence but continued to work for the OSS. After the war, Lansdale received a commission in the regular army and went to the Philippines with the rank of major. There he was in charge of intelligence analysis for the Western Pacific. While still in the Philippines, he transferred to the newly created air force in 1947. In 1949, the air force effectively lent him to an interagency espionage group, the Office of Policy Coordination, which became part of the CIA in 1952. Lansdale became intrigued with the techniques of psychological warfare. Moreover, he became convinced that the cold war would be fought not through conventional warfare, but in a struggle for the loyalty of people in the emerging nations. For Lansdale, the answer to the revolutionary doctrine of the communists was not only military strength and foreign aid; local governments had to establish their legitimacy with their people.
